A NATIONAL CHURCH PAPER FOR ALL THE FAMILY.

Southern Churchman

1835 NISI DOMINUS FRUSTRA

Vol. 92. RICHMOND, VA., JANUARY 1, 1927. No. 1.

AS the flame of our Yule log brightens,
The good from the year that is done
Is carried on in the old year's brand
Till the old and the new are one.

While the sparks of the fire fly upward,
Our hearts are knit in one.
May we look in faith to the future,
The year that is just begun.

With an Introduction by
THE RT. REV. WILLIAM CABELL BROWN, D. D.,
Bishop of Virginia.

"The author's statement of Church doctrine seem to me to be singularly free from the narrow partisan views, and I feel certain that the book will serve to increase the love for the Church on the part of those who are already members of it, and will do much to remove the prejudices entertained by those who look askance at the Church because of their lack of knowledge of her history and the sweet reasonableness of her teachings."—From Bishop Brown's Preface.

THE SPIRIT OF MISSIONS

281 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK

For the Southern Churchman.

Our Christmas Feast.

F. B. Stone.

The compassion of Jesus is measured
By naught but the size of the need;
He gives without stint, o'erflowing the cup,
When He seeks the hungry to feed.

The sick were made whole, the lame leaped and ran,
And the multitude satisfied,
On fishes and bread as they sat by the sea,
Twelve baskets over beside.

In supplying their need, Christ gave of Himself,
For five thousand men He broke bread.
He blessed and He toiled the hungry to feed,
Shall we follow where Jesus has led?

'Tis our Christmas feast, let us send it forth
To the starving across the sea.
In the spirit of Him who ministered then
To the hungry in Galilee.

Jack Frost.

There's a funny little fellow
Who is dressed in shining white,
And with brushes dipped in silver
Paints my windowpanes at night.

Oh, he fashions fairy pictures:
Pretty trees and flowers gay—
But before I wake up mornings,
He has hastened far away!

I would like to watch him painting,
But I'm such a sleepyhead
I can't stay awake a minute
After I am tucked in bed!

And, though I like his pictures,
I'm afraid he will not know—
But I'm hoping that the fairies
Find a way to tell him so!

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

It is no use denouncing sin before you renounce it.

"Progress is essentially a religious conception," according to Dr. John Martin Thomas, president of Rutgers College. "It is not science that looks into the future. It is religion that looks into the future. Religion is the slow yet only means of progress."

Do you recognize Christ in the commonplaces—not in the great crises, but in the little things of life? The joyful people in the Church of Christ are those who see God in the commonplaces—in the breaking of bread, the giving of food and health and clothing, in the fresh air and the bright sunlight.—A. S. Dixon.

The man who believes in God and in His loving providence need not darken his days by fretful cares and dread of evil to come. Believing in God's purpose of love with him, he knows that the future cannot bring anything contrary to that.—Hugh Black.

"Sahib, teach me geography," said a native Christian preacher, who could not read or write.

"Why do you want to learn geography?"

"Your Honor, I want to know geography that I may learn the names of more places to pray for."

When we land on the bleak shore of disappointment we shall make the wonderful discovery that the Saviour has anticipated our coming and has made ample provision. There will be heavenly cordials, and there will be comforts of grace, and there will be the exhilarating wine of a new hope.—J. H. Jowett.

Oh, let us trust Him, let us take the comfort;
Oh, let us lean upon our Father's care;
Life may seem dark at times, events mysterious,
But once at home, all shadows vanish there.

Have faith in God! No enemy prevailing
Can reach you with the least of aught that harms.
Vain are their boasts, and ever doomed to failure,
Around you are the everlasting arms.
Your cause is His and He will see it through.
Have faith in God! His armies march for you.

EDITORIALS

Vol. 92. RICHMOND, VA., JANUARY 1, 1927. No. 1.

A MESSAGE TO THE PARISH OF MY PRAYERS

With this issue of the paper, my responsibilities as editor cease. To me it has been a wonderful experience. I entered upon it in a spirit of high adventure. For more than two years I have sought to find the soul beneath the form of things and to interpret the mind of the Master as God gave me power. The effort to interpret my aspirations has made increasingly plain to me that Christ is the one source of power and life and light; and that the one test of truth and worth is the likeness to Himself; that whenever a form or an organization or a dogma or the clamor of a cult builds a barrier before the open door of the Father's House, that the highest and holiest loyalty to Him Who calls Himself the Way, is to break the form, smash if necessary the organization, cast out the dogma, and strive to still the clamor of the cult, even at the cost of life itself, and with glad death as the reward of striving.

In these two years the boundaries of my faith in Christ have been enlarged until the ideals at least of that faith are clearly defined. They are these: Wide as the Father's love, tolerant as the wise pity of the Master, and loyal as is the love to One Who is at once an understanding Friend and an Almighty God.

JOSEPH B. DUNN.

Dr. Dunn tendered his resignation last September, on account of the ill health of his daughter. At the time it was hoped that he might be induced to resume his post. Although the immediate cause of his retirement has since been happily relieved, other developments have made it impossible for him to return to this work, although urged to do so.

He has rendered two years of faithful and efficient service to the Southern Churchman, with a success that is well known to its readers.

A man of charming personality, delightful humor and ripe scholarship, his controlling influence will be greatly missed, and his hosts of friends and admirers will deeply deplore the severance of his connection with the paper. His departure from the office breaks a relationship that has been of the pleasantest character, and leaves a gap in our official family circle that it will be difficult to fill.

At the request of Dr. Dunn I wrote the editorials through August; and by the authority of Mr. Lewis C. Williams, President of the Southern Churchman Company, I have had entire editorial control since September 15, and shall continue as acting editor for the present, in which capacity I bespeak the continued interest and support of our readers for the Southern Churchman.

R. CARY MONTAGUE.

LAW ENFORCEMENT A THOUSAND STRONG

Everything today is accomplished through committees. Whether it be a reduction of taxes brought about by national legislation from Washington, or the installation of a new parlor organ in the mission chapel, the first step necessary is action by a committee. If the proper committee is not already in existence, then one must be created forthwith.

That being the case, it is natural that so great a subject as the enforcement of law and order should require a large committee. Such a group, composed of no less than one thousand persons, is scheduled to meet in Washington, at the New Willard Hotel, on Thursday, January 6, at a luncheon at 1 P. M. While this gathering calls itself the "National Citizens' Committee of One Thousand for Law Observance", it will welcome representative persons, who are interested in this important matter from all parts of the country, and reservations should be made either through Mr. Hugh A. Thrift, Union Trust Building, Washington, D. C., or Mr. Carlton M. Sherwood, 66 Fifth Avenue, New York City, at $2 a plate.

After the luncheon, at 2:30, the business session will begin in the small banquet hall with a report of officers for the past year, followed by a report on the present situation, after which the election of officers for the coming year will take place. The afternoon session will be concluded with an address by Colonel Raymond Robins.

The sessions will continue in the evening with a banquet at 6:45, reservations for which should be made through Mr. William T. Galliher, Federal-American National Bank, Washington, D. C., at $4 per plate.

Colonel P. H. Callahan, of Louisville, Ky., will be toastmaster, and Senators William E. Borah and Morris Sheppard will be the principal speakers on the subject, "America and the Crisis in Law Observance and Enforcement".

Many distinguished men are expected to be present, among whom will be Secretary of Navy Wilbur and General Lincoln C. Andrews, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who is head of the National Prohibition Department.

Although it is proverbial that "talk is cheap", and this meeting consists chiefly of "talk", nevertheless, it is at least encouraging to see men of this calibre giving time and thought to a subject that is becoming one of the most disturbing elements in our national life. The more people think along these lines the more likelihood there is of awakening sufficient public sentiment to gain prestige for the present law that is necessary to require its support.

On this general subject the following words from President Coolidge's recent message to Congress are worthy of our consideration:

1926.

"Some people do not like the amendment, some do not like other parts of the Constitution, some do not like any of it. Those who entertain such sentiments have a perfect right to seek through legal methods for a change. But for any of our inhabitants to observe such parts of the Constitution as they like, while disregarding others, is a doctrine that would break down all protection of life and property and destroy the American system of ordered liberty."

LOOK BACK AND CHEER UP

"A glance at our country and its present moral condition fills the mind with alarming apprehensions.

"The moral desolation and flood sweep away not only the blessings of religion, but the boasted freedom of our republican institutions as well. Every candid person must admit that if ignorance, licentiousness, and a disregard of all moral laws prevail in our communities, then demagogues and spendthrifts will sit in the halls of legislation; ambition, self-aggrandizement and love of power will supplant patriotism, public spirit and attention to the best interests of the nation."

This sounds discouraging, doesn't it? And no doubt the situation looked so to good people just one hundred years ago when it was written, for in those days they were surrounded by all the unhappy conditions that confront us today with few of the encouraging evidences of healthy altruistic effort that we have to cheer us.

At that time the suffering throughout the world was much as it is at present.

The effects of the Napoleonic wars were still felt, but there was no Near East Relief Organization doing its utmost to feed the hungry and clothe the naked.

Here at home our Associated Charities was not known until many years later. The appeal of the Red Cross Roll Call was not heard in the land asking for funds to relieve the distressed and dying after such catastrophes as the Florida tornado.

It would look almost hopeless to us, too, and we should be tempted to write as pessimistically as the foregoing quotation, if we had around us all the suffering and other unhappy conditions that we have today without any of the well organized powers of good.

In the past society women did not drive around to deliver Christmas baskets to the needy, by the hundred.

When these discouraging words were written boys that are now trained to courtesy, and order in the Scout Troops, were on the streets, and the untamed gang spirit roamed at large, manifesting itself in "rock battles" that often resulted in broken heads, mutilated faces, and occasionally blinded eyes.

A hundred years ago an open barroom on almost every street corner in the cities, and at all the cross road stores in the country, invited the rich to intemperance and reduced the poor to pitiless penury. Perhaps the pessimist of today will here shake his head and say, "But in those good old days, people observed such laws as they were. It is only prohibition that has brought law into contempt". But this condition arrived just about eighty years ahead of prohibition, for in 1843, we find this statement, which might come from the pen of an anti-prohibitionist today, "A disregard for all laws, and feverish and foolish efforts to check crime by profuse legislation are common".

The bribery and corruption in politics today is indeed discouraging, but it is by no means a new thing. In 1824 after an unusually bitter contest with several presidential candidates in the field, the choice of a President had to be made by the House of Representatives, and later one of the leading candidates was accused of selling out in order to obtain a cabinet position from the winner.

Many think, however, that in the good old days, the Church and the clergy were the bulwarks of respectability and righteousness. To these this comment written in 1828 will come as a shock, "Our irreligious clergy! What can be done for the conversion of the many ministers of the Word who preach error for truth, because they themselves have never known salvation? What will become of Churches under such leadership?"

According to this quotation, the condition of the Church then was far worse than it is today and there was no Bishops' Crusade to arouse it to a greater effort.

These quotations are taken from an article published in the Atlantic Monthly for December, and condensed for the Reader's Digest, with the following brief preface: "Every essential fact in this paper is a direct quotation from exact paraphrase from the American periodicals published about a century ago".

In reciting these gloomy forebodings, and pointing out the improvements that are now apparent, it is not our purpose to lead our readers into a state of saturated self-complacency, as our New Year's message, but we do believe that the world is moving forward, lurching along by fits and starts, and with an occasional slip in the wrong direction, but on the whole, there is certainly an enormous improvement in many directions.

If each of us will recognize his own responsibility for and to the entire human family, and will act in accordance with the recognition of this relationship we can, day by day, contribute our bit toward making a better world in 1927.

EPIPHANY

It is hard to realize it today, but formerly the Feast of Epiphany, held a far more prominent place in the Christian character than did Christmas. Indeed, it is one of the oldest Church festivals, and is referred to by Clement of Alexandria, as far back as A. D. 194, although at that time it was only observed by a portion of the Church. At some periods it has been mentioned in the plural, and its celebration has often been linked with the baptism of our Lord, and the two miracles of the changing of water into wine and the feeding of the multitude after the Sermon on the Mount.

A comparison of the two Gospel accounts of our Saviour's birth, as recorded by Matthew and Luke, with the surrounding events in each case, gives us an impressive picture of the universality of the mission of Jesus.

St. Luke tells of an angelic announcement to humble shepherds, who find the Infant Saviour cradled in a manger, while St. Matthew records the leading of wise, and apparently wealthy, men to the palace of the King, where ancient records are consulted by learned men. So in the very first chapters of the Gospels we meet a Saviour for the poor, and for the wealthy; for the ignorant and for the learned; for the humble, and for the majestic.

It was natural that in the early days of the Church the birthday of Jesus should have been more or less ignored, and the illumination of His baptism emphasized, because all around the early Church was the setting of the Roman Empire, with the Emperor as a semi-god, his birthday being a legal holiday, and a great religious and civic festival. It might be expected, too, that a Church so largely made up of Gentile converts would stress every incident that demonstrated a Saviour for all mankind, in opposition to and contrast with the narrow view of the Judaizing Christians, who so bitterly opposed the breadth of Paul's message to all the world.

No incident of our Saviour's life has lent itself more readily to legend and fanciful traditions than the coming of the Wise Men out of the East.

According to a recent book by a native of Kurdistan (ancient Assyria), a tradition there asserts that these seekers after truth came from that country, and were inspired by a prophecy of Zoroaster made in the seventh century B. C. It is held that this ancient Persian mystic retired from the world at an early age, and while living alone in a cave, received a Divine vision that unfolded to him great spiritual principles. A part of the prophecy subsequently put forth by him as revealed through these visions was, that from the East there should one day go forth Wise Men, members of the priestly cast among his followers who should be guided by Divine light "to that great One who was the ruler of the powers of the world".

In any case, the celebration of the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles, of the wonders of His baptism, and the evidence of His control of such elements as water and food, make a fitting background for the renewed preaching of His Word, that will take place by the organized prosecution of the plans for the Bishops' Crusade, through which it is hoped that the whole Church will feel the power of a great spiritual awakening that will produce new manifestations of its vitality today.

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

TIMELESSNESS

By the Rev. George Craig Stewart, D. D.

"One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."—2 Peter 3:8.

I SPEAK on the timelessness of the life of God, and of the timelessness of the life of the soul as united to the life of God. For when one comes to New Year's Day, as Charles Lamb once remarked, "it is impossible to disregard it". What shall a greeting and a message for the New Year be? A review of the past year or years? God forbid! As Carl Sandberg says—

"The past is a bucket of ashes,
I tell you yesterday is a wind gone down, a sun dropped in the West,
I tell you there is nothing in the world but an ocean of tomorrows—
A sky full of tomorrows."

I want to speak of the great mystery involved in the question of time.

"Some there are, great, thoughtless, active souls,
Can use the volvant circle of the year
Like a child's hoop, and flog it gleefully
Along the downward slope of busy days.

Some other thoughtful people are bound to probe this question:

"As a man tongues a tender concave tooth—
And see—all men bear this secret cicatrix,
This navel mark where we were ligatured
To great Eternity: and so they have
This knot of Time-sense in their angry hearts."

I.

I want to consider this thing called "time" in which you and I are snared. Once, when I was at Williams College sitting in the lounge, I took up a book on Geology and the first thing I saw was this figure: A foot represents a year; fifty feet, or a house lot, represents a man's life; a mile represents history, and all that we know of the past; and a geological age is twenty-five thousand miles, or the circumference of the earth.

A foot equals a year;
Fifty feet, a lifetime;
A mile, history;
Twenty-five thousand miles, the geological age of the earth.

We are but living in the dawn of this world's life. Away beyond us, so scientists tell us, stretch not thousands but millions of years. Think of it! On this earth will be living, if not creatures of our kind, something that evolves out of our kind, perhaps a superior kind, living here, creatures related to us—our blood in them, our lives somehow contributed to them—and they will be putting up a valiant and more or less futile fight to overcome and stay the inevitable forces of nature which finally will whirl the whole world into the abyss. Looking forward into the future, I cannot help being struck with time gorging away on nations and generations of nations—

"Thou hast devoured mammoth and mastodon,
And many a floating bank of fangs,
The scaly scourages of thy primal brine,
And the tower-crested plesiosaure.
Thou fillest thy mouth with nations, gorgest slow
On purple aeons of kings; man's hulking towers
Are carcase for thee, and to modern sun
Disglutt'st their splintered bones;
Rabble of Pharaohs and Arsacidae
Keep their cold house within thee: thou hast sucked down
How many Ninevahs and Hecatompyloi,
And buried cities whose great phantasmata
O'erbrow the silent citizens of Dis."

And I look forward into the future and I laugh—I am amused because I can see what is going to happen to you and me. You and I are going to become myths and legends. Why, the time will come of course, and inevitably, when with great difficulty the average person will be able to distinguish between Abraham of Ur of the Chaldees and Abraham of Springfield, Ill., between Ulysses of Ithaca and Ulysses of Galena, between the Coliseum of Rome and Coliseum of Chicago, between those who lived in far off days and we who live now. Things will be brought up close together, and in the long vista of time what difference will a few thousand years make? I shall be, what I have always longed to be, a contemporary of Hector and Priam, of wrathful Achilles and tawny-haired Menelaus. No one will know but that I was with that Jason on his quest for the golden fleece. And you and I will be figured among those who sat listening to the Delphic Oracle. That is not all.

This fantastic humorous thing called Time will force us back still farther. Doubtless they will scrape ledges to find traces of our vaunted civilization, and endow expeditions to seek out our thigh-bones and jaws—and they will make, as scientists do, mistakes of a few million years—and identify the flapper of today with her sister of the Mousterian age, confuse you and me with Pithecanthropus Erectus, our dear distant ancestor; we shall be play-fellows of the dinosaur and the moa: we shall turn out to be, we braggart twentieth centurians, mere trilobites and troglydytes.

And yet, when I think of this whole thing, I say, What of it? I am inclined to question this whole reality of time and whether it exists at all. I am inclined, like every other thinking person, to say, Time is the convenient method of noting subjectively certain recurrent motions in space. I watch and I see in space certain movements which recur again. It is that which gives me my idea of time.

But I am not so sure about the existence of time. Let me ask you something? Is the past existent? You say, No! Is the future existent? No! Well, what is existent? The present! But what is the present! The moment I begin to try and reach out to grasp the present it is gone. The very words that I speak are gone. I make a gesture to grasp it and the gesture belongs to the past. The very glance of my eye is gone as I make it. The sound of my voice is gone immediately, never to return again. I am inclined to think that this thing called "present", this sudden flash, this little instant of consciousness, is pretty much made up out of an echo from the past and a signal from the future, and what we call the "present", so far as I can judge from my own consciousness, is but a flavor of that which was (an echo) and an apprehension of that which is to be and is not yet, and these two coming together make the little circle of consciousness called present—a little lighted flash between two dark eternities. The timelessness there in you and me is in the life of God—the indifference to this thing called time, superiority to it, so that I think about it, analyze it, look at it, disregard it, consider myself greatly above it. "A thousand years is with the Lord as one day"—I think I can understand a little of that. I want to give you, at the risk of seeming to be dull, a little illustration from chemistry. You all took chemistry at school, and even if you have just a simple knowledge of chemistry, you know that a molecule of water means the coming together of two atoms of hydrogen and one atom of oxygen. Now when these atoms come together they come at a rate of four miles a second—but they do not hit; they graze each other as a comet grazes the sun, and go whirling round and round each other three million million times a second. Now think of it! Three million million times—and that makes three million million atomic years—if you will allow the expression; thus a second of our time is worth three million million atomic years. And there is going on in that little molecule of water in an atomic year just what is going on on this earth in what we call a year. Three million million years of our cosmic circling would seem a tremendous time, but it is no longer surely in the life of God than an atomic year is in our life. If, for instance, I had to live on that atom of oxygen, I would look upon its movement with practical indifference, and should not consider that there was anything great or extensive or catastrophic going on. So living on this earth I say, What is it all about? But to God, to whom a billion years seem but a second, the whole mighty universe must appear to be in the throes of a swift catastrophe which completes itself instantly. Man, with his empires and cities, to Him, Who inhabiteth eternity, seem but a momentary appearance, arising suddenly in the never-ending whirling abyss of time and then vanishing forever.

I realize, too, certain timeless elements in man's life. I can only mention a couple—one is imagination! Did you ever stop to think that your imagination travels a great deal faster than even light, which travels at one hundred and eighty-six thousand miles a second? I stand in my place here and, without moving, in an instant I am in London; I am in Paris; I am in New York. Who is that old man sitting there in his garden at Lausanne? Gibbon! Gibbon in Lausanne? Oh, no! Gibbon is in Rome a thousand, fifteen hundred, two thousand, years ago! His imagination is indifferent to time—centuries untold are rolled back. Or Mr. H. G. Wells sitting in his study by sheer imagination forecasts the future. Or Mr. Bernard Shaw by sheer imagination, in his book—Back to Methuselah—forecasts that invention which has been recorded in the papers.

Another thing I notice which marks you and me as superior to time and unites us to the Life of God, and that is our emotional life. You ask a mother who loves her child devotedly about this question of time. She sits all the night through and she holds in her arms her sick child, watching it intently, and you say to her, What patience! sitting here five hours watching that child. How do you stand it? Five hours! It doesn't seem like five hours to me! A person is watching down the railroad track for the train bringing some loved one, and time spreads out and out and out, lengthens until it becomes unendurable; a loved one is going away. My! how time speeds! Oh, time, if you will only wait! But it is gone before you know it. I say emotion, especially in the field of love, bears us above time, beyond time.

You say, Why don't you preach on something practical? We are tired business men, why do you talk to us about metaphysics? Give us something practical. But I tell you this is practical; it is important. You have a soul, an immortal soul, which is eternal, not temporal. Your spirit is not in time, but in eternity. We are not living here as animals merely; we are above the animals. We are eternal souls, and eternity is written in our hearts. I don't know of anything more important. Men! Don't make the mistake of thinking that time is money. Don't say, I must get money; time is money. Time is not money, or the getting of money. Let me give you this little verse by Christopher Morley—

"I who all my life had hurried
Came to Peter's crowded gate,
And as usual was worried,
Fearing that I might be late.
So when I began to jostle
(I forgot that I was dead),
Patient, smiled the old apostle,
Take your Eternity, he said."

Take your eternity! Time—Time is for apes and dogs; men live forever. We do not belong merely to time; we belong to eternity. When I read the New Testament I find they are indifferent to chronology; dates are nothing to them; they don't date their letters; they don't even tell you when Christ was born. Everybody acknowledges December 25 is inaccurate; it is as near as they could get. They don't care anything about dates nor about new years. What they are talking about is always a new life, a new man; putting off not the old year, but the old man; putting on not the new year, but the new man; renewing your minds. They are concerned with eternal and spiritual values, and these don't belong to time at all. So my greetings to you in the New Year is this—you belong to eternity! There be some people that are doing time: and some people who are killing time; and some people who are wasting time; the Christian's privilege is to improve time, in developing the eternal values within him which may be developed in time, so that he may be more fitted to carry on the great purposes of God in life within time and space. I want to give you this very simple prayer which Lecky wrote in his journal on the last day of the year 1868. It is the prayer of the old Breton sailors—

"Mon Dieu, Mon Dieu, aidez-moi, car le mer est si grand, et ma marque est si petite."

Help me, oh God, for the sea is so vast and my little boat is so very frail. And I hear Jesus saying, "Fear not! Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the ages of the ages—eis ton aionion—in saecula saeculorum."

THE BISHOP'S CRUSADE

By the Right Reverend Charles Henry Brent, D. D.

The object of the Crusade is to lift the whole level of Church life to a higher plane. This is a simple statement, but to achieve what it advocates will require the sustained effort of the entire Church. It is easy enough to stir people to exceptional effort, for a period of a week or two weeks. That, however, is exactly what we want to avoid. Our desire is to set a new pace that will be continued year in and year out. In many instances it will call for a thorough-going moral conversion on the part of those participating. In other instances, it will mean a completely new spiritual outlook. In still others, it will mean a broadening of moral, spiritual and social horizons. Therefore, we Crusaders must avoid anything that will tend to merely momentary emotion and must place all that we do upon a solid foundation, such as will endure the test of time and experience.

Today there is a great breach between our professions as Christians and our practice. We are so accustomed to use idealistic language that it has lost its force, in that we do not square our lives or even attempt to square our lives, with the lofty expressions of the ideal. Creed and character are so closely wrought that one cannot live without the other. Sunday religion is altogether too prominent in our religious life. While business ethics are improving, the Christian man must deliberately set himself to discover what is the Christian way of life in business. The politician must find out what is the Christian way of life in his political responsibilities. So with the professional man. The citizen, in all his relations with the nation, must bring to bear the teaching of Christ on his conception of his own nation and its relations to other nations. This is equally true relative to our domestic affairs.

I might go on until I had exhausted every department and phase of life. Unless our Christian belief shapes itself in Christian action, we cannot possibly create that body of "peculiar people who stand distinct as expressing the Christ's mind in the world". Our religion is a corporate thing, and it cannot be real unless it is made so in fact.

Now, all this indicates that in our preparation there must be continually kept in mind the permanence of the place to which we are endeavoring to rise. It must be impressed on the clergy that they are setting a new pace for the flock, and that there may be no abatement after the days of the Crusade lest our last state be worse than our first. I wish I had the tongue of angels to make this so definite, impressive and compelling as to burn up the souls of all Crusaders and all the people of the Church with the consuming desire to rediscover the Christian way of life for every moment of time. Conventions must be disregarded, customs scrutinized, traditions reviewed. Anything that is discovered that may be contrary to the way of Jesus Christ must be sacrificed and offered as a burnt offering.

CHURCH FINANCE

Some one perpetrated a fearful new word the other day, viewing with alarm the financialization of the Church. As with many new words, the meaning is not perfectly clear, and may be good or bad.

The wrong kind of "financialization" would mean that finance had become an end in itself and that every one viewed the getting and spending of money as the whole duty of every parish and Diocese and the National Council. Such an idea is too absurd to be worth repudiating.

The right kind of financialization is based on the sacramental principle, which knows that all matter is an instrument of spirit, and which sees money as a material means for carrying out spiritual purposes.

It follows that every Churchman, every Church treasurer, and the Church as a whole wants to use the best possible methods to accomplish these purposes. The Church accordingly has long since established its Board of Church Finance. The General Convention of 1913 appointed a Commission on Business Methods in the Church, which was charged "to examine the present business methods throughout the Church and to promote the establishment of modern systems". This Commission was "especially instructed to urge uniform systems of parish accounts" and "the annual auditing of all persons in the Church who handle funds received for its support, extension, charities and organizations".

The Board has made many suggestions in its reports, all of which have been unanimously adopted by the General Convention.

Financial Reforms Established by Canon.

1. Making a uniform fiscal year beginning January 1.
2. Requiring reports from Dioceses and parishes to be made on uniform blanks, and more complete details of conditions.
3. Requiring at the close of each year the auditing of all accounts "having to do with the receipts, expenditure or investments of money of all Church organizations".
4. Requiring the creation by each Diocesan Convention or Convocation of a Finance Committee and specifying its duties.
5. Requiring the custodians of all trust funds and permanent funds for Church purposes to deposit the same in trust with some trust company or bank.
6. Requiring the Finance Committee to "act as advisor of the Bishop in financial matters; and upon request as advisor to individual parishes".
7. Requiring adequate insurance on all Church property.
8. Requiring that the Budget System be introduced into all parishes.

Resolutions adopted by General Convention have authorized and urged the use of a uniform Parish Cash Book, which is now in its fourth edition, and have made other suggestions and recommendations, which may be read in the triennial report of the Board of Church Finance (obtainable from that Board at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York). This includes sample pages of the Cash Book.

The Parish Cash Book is no longer an experiment. The auditing of accounts is perhaps the item to which there is least response. The deposit of trust funds with some national bank or trust company is slowly but steadily increasing. It is difficult to understand the attitude of the Dioceses and Districts in not protecting funds for which they are trustees. The lack of care cannot help but influence the minds and the intentions of people who may be in position to assist in the establishment of permanent funds of the Dioceses and of the General Church. It is as unfair as it is unwise to leave trust funds in the hands of a committee where usually one man acts for the whole.

Concerning insurance, we go on year after year burning up our churches through carelessness and neglect only to find that the property is quite inadequately insured, resulting in the direct loss to the parishes and Dioceses of hundreds of thousands of dollars. It is of supreme importance that the vestry, whose responsibility it is to protect the property, sees to it that the property is adequately covered by insurance. So important is this matter that there is a pamphlet issued treating on "Church Fire Insurance".

The success or lack of success of the operation of the Canons and the resolutions of General Convention are very largely dependent upon the activities of the Diocesan Committee. It is distressing to learn from time to time that the Diocesan Committees are entirely inoperative. There is much for these committees to do.

The Board has called attention to the importance of using an adequate system in counting offerings. The moment an offering is dropped on the plate the parish becomes trustee for it. Every penny must be protected to insure its safety and right expenditure. General Convention by resolution recommends to every Diocese and Missionary District "that rules for counting offerings be established". The rule should be that two men shall count the offering and a record of the result filed. One of them at least should be a member of the vestry. The cash should be deposited in the bank on the following morning.

The Board invites the Diocesan Finance Committees and parish treasurers or rectors to correspond with it concerning financial methods and problems, and will do all in its power to assist, gladly giving the benefit of its experience and knowledge of the different Diocesan operations to solve whatever problems there may be, and in so doing better understanding can be had which will result in more uniform methods of operation. The secretary is Mr. Charles A. Tompkins, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

BREADTH.

Mr. Editor:

On the cover of your issue for December 11 you ask the question, "Is our Church drifting towards Rome"? and answer it, "Many think so".

I am very young in the ranks of the clergy, hardly a fledgling as yet, with scarce a year's parochial experience behind me. There are others like me, many of us, just beginning, hardly worthy of an opinion; but we have recently been students (if not scholars); have already read our theology and our Church history and drawn our inferences from them, and upon these inferences we shall build our ministry. And upon the outcome of our ministry will depend the future of our Church. The younger generation of clergymen, of whom I number myself the least, come to their tasks not without having formed opinions in regard to the Church in which they have elected to take orders; so, in stating my own, I do so feeling that I have some ground for so doing, and feeling also that my own convictions voice the opinion of many of my own generation in the cloth.

Those who hold a like mind with me are not afraid that the Anglican Church will ever become Roman through the introduction into and use in Anglican churches of Roman terminology or ritual. Anglo-Catholics are turned into Romanists, not by any multiplicity of vestments or of ritual, not by the use of the term "mass", nor by the "reserved sacrament", nor by the practice of "confession", nor by any other "Catholic" or "Roman" practice; but rather, if you will allow me, by the, to them, dreadful conviction that their Church is not after all really Catholic, and the consequent belief that they must go to Rome to get such a Church. It is not that they love Rome, but that they must have—their very faith demands for its existence that they have—a really Catholic Church. If you will pardon such a statement from one whose experience is limited, it does seem (and although rather a "low churchman" myself, I have many rather "high church" friends, and know very well how they feel about it) that the easiest way in the world to cause a "drift", not only "towards", but actually into Rome, of quite a large party in our Church, is to keep on insisting that our Church is not Catholic, until some who should know better really begin to believe it. If the editors of the Southern Churchman would subscribe for a few weeks to a certain periodical called "Truth", published by the "International Catholic Truth Society", they would learn, after reading one or two lessons, I believe, that the Roman Church is more bitterly opposed to the Anglo-Catholic movement, and more afraid of it, than even the editors of the Southern Churchman are—more afraid of it than of any other religious movement in the world today. The "why of this is not hard to find. Anglo-Catholicism is the world's best weapon against Romanism. I have a friend who is rector of a church in Washington, D. C., who with the two and a half years of his encumbency there has added more than thirty names of former Romanists to his church rolls. Now, if you want these thirty-odd to go back to Rome, and to do so in a hurry, all you have to do is to convince them that the Episcopal Church is not "Catholic". Personally, I believe that my Church is more Catholic than Rome, because in it I can be a fairly low churchman, and in it my friend can be a fairly high churchman, at the same time, each recognizing the validity of the other's orders, and his "right to be", each paying undying allegiance to the same glorious old Church, which has come down to us from the apostles themselves, who had the germ of it entrusted to them by our Lord Himself—the Church of the Creeds, the Councils, the Saints—One, Holy, Catholic and Apostolic—but not Roman.

PESSIMISTIC.

Mr. Editor:

In view of the clear teaching of Scripture and the accepted faith of the Christian Church through the centuries, as expressed in the Nicene Creed in the words, "And He shall come again with glory", etc., it is distressing and amazing to find The Southern Churchman in its editorial of December 11, riddling this precious doctrine of the Second Coming of Christ. Granting that the truth has been abused, and what truth has not?, we must absolutely junk the Bible if we accept the following paragraph in that editorial: "Until the present the expectation has been that Our Saviour would return as He first came in His individual personality. Now a new and larger idea is beginning to dawn in the minds of thinking people. May not the Spirit of Christ rather than His person return and appear in the widespread and gradual universal acceptance of His standards of life?" In answer to this we say, "To the law and to the testimony if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them". There is not a line of Scripture to support such a view. We ought to become accustomed to hearing the Bible contradicted; but some of us still prove all things by it even as Christ, Who often said, "Have you never read what the Scriptures say"; but did not appeal to the thinking minds of the day to establish truth. There are many today who spiritualize the resurrection, and yet Our Lord said to disciples, "Handle Me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have". Well, then, as He ascended it was said, "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven SHALL SO COME IN LIKE MANNER as ye have seen Him go into heaven". If language means anything, that means that the same, personal, visible Lord Jesus Who ascended is to return. He went up with His resurrection body and He will come back with it. Zechariah says, "His feet shall stand on the Mount of Olives". Furthermore, the word for, "come", in the Greek is the same word that Paul uses for the "coming of Stephanas". If Jesus' Spirit rose it would not be a resurrection. So likewise if Jesus comes back spiritually, it would not be His return and what becomes of the language: "they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory".

While it is true that the Church is a part of the Kingdom, we cannot have the latter in the fullest sense without Him. Christ has gone to receive for Himself a Kingdom and to return. When He said the Kingdom of God is within you, He was speaking to wicked Pharisees and the proper translation really is, "In the midst of you". The King was present then. The early Church, the early fathers, and the purest branch of the Church in all its history has held the truth of the personal, visible, return of the Lord to inaugurate His Kingdom. The fact is, the Roman Church dislikes the truth of the Second Coming of Christ and has been the leader in influencing the world to disregard it. It naturally follows that if we suppress Scripture we must suppress this truth. So far from having a tendency to make star gazers of people, referring to the history of missions, such deeply spiritual movements as the Waldenses held the pre-millennial faith, also the Paulicians the Cathari, the reformers, Ridley, Latimer, Cramner, the Moravians, Wesley, and the great majority of evangelists and missionaries have held this view. The English Church has always held it and, until these days of tampering with the Bible, our beautiful prayer for missions expressed the very sinews of the missionary impulse in the words "accomplish the number of Thine elect and hasten Thy Kingdom". That ought to be foremost in the Crusade to put evangelism in the Church. Do you want a warless world and righteousness established? Then win souls for Christ, for when the elect number is made up, the Prince of Peace will come. Nobody who is true to Scrapture ever sets dates for this. But why be watchful for a process? Why the catastrophic events to precede His return, if the Church is to bring in the Kingdom without the return of the Lord, if this gradual, evolutionary, conquest of the evil, and triumph of the good is going on? A Church intended to be kept holy, by watching for an absent Lord, has grown weary of waiting and forgotten Him, as they settle down in the world to mend its broken order, no longer sitting as a widow, but satisfied that she is rich and increased with goods, etc., and ignorant like the Church of Laodicea of her need of eye salve. As when Moses was on the Mount, the people sat down to eat and drink and rose up to play, even to the point of most licentious dances.

We, too, believe that there are signs of the near return of the Lord and among them is the very apostate condition of the Church brought about largely by forgetting the second coming of Our Lord and Saviour. We throw up the sponge, if the work and influence of the Church in the world today is such as to give us hope for the coming of the Kingdom. We have just emerged from the spectacle of the whole world under arms. Now Lloyd George says unless a change is brought about civilization will be annihilated. Reliable authorities say that Europe is trembling for fear of another war. Some interpret the second and third vials in the Book of Revelation to mean a seal of blood, and the agencies now used for wealth and prosperity turned to agencies of destruction.

A society has been formed in New York for propagating atheism. Cults and isms denying the truth of God's Word abound and flourish to an alarming degree. Murders are increasing to such an extent that Chicago has to appeal to the Government for protection. A million are being maimed by automobiles every year. One in four marriages in many places ends in divorce, and there is a looseness in morals to such an extent that reputable authorities are practically advocating free love and jungle morals. Fred Smith, who has been over the world in the interest of world peace, said in Richmond that the outlook was most discouraging, and quoted authorities in England as saying God only knows what is going to happen. The sea and the waves are roaring. In five years it is predicted that China will be Red. Signs multiply of a great world conflict between the white and dark skin peoples. Such nostrums as the League and World Court are as likely to bring peace as a conference of wild beasts where they would mutually resolve to do away with claws and extract teeth, as Philip Mauro says. "Watchman, what of the night". The only hope is the coming of Christ and we should be "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ". "Even so come Lord Jesus."

We close with the beautiful lines of Dean Alford:

"They tell me that some have heard the mighty chariot wheels
Roar in the distance; that the world's salt tears
Are cleaving their last furrows in her cheeks.
It may be so— I know not.
Oft the ear attent and eager for some coming friend,
Construes each breeze among the vocal boughs
Into the tokens of His wished approach.
But this I know: He liveth and shall stand
Upon this earth; and round Him, thick as waves
That laugh at noon with light,
Uncounted hosts of His redeemed.
O dawn millennial day! Come blessed morn!
Appeal, Desire of Nations! Rend Thy heavens
And stand revealed upon Thy chosen hill."

THE ORDER OF JAMESTOWN.

Mr. Editor:

I wonder if the "shut-ins", the isolated, or those who for any cause whatever are cut off from active participation in the work of their church, realize what a help and comfort belonging to the "Order of Jamestown" might be to them?

Perhaps many such already belong. I do not know. But to those who do not, I would like to speak. The cards of remembrance from time to time keep the idea for which the society stands before you; the birthday greeting gives the personal touch so often missed in these busy days, and often so sorely needed, particularly among those in the classes named. It warms the heart and gives a wonderful sense of unity to feel linked by sympathy with those who are banded together for a very worthy purpose. What member of the "Order", however distant, who did not feel a thrill when reading of the presentation of a brick from the old church at Jamestown to the Washington Cathedral during the Bishop of London's visit?

May the "Order" help more and more to keep alive in the hearts of its members the ideals for which our beloved Church has stood in the past until she comes to a more glorious vision for the future of rededication to Jesus Christ in life and service.

Such is the earnest hope of one who has a very warm place in her heart for the "Order of Jamestown".

CHRISTIANITY AND THE COMMUNITY

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

CHRISTMAS IN THE INSTITUTIONS.

Every day is a busy one in City Mission work, but, as with everything else, Christmas brings a special opportunity for offering the call of Christ to inmates of institutions, of serving these good people.

The following early report from New York is typical of what has been done on a greater or less scale throughout the country wherever there is a City Missionary Society:

For the great host of sick and troubled in city institutions to whom chaplains of the New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society minister, Christmas services at bedsides and in chapels were conducted throughout the holiday week-end. A distribution of fruit, tobacco and special remembrances were made as a result of gifts made by friends of the organization.

Thirty-three hundred packages of smoking tobacco, seven hundred and sixty packages of cigarettes, ninety-one hundred oranges, and two thousand eight hundred and twenty pounds of hard candy and chocolates were provided through City Mission friends for distribution by the chaplains. Nine hundred yards of roping and greens, one hundred wreaths and thirty Christmas trees were sent out from the City Mission headquarters to chapels in hospitals and prisons. To dependent families of patients and prisoners being served through the Social Service Department a hundred dinners were provided on Christmas Day.

Over at the City Home on Welfare Island, Chaplain Sydney N. Ussher celebrated Holy Communion at 9:30 for the old people who were able to attend chapel services. Among special gifts he distributed, with the assistance of Miss Jane S. Manahan, social worker, were one thousand warm scarfs for the old ladies made by the young women of St. Thomas' Church. Hundreds of aprons, comfort bags and bloomers were also provided through this group and others, including the Young Married Women's Society at the Chapel of the Incarnation. More than one thousand pair of gloves were distributed by Chaplain Ussher to the old men who are able to leave the wards.

At the Tombs, where Chaplain Joseph H. Ivie officiates, Holy Communion was celebrated on Christmas Day. Beginning with the Advent season, Chaplain Ivie prepares for baptism. Last year on Christmas Day, out of seventy-five inmates of the Tombs who attended his service, sixty-four made their communion.

At Metropolitan Hospital, on Welfare Island, where Chaplain Herbert C. Dana is in residence, there was a midnight service on Christmas Eve, beginning at 11:30 P. M. with celebration of Holy Communion and carol singing. For the service many tubercular patients received special permission to leave the wards. On Christmas morning Chaplain Dana celebrated Holy Communion at 8:30. For the children of Metropolitan Hospital, many of whom are suffering from acute bone diseases and chronic skin affections, there was a distribution of toys, gifts made by the children of Christ Church, Rye, to their manger service held earlier in the week.

An interesting carol service for the old people in St. Luke's Home for Aged Women occurred at 6:30 P. M. in the chapel on Christmas Eve, when Chaplain Lyman P. McDonald, D. D., officiated. Immediately after the service the Board of St. Luke's Home tendered a Christmas tree program and distribution of gifts to the home members. Chaplain McDonald celebrated communion on Christmas morning at 7:15 and 10 in the chapel, with private communions in the rooms for shut-ins.

At the Home for Old Men and Aged Couples, Dr. McDonald held a Christmas service at 9.

At Bedford Reformatory, Chaplain Annesley T. Young gave a special illustrated lecture on the Life of Christ on Christmas Eve and distributed special pound boxes of chocolates and Christmas cards to every girl, three hundred and sixty in number, regardless of race or creed. For the young mothers whose babies are in the nursery he distributed pink and blue baby blankets, provided through women of Grace Church, White Plains, and other interested friends. He will distribute all-wool sweaters to all men walking-patients at Riverside Hospital, as the result of a gift from the New York Altar Guild. On Christmas Day, Chaplain Young visited every dormitory and ward at Riker's Island, Riverside Hospital and Bedford Reformatory, holding chapel services in each institution and the celebration of Holy Communion. On Sunday he again held the regular services in these three institutions and celebrated Holy Communion at Bedford Reformatory on Monday morning.

In the City Mission Society's own chapels there was a special midnight service on Christmas Eve at the Italian Church of San Salvatore, 359 Broome Street, beginning at 11:15 with a carol service, and celebration of the midnight Eucharist and a midnight service at St. Barnabas' House, 304 Mulberry Street, at 11:45.

On Christmas Day, Holy Communion was celebrated at 9:30 and 11 at the Church of San Salvatore, and at 9 A. M. at St. Barnabas' House, for the women and children temporarily sheltered there.

At St. Cyprian's Colored Church, 173 West Sixty-third Street, the Rev. John W. Johnson and the Rev. John H. Johnson celebrated Holy Communion at 6, 8 and 11, and held a special service for children on December 26 at 8 o'clock. A special Christmas tree celebration for the children and their parents occurred on December 30 at 3 o'clock and for the older children in the evening at 8 o'clock.

CONSTRUCTIVE MISSION WORK.

We are glad to use on this page the account of Archdeacon Baskerville's work in South Carolina, which has the hearty approval of Bishop Guerry.

While in a sense it is local, being confined to one Diocese, yet we feel that the example of his efforts and the inspiration of his accomplishments is a large factor in Christianizing the community throughout the country.

After thanking his supporters at home, the Archdeacon writes:

"During the year we have had two severe setbacks: The loss by fire of Redeemer School House, Pineville, and the extremely low price of cotton.

"To maintain and extend our program of educational, industrial and religious work during the year of 1927, we must look to our friends within and without the Diocese for financial support. While our people, as a whole, are faithful and are making sacrifices in supporting the work, the load is too heavy for them to carry alone.

"Our schools and missions, for the most part, are among the country people in the very heart of the Black Belt in South Carolina, where the need of educational and religious training is tremendous.

"In our schools we are rendering a great service. We are taking the lead in doing what the public school system is not able to do at present, and the county authorities heartily approve our work. These schools are imperative. We are endeavoring to give a training of the head, of the hand and of the heart, which will make good citizens and not misfits.

"Furthermore, our mission schools are greatly needed to furnish leaders among our people in the country districts and also to furnish students for Voorhees School, Denmark, S. C., and for other schools for the training of leaders. The growth of our Church in the South will depend upon the reaching of the masses and giving them secular and religious training in keeping with the standards of the Church.

"To continue our program of development, we are in crying need of money for salaries for missionaries, nurses and industrial teachers, and to erect church and school buildings. Funds are also needed for rectories for Sumter and Summerville.

"The list of some of our most urgent needs follows:

$10,000	for salaries for industrial teachers, missionaries and maintaining and extending the work.
4,000	for four experienced trained nurses to work in the rural districts. One is at work.
3,000	for a rectory for Sumter.
1,000	towards rectory for Summerville.

6,000 for church building for Orangeburg (college center).
2,500 for church building on Edisto Island.
1,000 for scholarships for deserving and needy students.
1,000 toward equipment for mission schools.

"Please send whatever you may give to this urgent and most deserving mission work to E. L. Baskervill, Archdeacon, 54 Bogard Street, Charleston, S. C., or to Bishop William A. Guerry, 195 Broad Street, Charleston, S. C.

"Thanking you in advance for whatever you may send, and with deepest gratitude for past favors, I am,

Very gratefully yours,
E. L. BASKERVILL,
Archdeacon."

The Great Commission

TO THE WOMEN OF THE CHURCH.

Last May, when I reached America, I began at once to talk building plans. I had left 625 girls crowded into twelve class-rooms. These 625 girls had no gymnasium of any kind. Two class-rooms served as a standing-room only assembly hall. The library was jammed into the teachers' room, where forty patient teachers were already cramped for space. The growing music department was pushing its practice pianos into every available corner and Chinese classes had frequently to be taught to an accompaniment of Handel's Largo, or something equally uncongenial. It was quite unbearable. I knew that you would not want such conditions to continue in a school with as wide and fine an influence as St. Agnes'. The new academic building to contain gymnasium, assembly hall, library, teachers' room, practice rooms and class-rooms must be built at the earliest possible date.

This was the cry of all the teachers and pupils of St. Agnes' as I left. The cry was heard and felt on this side. Now I am going back. Plans are made—such beautiful plans. I wish you could all see them. Fifty thousand dollars of the necessary $75,000 is in hand. I am assured by Mrs. Robert Burkham, chairman, that $15,000 of the $25,000 of the Corporate Gift will be available by the first of the year. Will you not? Can you not let the other $10,000 come on out in the very near future? Those 625 Japanese girls of ours are awaiting my return with the eager question, "When can we begin to build"? Shall I answer, "Right away—now", and hear a shout of joy and thanksgiving? Or must I say, "I don't know—we must wait", and hear only a silence and see that sea of eager faces covered with disappointment?

It has been a joyful furlough. Your enthusiastic interest is like a great treasure house from which comes and will come during the next five years the blessing of your intelligent prayers. Then you here and we there shall surely be blessed with the infinite love and guidance of God the Father of us all.

With joyful gratitude,

Faithfully yours,
(Signed) HALLIE R. WILLIAMS,
Headmistress of St. Agnes' School, Kyoto, Japan.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS TO IMMIGRANTS.

Five hundred English immigrants have received from the Presiding Bishop a letter of Christmas greetings. These are Anglican Churchmen who have landed in America during 1926 and, through the follow-up card system of the Foreign-Born Americans Division, have been passed on to our clergy, called on by them, and definitely attached to their parishes. There are of course a large number of others in like state, but the five hundred are those of whose conditions and addresses our office is sure. This efficient system was brought about and is under the charge of Mr. Raymond E. Cole, of the New York City Mission Society.

Bishop Murray has also sent Christmas greetings to the chief Bishops of the ancient Eastern Churches of Europe and the Near East, the Patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch and Jerusalem, the Primates of the Armenian, Syrian Jacobite and Nestorian Churches, and of the various National Churches, Greek, Roumanian, etc.

CHINESE AUXILIARY WORK.

The Chinese Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Kiangsu (Shanghai), at its annual fall meeting, received reports from twenty-five branches, with two hundred and sixty-five delegates on the roll call. The offering for the year amounted to $1,180.02, the expenditure of which was voted as follows:

To the Board of Missions of the General Synod of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui for its work in Shensi	$450.00
To St. Luke's Hospital in memory of Mrs. Pott	60.00
To St. Andrew's Hospital in memory of Mrs. Yen	60.00
To apportionment of this Diocese toward the expenses of the Woman's Missionary Band of the Chung Hut Sheng Kung Hui	50.00
Toward the expenses of the delegates to the Triennial of the Woman's Missionary Band of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui	50.00
Foochow in May, 1927	100.00
To the United Thank Offering in the United States.	25.00
To the Treasurer for current expenses	47.20
The amount remaining after deducting the above was given for the work of the Diocesan Board of Missions, at Punchen and Quinsan	387.82

BETTER EQUIPMENT NEEDED AT WINSLOW, ARK.

The chief probation officer of Arkansas writes of our Church School at Winslow: "I took a young girl to the Dunlap Memorial School at Winslow. She was a very fine child who had been denied many of the privileges due children. Your Episcopal School offered her the training and the chance so long denied her. I found the Rev. and Mrs. W. S. Simpson-Atmore exceedingly charming and cultured people, but the buildings need repair and they need new furnishings very, very much. When I thought of the personal sacrifice that the Rev. and Mrs. W. S. Simpson-Atmore are making, and how they are struggling to give our Arkansas children an education and an appreciation of the fine things of life, it made me heartsick to think the Episcopalians do not stand behind their school better. It seems to me that the Church owes these people, who are giving their lives for our children, at least a decent building and equipment. . . . It is an Arkansas School and the Episcopal Church's School. As such it should be adequately financed and equipped."

JAPANESE CHURCH PUBLISHING SOCIETY.

The Bishops have appointed the Rev. R. D. M. Shaw, of the English District of South Tokyo, manager of the Church Publishing Society, in the place of the late Dr. Correll. Mr. Shaw has been managing the society ever since Dr. Correll left Japan, in the summer of 1925, and has proved himself so capable in the work that it is a satisfaction to all interested to know that it will continue to be under the same able management. Its work daily grows in importance, and in the demands upon the time of the manager. It is hoped that the Church at large will realize this more and more, and extend the help necessary to make it successful.—The Church in Japan.

FOR THE EPIPHANY SEASON.

As some one has remarked, life would be queer without wrapping paper. We are accustomed to Epiphany manger services, where neatly wrapped parcels are piled by the manger to be sent to far-away mission fields in time for the following Christmas. At Vevey, Switzerland, the chaplain of the English Colony each winter brings his people together at Christmas time for a somewhat similar purpose, but instead of a service in the church, the meeting takes place in an ordinary room, and the gifts, which are later sent to the children's hospital, are brought one by one by the donors and deposited, without any wrapping paper, on a table. It is a method which causes much entertainment. They all enjoy, for example, seeing a stately retired colonel march proudly up to deposit his gift of a prancing wooden horse.

THE GREAT LIFE.

If we like we can live the great life, play, as sportsmen say, "the great game". What God can do through an individual life when the vital self is in union with Him we know through the biographies of heroes and heroines of the Faith. We may see it also, in the every-day world, in the lovely though little known lives of the obscure great.

A man whose mind is set on an unworthy object comes to be in tune with it; he goes to sleep and wakes up thinking of it; the vibrations of his life are in harmony with it. But his spirit is unsatisfied; his spirit protests against the false allegiance, though he may not know it. He may call his unquiet "nerves".

Life is discordant till all parts of it are blended in one, all its energies set in one direction. Perfect harmony is achieved only by union with God. The great life is always the harmonious life. When we have been in the presence of a hero or heroine of God we come away hushed as if we had listened to beautiful music.

You must be "in tune" with something. Had it not better be with the greatest thing of all?—The Healer.

Church Intelligence

Provincial Meeting of the Social Service Commission.

An early celebration of Holy Communion Wednesday morning, December 15, in Immanuel Church, New Castle, Del., by Bishop George W. Davenport, of Easton, assisted by the Rev. Joseph H. Earp, rector of Immanuel, brought to a close the semi-annual two-day convention of the Commission on Social Service of the Province of Washington. Due to the extended and intensive business sessions, held Tuesday morning and afternoon, the work before the convention was virtually completed.

The Rev. Charles N. Lathrop, who made the concluding address at the public meeting in Immanuel parish house, said: "The reason that we have certain strong prejudices against the professional reformer is because he tries to tell us how to do the things we are doing when he never did them himself. He endeavors to pose as an expert and suggests that he is a little better than we are."

Dr. Lathrop described the basic doctrine of social service as recognition of the fact that all are children of God, and as such have a right to the full measure of life. He said that society that is going to be a Christian society must have woven into its fabric a human relationship so organized that each individual's life is a recognition of the fact that Christ underwent all His sufferings for all members of society, and it is up to the Church to see that this is brought about.

At the afternoon session Bishop Davenport, who presided at the convention; the Rev. George P. Mayo, of Charlottesville, Va., and R. D. Brown, of Philadelphia, were named on a committee to collect data and formulate general principles and policy for the guidance of the Dioceses composing the province in their social service work.

A motion was passed which created a Rural Work Council, to be composed of a clergyman from each Diocese who is actually engaged in rural work.

The formation of a contact with the rural survey embodied in the Purnell bill was suggested by the Rev. George P. Mayo. His suggestion was received by the commission. The Purnell bill has provided funds to be used by the various State agricultural colleges in gathering data on social, religious and young people's work in rural portions of the United States. The Church is in a position to give help to and receive help from a survey of this kind, conducted by the Federal Government.

In future meetings of the Provincial Commission on Social Service an invitation will be extended to the Commission on Social Service of the Diocese in which the meeting is being held to be present at part of the session. The purpose of this is to effect greater cooperation between the Provincial Commission, the Diocesan Commission and the parish for the carrying out of the social service program of the Episcopal Church.

While the Provincial Commission expressed itself in entire accord with the various secular and State agencies engaged in social service work and intends to cooperate with them, it urges all denominations to join in infusing this sort of work with the great motive force of Christianity.

The commission passed a motion offered by Rev. Thomas J. Bigham to secure uniformity in the courses in social service work laid out by the Department of Social Service Work of the Church for the training of parish leaders.

The Social Service Department of the parish was suggested as a very practical and ideal field for persons, whose desire to engage in Christian service will be engendered by the coming Bishops' Crusade.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Christmas In the National Capital.

Christmas Carols rang far and wide in Washington during the Christmas season and were heard in Church and School, pageant and community gatherings, on every side. They were of especial interest, perhaps in four places—a great community center gathering around a huge tree on government property near the White House, in which people of all the city were invited to join; a community tree in Georgetown, growing in Montrose Park and trimmed by school children; here a truly religious service of carols was held in which the singing was virtually led by children. A third carol service of beauty was heard at Epiphany Church on Sunday evening before Christmas, when the Mount Holyoke choir of ninety girl voices sang Christmas carols, some of rare origin, some used for the first time here, and all of interest and significance. Then, on the Sunday afternoon, after Christmas, the carol service at the Cathedral, drew large numbers of people, who have grown accustomed to this beautiful music as a natural part of Christmas in Washington. Carols popular, ancient, modern, foreign and American were sung by the Cathedral choir in their beautiful way, characteristic of music always heard at the Cathedral.

Window For New Church Dedicated.

A first step in the realization of the new church building for St. Columba's Parish was taken Christmas Eve when a beautiful window was dedicated immediately after services held in the temporary church building.

The window is approximately eighteen feet high. The central figure of Christ is large and majestic. The world is His footstool; about it are employed the symbols of the four evangelists, the winged man of St. Matthew, the winged ox of St. Luke, the winged lion of St. Mark and the eagle of St. John.

Rt. Rev. A. S. Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rt. Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan.

Testaments Presented City Mission Society.

Over three thousand Testaments and Diglots in practically every language were recently presented by the American Bible Society to Chaplains David Bowen and John G. Robinson of the New York Protestant Episcopal City Mission Society for use in Bellevue and Willard Parker Hospitals, and distributed in the wards. Greek, Russian, Swedish, Italian, Spanish, French, English, Chinese, German, Lithuanian, Armenian, and Esthonian are among the languages represented. This means that numbers of non-English speaking patients, many of whom are far from their native homes with no friends in this country who understand their language, may find comfort in Bibles written in their own tongue.

An Unusual Incident.

At the Church of the Heavenly Rest an unusual incident occurred on Sunday morning, December 19, when a Bishop and his three sons conducted the service.

They were the Rt. Rev. Dr. James Henry Darlington, Bishop of Harrisburg; the Rev. Gilbert Darlington, Treasurer of the American Bible Society; the Rev. Elliott Darlington, still in residence at Philadelphia Theological Seminary and the rector, the Rev. Dr. Henry V. Darlington.

UPPER SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D. Bishop.

Bishop Finlay to the Rescue.

The building of the Fairwold Industrial School for Delinquent Negro Girls was destroyed by fire on the morning of December 20. Immediately Bishop Finlay, of the Diocese of Upper South Carolina, placed at the disposal of those in charge and of the seventeen girls in the school the property of St. Mary's Mission for colored people. They will remain there until provision can be made for them.

Fairwold was established and is supported largely through the activities of the State Federation of Negro Women's Clubs. It serves in a public capacity, taking girls committed by the courts; no State appropriation has ever been made for its support. Bishop Finlay has repeatedly appeared before the legislative Ways and Means Committee in an effort to get such an appropriation, along with others who are interested in the work. A further attempt will now be made to obtain help from the State for this most important work so worthily carried on by the negro women for the girls of their own race.

A. R. M.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt. D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., Coadjutor.

Crusade Preparations.

The Diocese of West Virginia has entered whole-heartedly into the preparation for the Bishops' Crucade. Since early fall the Rev. John L. Oldham, rector Trinity Church, Martinsburg, has presented the matter before each of the three Convocations and received their unanimous endorsement of the enterprise, and during the last month the two Bishops have met in sectional conferences, in the nature of Retreats, all the clergy of the Diocese, so that the Diocese is awaiting with interest the coming of the Crusaders, who are the Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker, Coadjutor of Virginia; the Rev. Percy G. Kammerer, rector, Trinity Church, Pittsburgh; the Rev. Henry G. Lane, of Raleigh, N. C.; Mr. Robert S. Barrett, of Alexandria, Va., and Mrs. Charles R. Pancoast, of Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa., and Canon Anson Phelps Stokes, of Washington Cathedral. The Crusade will be carried on from January 9 to 21 in the following places: Charles Town, Fairmont, Clarksburg, Wheeling, Parkersburg, Charleston, Huntington and Bluefield.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

Candle Light Christmas Carol Service.

The candle light Christmas carol service held in the Church of the Ascension, Frankfort, the Rev. J. Howard Gibbons, rector, on the afternoon of the Sunday before Christmas, was by every one acclaimed to be the best and largest attended since the beginning of these services here three years ago. Between nine hundred and a thousand were in the church, and one hundred or more outside unable to get in.

The garlands of cedar with which the church was decorated, together with the candle light, added much to the beauty of the occasion, and with the service and music, left a deep impression of sacredness on the congregation.

The music for this service, rendered by a choir of thirty voices, members of the Frankfort Monday Music Club, besides the hymns from the hymnal, were sixteenth and seventeenth century carols, and selections from the following composers: Handel, Gaul, Mackinnon, Beach, Holst, Adams and Jungst.

The Crusade.

The following have been added to the Diocesan Commission on the Bishops' Crusade, by appointment of their respective organizations:

From the Woman's Auxiliary, Mrs. W. P. Wheeler, Ashland, Ky.; from the Girls' Friendly Society, Miss Bessie Dangerfield, Lexington, Ky., and Miss Henrietta Ross, Covington, Ky.

The dates and places for the three special Crusade Meetings are:

Ashland, Ky., January 9 to 14.
Lexington, Ky., January 16 to 21.
Covington, Ky., January 23 to 28.

The Crusaders for the Diocese of Lexington will be:

The Rt. Rev. Wm. M. Green, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Mississippi; the Rev. W. A. Brown, D. D., of Portsmouth, Va.; the Rev. J. L. Oldham, of Martinsburg, W. Va.; Mr. Samuel H. Seymour, of Chattanooga, Tenn.

It is the purpose of the diocese to hold other "Crusade" meetings in other parishes and missions of the diocese as can be arranged, and "Crusaders" within, or without, the diocese can be secured.

These are, of course, to take place after the general crusade meetings have been held.

J. H. G.

SOUTHERN OHIO.

Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D. Bishop.
Rt. Rev. T. I. Reese, D. D. Coadjutor.

The new chapel of the Church of the Advent, Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, the Rev. George C. Dunlop, rector, which has just been completed, is to have all of its windows filled with the finest stained glass commemorating the women Saints of the church. All memorials are to be made and placed by James Powell & Sons (Whitefriars), Ltd., London, Eng., internationally known as designers of the finest stained glass.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. J. P. Tyler, D. D., Bishop.

News Items of Interest.

Mr. Calvin H. Barkow, of Minnesota, who has been accepted as a Postulant for Holy Orders in this District, has taken charge of the work at Langdon, Park River and Lakota. He makes his headquarters at the Y. M. C. A. in Grand Forks, and is pursuing his studies for the ministry under the guidance of the Rev. Charles H. Collett rector of St. Paul's Church.

Mr. A. L. Parcells, a candidate for Holy Orders, and in charge of the work at Wahpeton, is studying at Seabury Divinity School, Faribault, Minnesota, during the week, and returning to Wahpeton each Sunday for his work.

Miss Alice M. Bennett, after three years of successful work among the Indians on the Standing Rock Reservation, has resigned her position, and returned to her home in England. Under Miss Bennett's ministrations, the Mission Home for Indian Girls at St. James' Chapel, Cannon Ball, was begun. The new home, which was completed just before last Christmas, is largely due to Miss Bennett's faithful work.

Miss Aline Cronshey, Miss Bennett's assistant, has taken up for the third year her splendid work among the young Indians.

During August and September the work of the Home was carried on by the Rev. and Mrs. George H. Thom of Christ's Church, Mandan. Mr. Thom returned to Mandan each Sunday for his services there.

Mr. Peter M. Dennis, a Postulant for Holy Orders in this District, with Mrs. Dennis and their little son, William, came from New York City and took charge of the Mission Home for Indian Girls, at St. James, Cannon Ball, on the first of October.

All friends of this splendid work are asked to send their gifts of second-hand clothing for men, women and children, and donations for the household, such as sheets, blankets, pillow cases, etc., and also pantry supplies to Mr. Peter M. Dennis, Cannon Ball, N. D. All gifts of money should be sent to the Bishop to be placed in the treasury of the Home. It takes $125, at least, a year to support a child in the home.

The Preparation for the Bishops' Crusade is developing rapidly in the District of North Dakota under the fine leadership of the District Commission, the Rev. C. H. Collett, rector of St. Paul's Parish, Grand Forks, Chairman.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor

New Parish Organized.

Permission has been given for the organization of a St. Elizabeth's Parish, at Upper Ridgewood, within the parish at Ho-Ho-Kus. The development of this new community, with the building of a beautiful stone church and the purchase of a large piece of ground adjoining for the rectory and parish house under the Rev. Robert J. Thomson, of Ho-Ho-Kus, has been a remarkable accomplishment.

A Great Accomplishment.

The rector of St. Andrew's Church, South Orange, the Rev. F. Creswick Todd, announces that the great debt assumed in the building of the $90,000 parish house has been provided for largely by an anonymous giver. A greater parish house was needed for the Church school and the activities of the parish, and with a wholly insufficient sum of money in sight for a $90,000 building. A responsible group of officers and parishioners determined to proceed and the outcome is an example of what a courageous and large minded course will accomplish.

The Crusade.

The six central large parish churches chosen for the mission in the Bishops' Crusade, January 16-23, are: Trinity, Newark; Grace, Orange; St. Paul's, Jersey City; St. Peter's, Morristown; St. Paul's, Paterson; Christ Church, Hackensack. The clergy of the Diocese met, December 2, for an address by Bishop Stearly and then for an afternoon conference, and the clergy in all the archdeaconries have met since, to prepare to make a thorough preparation for the Crusade.

New Church at Morris Plains.

A personal gift of $5,000 has made it possible to proceed with the construction of the new church at Morris Plains, the Rev. John C. Lord, rector. The plan contemplates the building of a high basement story first.

Calvary Church, Summit.

Two additional windows have been added to those already in Calvary Church, Summit, and were dedicated recently, by the rector, the Rev. W. O. Kinsolving.

The former windows were by the late Henry Holiday and the new ones are from the studios of James Powell and Sons (Whitefriars), Ltd., with whom Mr. Holiday in former days had often cooperated.

The new windows carry on the scheme already started of New Testament subjects, and the colors used in the glass are deep and rich.

The first window is a gift in memory of Elizabeth Stuart Cromwell, and the inscription on the other is "In memory of Mary Louise Sheppard Rogers, 10th April, 1925".

WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA.

The Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

Christmas at Old Calvery, Fletcher.

The Christmas festivals at historic Calvary Church, Fletcher (near Asheville, the Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, Jr., rector, began on Christmas Eve, when the "Gift Tree Festival" was held in the church in the afternoon, with ancient and modern Christmas carols and a Christmas story by the rector. The "tree of lights", a living spruce tree sixty feet tall on the church lawn, was again for the third Christmas illuminated by myriads of red electric lights crowned by a white electric star, and about this tree the community singers, in costumes of the English Waits of the fifteenth century, gave a program of ancient English carols at twilight. At 11:30 P. M. special Christmas music featured and at midnight the Holy Communion service followed the Christmas music. The rector preached on "Jesus Christ and Santa Claus". On Christmas Day there were another Christmas service with special music and sermon by the rector. During Christmas week the Girls' Friendly, Boy Scouts, Men's Club, Bible class, Church school, neighborhood clubs held Christmas parties at Calvary rectory. On New Year's Eve, beginning at 11 P. M., the "watch night" service will begin with special old year and New Year carols and the ceremony of opening the church door to welcome in the infant New Year. A "symbolic service of lights" to portray the dying of the old year and the birth of the New Year will be conducted by the rector, who will read selections from ancient and modern poets having to do with the old and New Year. Tennyson's "Ring Out the Old" will be accompanied by the ringing of the old church bell.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. Chas. L. Brent, D. D., Bishop.
Rt Rev. D. L. Ferris, D. D., Coadjutor.

Bishop Brent's Anniversary.

The diocese celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of the consecration of the Rt. Rev. Charles Henry Brent, D. D., in Buffalo on Thursday, December 16, with a service at St. Paul's Cathedral at eleven o'clock, followed by a luncheon at the Statler Hotel.

In spite of the very severe storm which gripped the city during the whole day, the Cathedral was filled with people of the diocese who wished to pay tribute to their friend and bishop. All the clergy of the diocese, save those few who were prevented by the storm, were present and marched in the procession.

The Presiding Bishop of the Church, the Most Rev. John Gardner Murray, D. D., was celebrant, assisted by the Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop of New Jersey, and the Rt. Rev. William Andrew Leonard, D. D., Bishop of Ohio. Seven Bishops attended the service: the Rt. Rev. Drs. Charles Fiske, Bishop of Central New York; Theodore Irving Reese, Bishop Coadjutor of Southern Ohio; Edward H. Coley, Suffragran Bishop of Central New York; John C. Ward, Bishop of Erie; Wilson R. Stearly, Bishop Coadjutor of New Jersey; and the Bishops of New Jersey and Ohio. The Rev. Remsen B. Ogilby, D. D., President of Trinity College, was Chaplain to the Presiding Bishop. The Rev. William R. Wood, of St. Paul's Cathedral staff, was chaplain to Bishop Brent. The Rev. J. W. D. Cooper, of Geneseo, was Chaplain to the Rt. Rev. David L. Ferris, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Western New York.

In his address, Bishop Brent dealt with his ministry as deacon, priest, and bishop.

After the service at the church, the people gathered in the ball room at the Statler Hotel for the luncheon in honor of Bishop Brent. At this luncheon the toastmaster was the Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese, who spoke of the splendid feeling of loyalty and friendship for Bishop Brent.

The first speaker was the Rev. Murray Bartlett, D. D., President of Hobart College, who spoke for the clergy and presented to Bishop Brent a grandfather clock, given by the clergy of the diocese. The Rev. Samuel V. V. Holmes, D. D., pastor of the Westminster Presbyterian Church, spoke for the sister Churches.

Following Dr. Holmes, Mrs. Kingman N. Robins, diocesan president of the Woman's Auxiliary, spoke for the women of the diocese.

The Presiding Bishop spoke for the House of Bishops.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. Juhan, D. D., Bishop.

Florida and the Quota.

The Diocese of Florida reports, through Bishop Juhan, that, on December 1, the Diocese of Florida paid its full quota of $13,500 to the National Treasurer, and that before Christmas $2,000 had been paid on her Advance Work Quota. Practically every parish and mission has met its quota to the diocese and the General Church in 1926, and the Chairman of the Department of Stewardship and Service, the Rev. Charles A. Ashby, announces that the pledges for the Canvass for 1927 are most assuring, and that Florida thoroughly expects to sustain her full support to the General Church during the coming year.

Ready For The Crusade.

All is in readiness for the Bishops' Crusade, and the intensive period will begin on January 9, in St. John's Church, Jacksonville, the Rev. Menard Doswell, rector. The Chairman of the Diocesan Commission on Evangelism, the Rev. Charles W. Frazer, rector of St. Mary's Church, Jacksonville, has the Crusade plans well in hand and has arranged for four three-day Crusades, between January 9 and January 21, inclusive. The four important points chosen are as follows:

Jacksonville, St. John's Church, January 9-10-11.

Gainesville, Holy Trinity Church, January 12-133-14.

Pensacola, Christ Church, January 16-17-18.

Tallahassee, St. John's Church, January 19-20-21.

At each of these centers the schedule will be the same: Daily Celebration of the Holy Communion with special intention for the Crusade; Daily Morning Prayer Service for Women, Intercessions, Prayers and Conferences; Daily opportunity for private interviews with the Crusaders; Daily Conference for Young People; Daily Conference for Men; Supper for all men present; Mass Meeting of all congregations in the city.

The National Crusaders, assigned to the Diocese of Florida, are: the Rt. Rev. Henry Judah Mikell, D. D., Bishop of Atlanta; the Rev. Dennis Whittle, rector of Luray Parish, Virginia; Mr George B. Elliott, of Wilmington, N. C., first week; Mr. Edward H. Bonsell, of Philadelphia, Pa., second week.

During the month of February, Crusades are scheduled in every parish and mission of the diocese. Crusaders have already been selected and they will be present at the four points above mentioned, in order to receive their preparation for their work. It is planned to make the January issue of the Church Herald, the official organ of the Diocese of Florida, a special Crusade issue.

St. James' Church, Lake City, has recently completed the construction of a splendid little parish house. The church has also been thoroughly renovated and a new heating and lighting system installed.

Mercer-Mitchell Missions will be held during the month of February in St. John's Church, Jacksonville; Holy Trinity Church, Gainesville, and Christ Church, Pensacola.

St. James' Church, Perry, is building an attractive rectory for its new rector, the Rev. Walter S. Cain, who has recently taken up his residence in Florida.

Bishop Juhan recently blessed two very handsome altar vases in St. Agatha's Church, De Funiak Springs, given by Miss Julia J. Yonge, in memory of the late Bishop Edwin Gardner Weed. The Bishop was also present, on December 16, at the dedication of the House of the Nazarene, in St. Augustine.

Mr. Eldred Simkins, a student of the Du Bose Memorial Training School, in Monteagle, Tennessee, and a Postulant of the Diocese, is at home during the "non-resident" period of the School, and is doing mission work under the Bishop's direction.

St. John's Church, Tallahassee, the Rev. W. Jeffery Alfriend rector, has just bought a handsome new rectory, and has converted its old rectory, a huge colonial home, into Sunday-school quarters, in order to take care of its work among the girls of the State College for Women.

The Bishop of Florida has been assigned to the Diocese of Alabama from January 23 to February 6, as one of the National Crusaders.

Christmas at St. John's-in-the-Mountains.

On Thursday afternoon, December 23, there was an attractive Christmas tree celebration at this interesting mission in Franklin County. About two hundred and fifty of the people of the community were present; some having arrived early in the morning in order not to miss any of the festivities.

The hall had been decorated for the occasion and the exercises included songs and recitations by a number of the pupils of the school. Every one received a present from the tree; useful things, candy and spice cakes, warm things for the babies, dolls and balls for the girls and boys.

Miss Ora Harrison is the efficient missionary in charge at St. John's; being assisted by Miss Stella Baker of Bristol and Miss Maude Beheler of Rocky Mount. For more than a year Dr. E. Franc Morrill has been doing a wonderful work as a physician at the mis-

Collect for the Circumcision of Christ.

Almighty God, Who madest Thy blessed Son to be circumcised, and obedient to the law for man; Grant us the true circumcision of the Spirit; that our hearts, and all our members, being mortified from all worldly and carnal lusts, we may in all things obey Thy blessed will; through the same, Thy Son, Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

Collect for the Second Sunday After Christmas.

Almighty God, Who hast given us Thy only begotten Son to take our nature upon Him, and as at this time to be born of a pure Virgin; Grant that we being regenerate and made Thy children by adoption and grace, may daily be renewed by Thy Holy Spirit; through the same Our Lord Jesus Christ Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the same Spirit ever, one God, world without end. Amen.

Collect for The Epiphany.

O God, Who by the leading of a star did manifest Thy only begotten Son to the Gentiles, mercifully grant that we, who know Thee now by faith, may after his life have the fruition of Thy glorious Godhead, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Quest Eternal.

Where go ye, singing angel-bands all robed in red and gold,
Hurrying in starry crowds along the snow-filled sky?
What seek ye, on this winter night, singing in the cold?
"We seek the Lord Christ Jesus in His lowly cattle-fold,
We sing of His white peace on earth, that shall not ever die."

Where go ye, kings of Orient in silk and gold and vair.
Pacing on your milk-white camels through the little town?
What look ye for more marvelous than all the earth's gifts ye bear?
"The Child most great and glorious, the Child most pure and fair!
We ride to find His stable floor and there kneel down."

Where go ye, simple shepherds all who haste so fast by night,
Leaving these your flocks and herds to wander as they will?
What thing can be more beautiful than this Star's perfect light?
"Nay, this fair Star but leads us to the world's most perfect Light;
We seek the radiant Son of God past starry vale and hill."

Where go ye, all ye weary folk so wise in this world's lore,
Hasting past your city streets so bright and wide and far?
What thing can be more glad than these, the joys ye knew before?
"O love that lives and Christ that lives, our God that we adore!
The joy that lives forever we have found who find His Star!"

—Margaret Widdemer.

Behold, I Make All Things New.

The present, unlike the past, is still ours. As God has been, and ever is, for all His children their common need in past, present, or future, let us be sure what response we are individually making now to His seeking. He never forces, but He gives a choice. He is perfect justice as well as perfect love; our choices, therefore, will be judged according to the powers we have from Him. The greater part of life consists in making choices, and we cannot escape them. Let us pray to be so surrendered in will that every choice made may be God-inspired. True peace will then be ours, for the response which our Father looks for will have begun.

Our future depends, in some degree, upon both past and present. A view of the future, with faith as the light which goes before each pilgrim, is one we may well try sometimes to cultivate. Love and hope will be the handmaids. Then will the vision of the future stretch before our eyes in all its greatness and its beauty. Sorrow, disease and sin will have been destroyed, for the kingdoms of this world will have become the kingdoms of the Christ. The outcast will have been brought home, the impure will have been made pure, the cruel will have had their hearts softened, and the proud will have put on the humility of their Lord.

Can we help towards such future by lifting up, ever so little, one suffering human being? Or by showing some shadow of the love and sympathy of our great Redeemer? Can one person say of one of us, "He shows me by his life what Christianity stands for?" Can we look less doubtfully into the dim future because of a burning hope in the power of Jesus Christ? Can we see our beloved Church healed of her divisions? And can we see her more fully realizing Christ's power to heal the sickness and the sorrow of the world by those channels through which flows around us and in us, unceasingly, the Life of the Word made Flesh, the Life which was once laid down?—E. A. S., in The Healer.

Room For The Saviour.

Egypt was busy shipping her tribute of grain to the world's conqueror and her own. Mesopotamia, the elder East, was still star-gazing from her temple roofs. Greece, the exquisite, was quibbling over the subtle significance of ordinary simple things. Imperial Rome, under the all-powerful Caesar Augustus, was resting on her arms, for at last for a brief period the doors of the Temple of Janus were shut and peace hovered over the earth. Then it was that one night, over 1900 years ago, a peasant Jewess gave birth to a Babe in a little wayside khan bordering on an old, provincial Judean village.

Beside that inn, Bethlehem lay fast asleep, indifferent alike to that young mother and her first-born Babe. In Jerusalem, priest and pseudo prophet, mad king and wily traitor were plotting amid counterplots, utterly regardless as to who was born or for that matter who died, so long as they succeeded. All heedless, the Roman was taking a census of his dependent subjects and we can not say whether he paused long enough in his work to include Mary's Child.

To all outward seeming that Babe differed not a whit from thousands of other children born that night. He was cradled in a rude manger and pillowed on cattle straw. Yet withal that Babe was God's greatest gift to mankind in all the long reaches of time.

"And she brought forth her first-born Son and wrapped Him in swaddling clothes and laid Him in a manger because there was no room for them in the inn."

How often this is true today, in our crowded, rushing, sinning world. How often we have no place, no room for Christ. For worldly success and fame the inn is illuminated; for social prestige and laurel-crowned success the inn doors are flung wide open and welcoming music fills the air. But struggles toward sublime attainment, heroic efforts to better the world, these generally mean the manger. Simple consecration of soul to a noble ideal means a lonely pathway, lit only by the torch of Truth, held high in the hand of Purpose.

Great truths must ever be born in the manger of poverty, or in sorrow, trial, suffering. They find no room at the inn till at last, it may be, they enter it in triumph, they honor the inn that never honored them in their hours of need, of struggle, and of darkness. This fact is written in the book of human nature; it is the chorus of the song of every great human effort; it epitomizes the life of Christ.

As a babe there was no room for Him at the inn; as a boy threatened by Herod, there was no room in Israel. "He came unto His own and His own received Him not." "Truly the foxes have holes and the birds of the air, nests; but the Son of Man, though maker of the world, while in it had not where to lay His head." Pilate gave Him no room. He was condemned, despised, rejected of men. There was little room in the whole world for Him, save the room on the cruel Cross. His life seemed a failure, yet today the world has countless thousands of churches, spiritual inns, built in His memory.

Right must ever fight its away against the world. Truth must often walk alone. Justice must bravely face its Calvary if it would still live in triumph after all efforts made to slay it. At the inn they inquire, "Will it pay?" Is it popular?" "Is it successful?" At the manger they ask, "Is it right?" "Is it true?" "Is it helpful?"

Wealth can not buy those things the world hungers most for today—love, kindness, calmness, peace, trust, truth, justice and salvation. If then we are confident we are right according to our highest light, the light that can make bright the darkest heart, let us care not for what the world says, "For if God be for us who shall be against us?"

Being conscious of work done with a right motive, of faithfulness in little things, of lives made sweeter, purer, better for our living, that is greater far to our highest self than the most elegant room at the inn. Living such a life with the Master as our friend, our strength, our guide, before seeking rest at night we shall be able to feel His loving hands resting on our heads, and to hear His blessed words, "Well done today!" And then when our day on earth is over, the Heavenly Inn will swing wide its doors for us, and an eternal recognition will be ours in the welcoming words: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Follow then the Star. Open the door of your inside inn, the soul, to Christ. Do not hesitate because you have so little furniture, so few pictures of holy memories, so few tapestries of great beliefs, so scant a library of Divine knowledge—for it does not take much furniture. All that Christ wants is the room. He will bring His own furniture and His own friends and His own love and His own faith and He will dwell there and glorify the house. Give Him then the key, the key of loyalty and love. Let Him in today. Let Him in to stay. Let Him in day by day. Yes, give Him this welcome.

"Oh, come to my heart, Lord Jesus,
There is room in my heart for Thee."
—Rev. A. N. Porter.

Epiphany.

All's well! All's well! The city lies
Beneath the high, star-scattered skies,
Peaceful indeed. The hour is late
And I must hasten to the gate.

I have watched long; my hair is grey,
My feet grow slower on the way,
Yet never on a watch of yore
Saw I such brilliant stars before.

Hasten! a knocking on the gate.
"Who goes there, on the road so late?
The jewels gleam, the gold bells ring,
A messenger, a Lord, a King?"

"We are three Kings!" Ay, ye may pass,
I set my lantern on the grass."
"Is this the town of Bethlehem?"
They asked, and "Yea" I answered them.

"Where are they going, what their quests,
I asked myself—such noble guests—
And as they pass I see the fold
Of each silk garment sewn with gold.

As breezes round their garments stir,
The city seems to smell of myrrh,
And frankincense, like perfume rare,
Hangs dimly in the keen night air.

I long to follow where they go,
But nay, my feet are aged and slow.
What can be here to do with them
In this small town of Bethlehem?

Recollections of a Minister's Daughter.

Chapter 5.

Anna Swan Reynolds.

In looking back I realize now that my Father had many cares, but we children never knew him otherwise than cheerful and kind—our best and most desirable companion.

He no doubt sought his garden where he labored by the sweat of his brow not only to help out a small income, but to find a change and restful respite of thought.

The boys—my brothers—were generally not far away with spade and hoe; and if they found the work hard they knew if faithful they would be rewarded for their labors by my Father taking them fishing, or a swim in the river that was our constant delight; for in the happy summer time we had many a gay picnic or fishing party on its banks, and in the winter time it was our delight to skate for miles upon its crystal ice.

After we all grew up and left the old brick house it had a strange fate, for it became the property of a community of nuns. I often wonder if the sweet-faced sisters whom I saw not long ago wandering in our old and still beautiful garden—full of the plants my darling Mother planted there—were not often haunted by the sound of gay, childish laughter.

Surely the old rooms where we used to romp and sing and play must sometimes resound again with our mirth: and did they sometimes, I wonder, in their quiet walks along our garden paths see flitting, childish figures? and again see, bending over beds of mignonette, larkspur and rose geraniums the figure of the children's beloved Mother as she stopped with their Father to gather a nosegay, as was their custom as they strolled at even-tide amid sweet smelling flowers long, long ago?

It seems to me we must come back from that far-off land sometimes; and wander amid the scenes of such great happiness, as had once been ours. Surely we do not leave the places that have known us so well, never to return, at least in spirit.

I asked a gray-eyed nun who walked with me around our old familiar places if she had known of the inmates and the happy lives spent behind their convent walls, and if no strange sounds were heard therein. She smiled and raised the crucifix that hung at her side to her pale lips, and murmured a prayer, doubtless, to be kept from ghostly visitants, but she answered back no word; but the stranger who walked with her beneath the cherry trees, now red with luscious fruit, saw in retrospect the past once more, and air was full of well-remembered voices—gay laughter—the snatch of a song, a long-forgotten melody. It was the nun at my side who seemed least real in her trailing black robes, for I was communing with my brothers and my sisters.

I saw myself again care-free, happy as the birds that seemed singing the same songs in the cedar tree by the gate: and later on, as I lingered as in a vision I saw standing at her bedroom window overlooking the garden my Mother, with the silver moonlight falling in white radiance around her. I heard the rich tones of my Father's deep voice as I had heard it in the old happy nights many a time, "Good-night, my well beloved, good-night!" and I closed the small green garden gate behind me—never to enter that beautiful garden again.

As I passed down the village street I heard in the distance the evening hymn of the nuns as they sang their solemn Benidicite. They did not know of the spirits around them listening to the music so different that filled the old house now, but I knew, for I can never forget that I had seen those flitting, shadowy figures that once had made the old red brick rectory a happy home.

What generous hospitality had been exerted by my Father and Mother to every one within the parish, to rich and poor alike, and always a royal welcome extended to the "stranger within the gate." My grandmother who lived with us, and was a wonderful housekeeper, used to wonder at the things expected as a matter of course of the master and mistress of the household; and this brings me to a very amusing—at one time a very important event in the life of the parish—now I am thankful to say an event no longer possible or permissible—the old-time Donation Party.

Japanese Church Life.

You may ask what the independent native Church of Japan is like, or what is the nature of the tree which has grown from English seed in a soil so different from that of England. Theologically and doctrinally speaking, we have no such thing as an independent or native Church apart from the one holy and Apostolic Church. The Church we have built in Japan is only a part of the one universal Church. There is no English or Japanese in the economy of God; we are all living in the same divine commonwealth. The Church in Japan is not a new creation, but a child of evolution. The fundamental idea of the Church is, I understand, a continuity of life and spirit. When we speak of the independence of the Church we only refer to the form and color in which the life manifests itself. We are all aware that the Church in Japan as a branch of the Holy and Apostolic Church must naturally have a certain type of organization and worship. We are all clear on this point. We are using the same Prayer Book, translated into Japanese with very slight modification; we are singing the same sort of hymns in the Japanese language with the English tunes. Our mode of worship is practically the same as yours. We have not created anything new in matters concerning the Church, with the exception of a few minor points, and they do not affect the spirit of worship in the services.

What we Japanese Churchmen are seriously thinking of is the advisability of revising our Prayer Book. We all feel that the spirit of prayer, such as you have in your Book, is beautiful and uplifting, but when it is translated into Japanese it does not convey to the people the same spirit of reverence and piety. Our order of thinking is different from yours. Our way of expressing our ideas is very often reversed. Therefore, the literal translation of prayers, however beautiful in the English language, does not appeal to the mind of the Japanese people, but we have not yet Japanese Christians who are scholars enough to give us forms of prayer in the good Japanese style with the same beautiful spirit. We are sincerely hoping to have them before long.

What I am hoping and praying for more than any other thing is the establishment of a cathedral in the heart of Tokyo, not of Norman architecture or of Gothic structure, but of Japanese architecture; not the Western style, but the Eastern, a style most suited to the Japanese idea of the beautiful; not so large as English cathedrals, but small and strong and beautiful, not to be shaken down by earthquake or typhoon, but standing for ever to the glory of God and as the Light of Asia.—Bishop Motoda, in an address made in England.

"Heavier the cross, the heartier prayer;
The bruised reeds most fragrant are;
If sky and wind were always fair
The sailor would not watch the star;
And David's psalms had ne'er been sung,
If grief his heart had never wrung.

For the Young Folks

Prayer.

Last night I crept across the snow,
Where only tracking rabbits go,
And then I waited quite alone
Until the Christmas radiance shone!

At midnight twenty angels came,
Each white and shining like a flame.
At midnight twenty angels sang,
The stars swung out like bells and rang.

They lifted me across the hill,
They bore me in their arms until
A great glory greeted them.
It was the town of Bethlehem.

And gently, then, they set me down,
All worshipping that holy town,
And gently, then, they bade me raise
My head to worship and to praise.

And gently, then, the Christ smiled down.
Ah! there was glory in that town!
It was as if the world were free
And glistening with purity.

And in that vault of crystal blue,
It was as if the world were new,
And myriad angels, file on file,
Gloried in the Christ-child's smile.

It was so beautiful to see
Such glory, for a child like me,
So beautiful, it does not seem
It could have been a Christmas dream

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

The Faithfulness of Jesus.

New Year! You have heard the bells, the "happy bells across the snow", ring in the New Year. Perhaps Mother waked you at twelve o'clock on New Year's Eve, and you heard bells, and whistles and cannon-crackers, telling of the new year that has come in. God's way with Time is like His way with all His works. "He maketh all things new."

But One there is Who remains unchanged: "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, today and forever". He loved little children in Galilee; be sure He loves them now. His great heart stirred with pity for the sorrowing and the sinful; it moves Him not less today. No trouble was too small for His caring nor too great for His curing; and His arm is not shortened now.

So when you hear of His gracious words and deeds, when you read, or Mother reads to you, these little talks about Him, and think to yourself, "Jesus was kind, merciful, brave"—say also, "Jesus is". He was so patient with Peter! Yes, and He is just as patient with every one of us. He was so careful of His Mother! But even now every aging Mother, every old pilgrim on the road of life is the object of His tender care. He was so gentle with Jairus' little maid, calling her softly back to earth, providing for food for her (because He knew a little girl waking up so well would be hungry), and He deals with every little child as gently.

He promised life to all who would come to Him, truth to all who would learn of Him, and His own presence in Heaven to all who become His friends. And these things are for us now as much as they were for Peter, Thomas, and the rest, for

He Is Faithful That Promised.

The First Christmas Roses.

Adapted From an Old Legend.

The sun had dropped below the western hills of Judea, and the stillness of night had covered the earth. The heavens were illumined only by numberless stars which shone the brighter for the darkness of the sky. No sound was heard but the occasional howl of a jackal or the bleat of a lamb in the sheepfold. Inside a tent on the hillside slept the Shepherd, Berachah, and his daughter, Madelon. The little girl lay restless, sleeping, waking, dreaming, until at last she roused herself and looked about her. "Father," she whispered, "oh, my father, awake. I fear for the sheep." The shepherd turned himself and reached for his staff. "What hearest thou, daughter? The dogs are asleep. Hast thou been burdened by an evil dream?" "Nay, but father," she answered, "seest thou the light? Hearest thou not the voice?"

Berachah gathered his mantle about him, arose, looked over the hills toward Bethlehem and listened. The olive trees on yonder slope were casting their shadows in a marvelous light, unlike daybreak or sunset, or even the light of the moon. By the campfire, below on the hillside, the shepherds on watch were rousing themselves. Berachah waited and wondered, while Madelon clung to his side. Suddenly a sound rang out in the stillness. Madelon pressed still closer.

"It is the voice of an angel, my daughter. What it means I know not. Neither understand I this light." Berachah fell on his knees and prayed. "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ, the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you. Ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes lying in a manger."

The voice of the angel died away, and the air was filled with music. Berachah raised Madelon to her feet. "Ah, daughter," said he, "It is the wonder night so long expected. To us hath it been given to see the sign. It is the Messiah whose name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. He it is who shall reign on the throne of David, he it is who shall redeem Israel."

Slowly up the hillside toiled the shepherds to the tent of Berachah, their chief, who arose to greet them eagerly. "What think you of the wonder night and of the sign?" he queried. "Are we not above all others honored, thus to learn of the Messiah's coming?"

"Yea, and Berachah," replied their spokesman, Simon, "Believest thou not that we should worship the infant King? Let us now go to Bethlehem, and see this thing which has come to pass."

A murmur of protest came from the edge of the circle, and one or two turned impatiently away, whispering of duty toward flocks, and the folly of searching for a new born baby in the city of Bethlehem. Hardheaded, practical men were these, whose hearts had not been touched by vision or by song. The others, however turned expectantly toward Berachah, awaiting his decision.

"Truly," said Jude, "the angel of the Lord hath given us the sign in order that we might go to worship Him. How then can we do otherwise? We shall find him as we have heard lying in a manger. Let us not tarry, but let us gather our choicest treasures to lay at His feet, and set out without delay across the hills toward Bethlehem."

"Oh, my Father," whispered Madelon, "Permit me to go with thee." Berachah did not hear her, but turned and bade the men gather together their gifts.

"I, too, father?" asked Madelon. Still Berachah said nothing. Madelon slipped back into the tent, and throwing her arms around Melampo, her shepherd dog, whispered in his ear.

Soon the shepherds returned with their gifts. Simple treasures they were—a pair of doves, a fine wool blanket, some eggs, some honey, some late autumn fruits. Berachah had searched for the finest of his flock, a snow white lamb. Across the hills toward Bethlehem in the quiet, star-lit night they journeyd. As they moved silently along, the snow beneath their feet was changed to grass and flowers, and the icicles which had dropped from the trees covered their pathway like stars in the milky way.

Following at a distance, yet close enough to see them, came Madelon with Melampo at her heels. Over the hills they traveled on until Madelon lost sight of their own hillside. Farther and farther the shepherds went until they passed David's well, and entered the city. Berachah led the way.

"How shall we know?" whispered Simon. And the others answered, "Hush. We must await the sign".

When at last they had compassed the crescent of Bethlehem's hills, they halted by an open doorway at a signal from their leader. "The manger" they joyfully murmured, "the manger! We have found the new born King!" One by one the shepherds entered. One by one they fell on their knees. Away in the shadow stood the little girl, her hand on Melampo's head. In wonder she gazed while the shepherds presented their gifts, and were permitted each to hold for a moment the new-born Saviour.

Melampo, the shepherd dog, crouched on the ground as if he, too, like the ox and the ass within, would worship the Child. Madelon turned toward the darkness weeping. Then lifting her face to heaven, she prayed that God would bless Mother and Baby. Melampo moved closer to her, dumbly offering his companionship, and, raising his head, seemed to join in her petition. Once more she looked at the worshipping circle.

"Alas," she grieved, "no gift have I for the infant Saviour. Would that I had but a flower to place in His hand."

Suddenly Melampo stirred by her side, and as she turned again from the manger she saw before her an angel, the light from whose face illuminated the darkness and whose look of tenderness rested on her tear-stained eyes.

"Why grievest thou, maiden?" asked the angel.

"That I come empty-handed to the cradle of the Saviour—that I bring no gift to greet Him," she murmured.

"The gift of thine heart, that is the best of all," answered the angel. "But that thou mayest carry something to the manger, see I will strike with my staff upon the ground."

Wonderingly Madelon waited. From the dry earth wherever the angel's staff had touched sprang fair, white roses. Timidly she stretched out the hand toward the nearest one. In the light of the angel's smile she gathered them, until her arms were filled with flowers. Again she turned toward the manger and quietly slipped to the circle of kneeling shepherds.

Closer she crept to the Child, longing, yet fearing, to offer her gift.

"How shall I know?" she pondered, "whether He will receive this my gift as His own?"

Berachah gazed in amazement at Madelon and the roses which she held. How came his child there, his child whom he had left safe on the hillside? And whence came such flowers? Truly this was a wonder night.

Step by step she neared the manger, knelt and placed a rose in the Baby's hand. As the shepherds watched in silence, Mary bent over her child, and Madelon waited for a sign. "Will He accept them?" she questioned. "How, oh, how shall I know?" As she prayed in humble silence the baby's eyes opened slowly and over his face spread a smile.

How Far Is It To Bethlehem?

How far is it to Bethlehem?
Not very far.
Shall we find the stable-room
Lit by a star?

Can we see the little Child,
Is He within?
If we lift the wooden latch,
May we go in?

May we stroke the creatures there,
Ox, ass, or sheep?
May we peep like them and see
Jesus asleep?

If we touch His tiny hand
Will He awake?
Will He know we've come so far
Just for His sake?

Great Kings have precious gifts,
And we have naught;
Little smiles and little tears
Are all we brought.

For all weary children
Mary must weep.
Here, on His bed of straw,
Sleep, children, sleep.

God, in His Mother's arms
Babes in the byre,
Sleep, as they sleep who find
Their heart's desire.

WISE GREEN.

The editor of the Children's Page has a treat in store for the Southern Churchman's big family of children. Dr. Louis Tucker has told for us some stories of animal people, which he says he used to tell to his own children. His own children had many a good laugh with these funny people, and so shall we. And here is the first laugh, in the story of

Wise Green.

Wise Green was a little crippled monkey who lived with Otherwise Green in a bungalow in a rubber plantation on the seventh bend of the biggest river in British Guiana. He was crippled because he was bob-tailed, and Guiana monkeys use their tails as a fifth hand. He was not really green, but a sort of greenish-gray; but when the Indians killed his mother and brought him to the men's club for sale he jumped into Otherwise's arms and clung there. So they lived together in the bungalow with several servants and a green snake about two feet long named Reptilius Pernambuco.

Wise had a horror of Pernambuco and even Otherwise did not like her, but any one in British Guiana who can get a green house snake to live in his bungalow is lucky. Houses there are roofed with palm thatch, much like a small haystack; and spiders and wasps and lizards and mice and roaches, particularly cockroaches, live in the thatch and drop on your table when you are writing and eating and on your nose when you sleep. Green house snakes are harmless, and catch and drive away such things. So Beptilius Pernambuco was let alone and made herself very much at home everywhere.

Wise Green had a favorite chair. It was an armchair with slat back and broad arms and a spring seat that was very soft and springy. Whenever he could, Wise sat in it; but often he had to get out, for it was Otherwise's favorite chair also. When it was empty and Reptilius Pernambuco wanted to get from the ceiling to the floor by some quicker way than crawling down a corner she sometimes dropped into it because of its softness, but she slid to the floor at once, so no one paid much attention to that.

Every one had some weakness. With Wise it was inkstands. He longed for inkstands as a thirsty man longs for water. He did not drink them. He dipped one finger in them like Bill the Lizard, and wrote on anything in sight, but preferably books of engravings. Any inkstand would do, as the carpet could testify, but his greatest and most unholy joy was Otherwise's patent traveling inkstand with a spring top. The top made such a nice noise when it opened and closed suddenly. Therefore Otherwise had to keep his inkstand locked up.

One day he forgot. The launch that takes the rubber down the river stuck in the mud and he had to hurry out to see about it. Wise was particularly mischievous that day. He had had two switchings already, one for turning over a vase of flowers and one for pulling a handful of feathers out of the parrot's tail. But when Otherwise left, Wise must have jumped for the inkstand at once, for a copy of the Graphic on the desk had every picture scribbled on with inky fingers. Otherwise wore tennis shoes that day and he always moved softly and quickly, and Wise was chuckling to himself and writing too hard to notice little things anyhow, so the first he knew about Otherwise's return was a cut on the back with the switch. Really it was not hard, but it was so horribly unexpected that Wise went up into the air backward, turned a somersault and landed sitting in the big chair on Reptilius Pernambuco, who had just dropped there from the ceiling.

Reptilius was a good-natured snake, not venomous, but this was so sudden that she struck without thinking and fastened on the stump of Wise's tail. She could not let go, for house-snake's teeth are not retractible. So Wise at last had a tail, a long green tail. He twisted round to look at it—Reptilius was tying knots in herself trying to get loose—and then, quite suddenly, he went crazy. He ran up all the walls. He knocked everything off the tables. He swept everything off the shelves. He screamed like a policeman's whistle. When Otherwise tried to catch him, he bit; and then he rolled down the front steps, flashed across the yard and took to the tall trees with his long green tail knotting and coiling behind him.

A week later he came back at nightfall—tailless. Otherwise, who had given him up for lost, took him in his arms, and Wise told him all about it in little croons and chatters; but from that time on he left inkstands alone; he abhorred literature; he never wrote again.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Great Desire.

F. B. Stone.

There's a power that is giving more light than a star,
That is leading the wise men to Christ from afar,
'Tis the light of the Spirit that kindles a fire,
In the hearts of His people, for Christ great desire.

As the Shepherds sought Jesus that first Christmas morn,
When they heard from the angels of Christ newly-born,
So the hearts that are stirred with the love from above,
Are seeking their Saviour this Christmas in love.

O prepare Him a song such as earth ne'er has sung,
Born of faith and of love, unto man a new tongue,
Such a love for the Saviour, such a faith in His name,
As will girdle the earth that new love to proclaim.

Of the birthday of Jesus let all join and sing,
When the Saviour to earth our salvation did bring;
Let us watch for His coming, as precious to earth
As when He came first to the earth at His birth.

Oh! His glorious appearing when He shall come soon,
At the cock-crow, at midnight, or bright sunny noon!
He is coming to all and no wish can delay;
Let us watch for and long for that soon coming day.

An All-Winter Christmas Tree.

"Oh, it's snowing! It's snowing!" shouted the children joyously, as they looked out of the window one morning.

"I'm glad," said Alice, jumping up and down. "Won't we have fun with our sleds?"

"Yes, and snowballing, too," shouted Robert. "Hurrah for the snow!"

"Oh, see that dear little bird!" said Alice. "Do you suppose it likes the snow? Will the snow cover up all its food, mother, so that it can't find anything to eat?"

"My text at Sunday school yesterday was, 'Your heavenly Father feedeth them'," said Robert thoughtfully. "It must be a lot of work to feed so many birds, and feed them every day."

"Maybe He wants us to help Him," said Alice. "But the birds are so afraid that only a few come to pick up crumbs when we put them out."

"How would you like a birds' Christmas tree?" suggested mother.

"They'd starve before Christmas got here," objected Alice.

"A birds' Christmas tree should last all winter," answered mother. "The tree by the kitchen window would be a good tree."

"It's all bare," objected Robert.

"Yes, I know, but the birds wouldn't mind, and the evergreen trees are too far away," said mother. "You want a tree where you can see the birds."

After breakfast they all set to work to trim the tree—not with candy and tops and candles, but with beef bones, bits of suet, little boxes of crumbs and grain, and an apple or two. Then they went back into the house and watched from the window.

Mr. Blue Jay was the first guest, and a handsome bird he was. He perched on a big beef bone and began to pull at the meat.

"Jay, jay, jay,
Is it Christmas Day?"

he chirped in surprise. Then he flew away.

"He wasn't very hungry," said Robert. "Oh, there's a brown sparrow!"

"Yes, and three dear little chickadees!" answered his sister. "They seem to want the grain, and the sparrow is eating cake crumbs. Oh, they do like our tree!"

Pretty soon Mr. Blue Jay returned. He had only gone to bring Mrs. Blue Jay to the feast.

By the end of the first half-hour the children had counted thirty-one birds, most of them juncos.

All day they came, and the next, and the next. The squirrels came, too, and the children added nuts to the grain for them. It was such fun to watch them.

All winter the children kept gifts on the birds' tree. The birds became tame, and repaid them with happy songs of thanks.—The Sunbeam.

How Christmas Stockings Came.

Once upon a time in the Land of Make-Believe there was a kind little elf who started out on a journey one cold winter day. This elf belonged to a very old and honorable family, and it had been the custom of his family to make this journey every Christmas time with a wreath of red berries and greens for the child who needed it most in the village. There had been such a child every season for many years, the child in so small a house that the toyman passed it by. On this child's door an elf hung a wreath on Christmas Eve for a happy surprise.

Before he started out this particular elf was made ready for the journey by his mother. She pulled his little red cap down over his ears, and his little red stockings up over his knees. A very kind old sheep had given the elf the wool cap and stockings, and indeed he needed their warmth for his journey. His elfin mother tied a muffler of woven moss about his neck and helped him into the pair of stout little boots that the deer had given him. She filled his pockets with dried rose-leaf sandwiches and peppermint cookies, and then she hung the beautiful Christmas wreath over his back.

"Good-by, and good luck, my dear!" said his little mother as the elf started out through the deep, cold forest. "I don't think you will meet with danger on the road, for the animals are all asleep for the winter."

The elf set his brave, wee feet in the snow of the woods path, and he whistled to keep up his courage. He was small indeed among the great Christmas trees that stood so tall beside him. The wind roared in his ears, and Jack Frost flung ice darts in the elf's face, but on he trudged, carrying his heavy Christmas wreath on his back. It bent him almost double, it was so heavy.

"I'm glad there's nobody except me on the road," he thought, but just then what should he meet but a very large old squirrel that looked like a bandit. The squirrel's fur coat was thin and ragged, and his eyes glared wildly at the elf. He looked ferocious indeed, but that was because he was hungry.

"There were no nuts left by the time I could gather my harvest," the squirrel said to the elf. "The younger squirrels were there first.. I am starving."

The elf stopped and turned out his pockets. His mother had slipped in some nut cakes, which he gave to the squirrel, and also his peppermint cookies, which would be warming. The squirrel ate and then pointed to the elf's wool cap and boots. "If I had those," he said, "I might be able to get on to a cousin of mine who has a nest well stocked with food a few groves farther on."

There seemed nothing to do but give the stout deerskin boots and the wool cap to the squirrel. He looked warm and ready for the weather as he thanked the elf and started on, but the elf had to jump and hop to keep warm; and he was still a long way from the village. He was about to nibble the dried rose-leaf sandwiches when he saw a strange-looking creature approaching. Its legs were long and thin, and it spoke in a trembling voice.

"Nobody thinks of a grandfather grasshopper at Christmas, a very old grasshopper that was not able to prepare for the winter. If only I had a bite of a leaf and something to cover my legs from the cold now, I might be able to keep up my courage and go to some friendly cricket's hole."

The elf hid his surprise and the fear he had felt at first at seeing this many-legged tramp in the forest, and he offered him his sandwiches. The grasshopper ate the rose leaves with great relish. As he ate, the elf looked at his two stockings and then at the grasshopper's legs. Still a pair of stockings would be better than none at all, he thought. The grandfather grasshopper thought so also, for he reached out one long, hairy foot and touched the elf's warm red stockings. "Fine wool those!" he said enviously.

The elf pulled off his little stockings, and the grandfather grasshopper put them on the two legs he used the most. He thanked the elf and started off cheerfully, waving a free leg or two to the elf. Dear me, the elf would have to hurry now! He could hear the bells in the village. But he had no shoes or stockings, and the road was sharp with ice, and the wreath very heavy on his back.

On, on went this Christmas elf, not once losing his courage. His feet were cut and bleeding, but wherever they left a drop of blood a bright Christmas berry showed gay and crimson. On, on he ran until he came to the streets of the village where the toyman and the sweetsman and the shoppers were so busy that not one saw him, barefooted and tiny. And soon he left the Christmas streets behind him, for he had come to the small house that Christmas had forgotten. He crept under the wall. He hung his wreath of greens on the door, and then he curled up a moment to rest on the window sill. He peered inside.

The elf saw something wonderful. There were his warm red stockings the kind sheep had given him and he in turn had given away, but they had stretched to giant size. They were large enough for a child! They hung on either side of the fireplace, and they were bulging and spilling over with gifts. Those magic stockings must have held apples and oranges and candy toys and a jackknife and a rubber ball at the very least. They were Christmas stockings hung and crammed for a child's happiness.

The elf tapped gayly on the windowpane and left a pretty picture on it done with a frost pencil, and then he started home. Remembering what he had seen, he did not seem to feel the lack of shoes and cap and stockings. All the way through the forest the icicles tinkled like bells, and a reindeer drawing a strange, toy-filled sled dashed by, and the elf could hardly wait to spread the news.

"Christmas stockings for the children who have need of cheer," he said to his mother. And whether or not a house cricket had arranged it, or it had been just a bit of Christmas magic, did not matter; the family of the elves took the credit, and Christmas stockings became the fashion from that time to this.—Youth's Companion.

A Christmas Brother.

Horace had been visiting Donald and John, who were brothers, and were planning a happy Christmas together, buying gifts and hiding them from one another and making surprise gifts for father and mother.

"I wish I had a brother," sighed Horace at bedtime.

"You might borrow a brother for Christmas," suggested his mother.

"How?" asked Horace.

"There are ever so many boys and girls who will not have a happy Christmas," explained mother. "Just for this week you might play that one of those boys is your brother."

"Oh, I know a boy right now!" cried Horace, "the boy who lives in the little house in the woods near the farm where we went last summer. He didn't have any Christmas presents at all last Christmas. He told me so. Couldn't he by my brother?"

Mother remembered the lonely little house where they had stopped for two hours one day while the automobile was being repaired. She remembered the ragged, lonely little boy who had been so happy to have Horace for a visitor. But she wondered how any one from the town could get five miles over the rough, snowy roads with a Christmas box. "We will ask father," she said, and father came upstairs to help plan.

"I will write a letter to the postmaster at the town," said father. "I am sure that he can find a way to get a box to the boy if you will get the box to the postmaster."

All the next day Horace talked about his "brother", and he wanted to buy so many things that the money in his savings bank was not nearly enough. He spent most of the afternoon looking over his books and playthings and picking out those he wanted to share with the other boy. Mother helped him to choose some of his own warm clothing for him, and together they had quite a pile.

How exciting it was to pack the box with nuts and candy, and to fill up all the corners with raisins. Then off it went to the train. In the letter that went with it was a dollar bill for the postmaster as a Christmas gift for seeing that the box reached the new brother in time.

The day before Christmas a lonely little boy looking out of his window in a lonely little house, saw a horse and sleigh coming through the drifts. How he did fly to open the door and how surprised he was to have a great big Christmas box for his own!

"From your Christmas brother Horace," was written on the card in the box. In all the world there were not two happier boys on Christmas Day than these two adopted brothers.—The Sunbeam.

What More Can I Do?

Have I exhausted every means to prevent the curtailment of the Church's Missionary Work?

The Every Member Canvass has been held in all parishes and missions, with a few exceptions, throughout the Church.

Through the number and size of their pledges the people of the Church have expressed themselves in what was really

A REFERENDUM

The question involved was, and still is: Shall the action of the National Council and the General Convention in refusing to curtail the national work be endorsed, or shall the National Council be ordered to retreat for lack of sufficient support?

The results of the Every Member Canvass are not yet known. They may prove to be insufficient, because the parish quotas have the effect of limiting the pledges of many interested givers.

The verdict is not fully rendered, therefore, until the larger givers have taken

SECOND THOUGHT

To every member of the Church who is able and willing to give largely for the work of the Church we would put these questions:

Does the pledge you have given for your parish quota represent all you will be able to do as a member of the diocese and of the national Church for the diocesan and general work?

Are you willing to see missionary schools, hospitals, and churches closed for lack of support?

What is your verdict on second thought? Tell your Bishop sion. She recently found it necessary to give this up and to accept an important position with an organization in the Middle West.

Though Dr. Morrill is greatly missed and the medical work curtailed by her departure, the activities at St. John's are flourishing. The school was never so large before and a certain prejudice against the mission that has been felt by some of the people is gradually disappearing. Over one hundred and twenty-five children are enrolled and when, as often happens, bad weather prevents some of them from reaching their homes they are taken care of at the mission.

It is planned to introduce a course in weaving in the near future. Two looms have been provided by the Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese and by an individual and one of the teachers has taken special training in this industry which it is hoped will prove a valuable activity in this neighborhood.

The value of the work being done at St. John's is becoming more and more evident day by day; being attested by the changing attitude of the people of the community, their increasing ambition and appreciation of the educational and spiritual advantages offered at the mission and their growing cooperation in its work.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Coadjutor.

A Rare Privilege.

The Diocesan Commission on the Bishops' Crusade has made arrangements for a day of prayer, meditation and instruction on Monday, January 3, 1927, in St. Mark's Church, Mauch Chunk, Pa.

The program is as follows:

10:30 A. M., Holy Communion and Meditation by Bishop Sterrett.

11:30 to 12:45 P. M., The Bishops' Crusade by the Rt. Rev. Philip H. Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware.

1:00 P. M., Luncheon at hotel.

The three short addresses will be:

(a) How St. Stephen's Prepared for the Bishops' Crusade, Dr. Flinchbaugh.

(b) What St. Peter's, Hazleton Did, the Rev. Mr. Dickinson.

(c) What is Planned for the Diocese, by the Archdeacon.

The services will be over so that the clergy can go home on the afternoon trains. Through the generosity of a layman on the Diocesan Commission the fares of all the clergy will be paid; Luncheon is free; Any who cannot return home the same day will be entertained for the night.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

The Church of the Holy Comforter, Sumter, the Rev. J. Bentham Walker, rector, has received the gift of a beautiful new organ built by the Austin Organ Company, of Hartford, Conn. It was used for the first time on Sunday, October 24. It is the gift of Mrs. Thomas Wilson and of her daughter, Miss Mary Wilson.

St. Philip's, Charleston, the Rev. S. C. Beckwith, rector, has received three notable gifts recently. The first of these is a memorial window of stained glass, given by the members of the congregation as an "All Saints" window in loving memory of those who have gone before.

The second gift was a handsome altar of a soft buff marble, designed to harmonize with the general architectural lines of the church. The altar was given by Mr. and Mrs. Henry C. Cheves as a memorial to their youngest son, Langdon McCord Cheves.

The third addition to the church was a memorial tablet to the late rector of St. Philip's, the Rev. John Johnson, D. D.

Good Shepherd, North Charleston, the Rev. John H. Morgan, rector: The number of members in this little congregation is steadily increasing, and the Church School enrollment has advanced to forty-five pupils. The quota assigned to this mission by the diocese is $80 for 1926; $160 was pledged and in all likelihood even more than that will be paid in. All local expenses have been met each month, and in addition $200 has been raised to be paid to the Church Building Fund. When the building Fund debt has been entirely discharged the Church of the Good Shepherd will be in readiness to be consecrated. Much of the work has been done by the ladies of the local branch of the Woman's Auxiliary.

St. Peter's-by-the-Sea, Navy Yard, Charleston: There are now one hundred and twenty-one pupils enrolled in the Church School at St. Peter's, the Rev. J. H. Morgan, rector. The Young People's Service League has been organized this year and is getting along splendidly. A branch of the Woman's Auxiliary has also been organized here this year and the members are very active.

The diocesan quota for this Church for 1926 was $150; it pledged $160.

St. Jude's Walterboro, the Rev. A. W. Skardon, rector, has been the recipient of a new altar and reredos given by Mrs. W. A. Robeling, and they have added much to the dignity of the church. Besides these a brass cross and Eucharistic lights have been put in place.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

The Detroit Episcopal City Mission, among the many services it renders in the community, is a clearing-house of information relative to persons who go from parson to parson soliciting immediate money with harrowing tales. So useful has this service proved among the Episcopal clergy of Detroit that the Detroit Council of Churches recently recognized the mission, by a resolution, as their agency for similar purposes.

At St. Paul's Cathedral the Detroit Chapter of the Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses entertained one hundred and thirty student nurses at dinner. Addresses were given by Bishop and Mrs. Herman Page, and by Dean Johnson, chaplain of the Guild. After-dinner games were played in the lounge room of the Cathedral House. A questionnaire revealed that of the total, forty-five were Methodist, twenty-seven Episcopalian, twenty-three Presbyterian and eleven Roman Catholic. Practically all had come from outside Detroit. Curiously enough, apparently none of them had been commended to Detroit churches by the ministers of their home towns.

St. Columba's, Detroit, is not a wealthy parish, but it is a generous one. For some years the church has had a tiny wooden church, a large parish house and a considerable, although decreasing debt. Recently it completed a successful drive for $100,000 for the commencement of a new church. On top of that, the parish oversubscribed its missionary quota by $500. On top of that, it took the said $500, and in token of its thankfulness to God, sent $250 towards the erection of the new St. Matthew's parish house, $100 towards the rebuilding of the church at Dexter, and $150 to the Archdeacon, to be used at his discretion.

A religious census of the University of Michigan showed the following religious preferences among the 9,390 students reached (the total enrollment is a little over 10,000). No preference, 2,027; Methodist, 1,156; Presbyterian, 1,205; Episcopalian, 841; Roman Catholic, 736; Jewish, 653; Baptist, 421; Lutheran, 386; Christian Science, 179. Small numbers of various other groups make up the remainder.

The Diocese, in accordance with a resolution passed at the last convention, will try this year the experiment of holding its annual convention in the winter season. With pre-convention gatherings and social features the dates occupied will be from January 28 to February 3.

At the annual election of officers of the Detroit Clericus, the following were named as officers for 1927: President, the Rev. N. J. Pearson; Vice-President, the Rev. P. C. Bailey; Secretary-Treasurer, the Rev. John W. Ashlee.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

An Important Conference.

An important conference of the Bishop and clergy of the diocese was held in St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral, Grand Rapids, December 15. In spite of the blizzard there was a good attendance. The Rev. Frederick B. Bartlett, Field Secretary of the National Council, was present, representing the Bishops' Crusade.

The purpose of the conference was to discuss the Bishops' Crusade, and the plans necessary for carrying on. Owing to various causes Western Michigan is not to have outside crusaders, and is to depend on itself in doing the work.

Mr. Bartlett spoke at length on the Crusade. His address was encouraging; and in the discussion following Mr. Bartlett was full of helpful suggestions.

In addition to the work being done by the parish clergy in carrying out the plans from headquarters, it was decided to have a day—January 7—for the final training of those priests who are to hold preaching missions in different parts of the diocese. The Bishop has arranged for a general exchange of the clergy of the diocese for January 30, when substantially the same message will be delivered to the people of the various parishes and missions.

Farewell to Mr. and Mrs. Sargent.

On the evening of December 15 a delightful affair was arranged for in the parish house of the Pro-Cathedral. Dean Jackson and the vestry invited the Rev. G. P. T. Sargent, Mrs. Sargent, and the vestry of Grace Church to supper; and included the clergy and their wives in the invitation. The supper was in the nature of a farewell to Mr. and Mrs. Sargent, who, after thirteen years in Grand Rapids, and eighteen in the diocese, are leaving to go to Garden City, Long Island, where Mr. Sargent has been called to be Dean of the Cathedral.

Mr. Sargent has been very active in the Diocese, and is well known through its length and breadth. Bishop McCormick in his speech gave figures which showed the remarkable work done in Grace Parish by Mr. Sargent. Other speakers also paid tribute to Mr. Sargent's work, and also to Mrs. Sargent, who has been a large factor in the parish life of Grace Church. The good wishes of the whole diocese go with them to their new work.

ORDINATIONS.

On St. Thomas' Day, in St. Andrew's Church, Alcoa, Tenn., the Rev. Jesse Roy Gregg was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. James M. Maxon, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Tennessee. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Walter C. Whitaker, D. D., Dean of the Convocation of Knoxville, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles L. Wells, Ph. D., Dean of the Theological School at Sewanee. The Rev. Eugene N. Hopper read the Litany, the Rev. George B. Kirwan the Epistle, and the Ven. Henry J. Geiger the Gospel, while the Rev. James R. Sharp acted as chaplain to the Bishop. All the priests named united in the Imposition of Hands. The Rev. Mr. Gregg continues in charge of the mission at Alcoa, where he has spent his diaconate.

On Tuesday, November 9, in All Saints' Church, Valley City, N. D., the Rt. Rev. J. Poyntz Tyler, D. D., Bishop of North Dakota, ordained the Rev. Thomas A. Simpson to the Priesthood of the Church. Mr. Simpson was presented by the Rev. N. E. Elsworth of Jamestown, and the Rev. C. H. Collett of Grand Forks preached the sermon. The Rev. Mr. Simpson will continue his work as priest in charge of All Saints' Church, Valley City.

On November 14, Twenty-fourth Sunday after Trinity, in Christ Church, Mandan, N. D., the Rt. Rev. J. Poyntz Tyler, D. D., Bishop of North Dakota, ordained the Rev. George W. Thom to the priesthood of the Church. The Rev. F. H. Davenport of Bismarck presented the candidate and preached the sermon. The Rev. H. H. Welsh, a Sioux Indian clergyman, read the Litany. The Rev. Mr. Thom will continue in charge of the Missions at Mandan and Linton.

On December 21, 1926, St. Thomas' Day, in St. George's Church, Flushing N. Y., the Bishop of Long Island advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Roscoe Thornton Foust. The Rev. Benjamin Mottram acted as Master of Ceremonies, and the Rev. William J. Dietrich as the Bishops' Chaplain. The Litany was read by the Rev. William A. Sparks, thee Epistle by the Rev. Lester Leake Riley, and the Gospel by the Rev. George F. Taylor, rector of St. George's. The sermon was preached by Bishop Stires.

The Magi.

No temple minarets loom white
Against the steel blue vaulted night,
They hear no tones of solemn choir,
Nor stand they by an altar fire;
Their frankincense, with myrrh and gold,
No sanctuary chest doth hold;
The holy courts are closed to them,
But aliens in Jerusalem.

In Bethlehem among the poor,
Balthasar, Gaspar, Melchior,
Found Christ, while in the city near
Men worshipped God—in pride and fear.

A star shines out—a temple light
Amid the steel blue vault of night,
The sacred chants to God arise
In Mary's soft sung lullabies;
They worship by a crib of straw,
Their treasury a stable floor,
Yet freely here is opened them
The court of heaven in Bethlehem.

In Bethlehem among the poor,
Balthasar, Gaspar, Melchior,
Found Christ the King, and e'en mayst thou
Find Him in lowly places now!

—Rev. G. H. Williams.

Advent Lessons From Bethlehem.

He was the first Christmas present. That He should be born of a virgin was wonderful, but not so wonderful as the fact that He should be incarnated at all. When we question the Virgin Birth of Christ we question the veracity of Matthew and Luke, deny the fulfillment of prophecy (Genesis 3:15, Isaiah 7:14) and consequently assail the inspiration of the Bible, strip Christ of His spotlessness and His Deity, and thereby nullify the atoning work on the cross.

The greatest lesson to be learned is the purpose of His coming into this world of sin. "He was manifested to take away our sins; and in Him is no sin . . . . For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that He might destroy the works of the devil."—1 John 3:5-8.

"But when the fulness of time was come, God sent forth His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons."—Galatians 4:4-5.

"Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also Himself likewise took part of the same; that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil."—Hebrews 2:14.—Rev. V. V. Morgan.

A Christmas Story.

Not long ago there lived in the city of Marseilles an old shoemaker, loved and honored by all his neighbors who called him "Father Martin". One Christmas Eve Father Martin, who had been reading the story of the three wise men who brought gifts to the infant Jesus, said to himself:

"If only tomorrow were the first Christmas Day and the Saviour were coming to this world tonight, how I would serve and adore him! I know very well what I would give him."

He arose and took from a shelf two little shoes, "Here is what I would give him, my finest work. How pleased his mother would be! But what am I thinking of?" he continued, smiling. "Does the Saviour need my poor shop and my shoes?"

But that night Father Martin had a dream. He thought that the voice of Jesus Himself said to him, "Martin, you have wished to see me. Watch the street tomorrow from morning until evening, for I shall pass your window. But you must try your best to recognize me for I shall not make myself known to you."

When he awoke the next morning Father Martin, convinced that what he had dreamed would surely take place, hastened to put his shop in order, lighted his fire, drank his coffee, and then seated himself at the winow to watch the passersby. He had often seen the picture of Jesus in the churches, so he felt sure he would know him when he went by.

The first person he saw was a poor street sweeper who was trying to warm himself, for it was bitter cold.

"Poor man," said Martin to himself. "He must be very cold. Suppose I offer him a cup of coffee."

He tapped on the window and called to the man, who did not have to be urged to accept the steaming coffee.

After watching in vain for an hour, Father Martin saw a young woman miserably clothed, carrying a baby. She was so pale and thin that the heart of the poor cobbler was touched, and he called to her, "You don't look very well", he said.

"I am going to the hospital," replied the woman. "I hope they will take me in with my child. My husband is at sea, and I've been expecting him home for three months. I am sick and haven't a cent."

"Poor thing!" said the old man. "You must eat some bread while you are getting warm. No? Well, take a cup of milk for the little one. Come, warm yourself and let me take the baby. Why! You haven't put his shoes on."

"He hasn't any," sighed the woman. "Wait a minute. I have a pair."

And the old man brought the shoes which he had looked at the evening before, and put them on the child's feet. They fitted perfectly. The young woman went away full of gratitude, and Father Martin went back to his post.

Hour after hour went by, and although many people passed the window, the Master did not come. When it grew dark the old man sadly began to prepare his humble supper. "It was a dream," he murmured. "Well, I did hope. But He has not come." After supper he fell asleep in his chair. Suddenly the room seemed full of people whom he had aided during the day, and each one asked of him in turn, "Have you not seen me?"

"But who are you?" cried the shoemaker to all these visions.

Then the little child pointed to the Bible on the table, and his rosy finger showed the old man this passage:

"Whosoever shall receive one of these little ones reveiveth me." "I was an hungered and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger and ye took me in. . . . Verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

—The Yeoman Shield.

An Ideal Prayer.

Not more of light I ask, O God,
But eyes to see what is;
Not sweeter songs, but ears to hear
The present melodies.

Not more of sterngth, but how to use
The power that I possess;
Not more of love, but skill to turn
A frown to a caress.

Not more of joy, but how to feel
Its kindling presence near,
To give to others all I have
Of courage and of cheer.

No other gifts, dear God, I ask,
But only sense to see
How best those precious gifts to use
Thou hast bestowed on me.

Give me all fears to dominate,
All holy joys to know,
To be the friend I wish to be,
To speak the truth I know.

To love the pure, to seek the good,
To lift with all my might
All souls to dwell in harmony
In Freedom's perfect Light.

Tom Sawyer's COMING BACK

Yes, right into your own home, in the Pathfinder. Tom is alive again with all his impishness, his hair-raising experiences, his escapades, his thrilling rescues, his quest for adventure—the very same Tom Sawyer who made Mark Twain famous—and he's coming to you in the Pathfinder. The Pathfinder editor is spending a lot of money so that everybody may have a chance to read this most popular of all American stories. The only way to secure this story except in costly book form is to read the Pathfinder. Every week the Pathfinder is loaded down with just the things you want to read—world news and pictures, brilliant editorials, stories, travel articles, puzzles, humor and miscellany. The Pathfinder is the nation's most helpful and entertaining weekly magazine with nearly five million readers—and it comes to you direct from the seat of government. Not sold on newsstands or streets. Mark Twain's masterpiece, Tom Sawyer, will begin in the Pathfinder early in 1927. Why not use a Pathfinder subscription, including Tom Sawyer, for Xmas gifts? You can get the Pathfinder every week for one year, 52 issues, for only $1. 3 subscriptions, $2. Gift announcement cards, giving your name as donor, mailed if desired. If you do not know the Pathfinder and wish to see it, we will send it on trial for 3 months, 13 issues for 15c, coin or stamps.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Every wayside flower bears a smile from Heaven.

The man who knows the real value of time will never be niggardly in spending it for God.—Rev. Wm. Porkess.

Speakest thou for God? Speak well;
Nor slight the mission of the King;
Spare no eloquence to tell
The vital message which you bring.

Of the one million people in Buenos Aires there are probably a few hundred men on any given Sunday at religious services.—Missionary Review.

"No deathly angel 'twixt my face and Thine;
But stoop Thyself to gather this life's rose,
And smile away my mortal to divine."

We have each of us a chapter to supply in the biography of Christ, and until each believer has written down what the Lord has done for his soul the biography is still incomplete.—The Rev. J. D. Jones, D. D.

In the service of God is "perfect freedom"; let us remember that this means among many other gifts, freedom from sadness, from depression, from gloomy forebodings. To "serve the Lord with gladness" is to do Him honor, to commend His service to others.

"A bright New Year and a sunny track
Along an upward way,
And a song of praise on looking back
When the year has passed away,
And golden sheaves not small nor few,
This is my New Year's wish for you!"

He is near to those who want Him, within touch of those that cry to Him on account of their pain and necessity and penitence. How much we lose by imagining that God will come at some incalculated and immeasurable period, and do wonders in the world. He comes now; arrives with the dawn, morning by morning.—Joseph Parker.

Seen from this side, the ministry of Death parts a man from dear ones, but, oh! if we could see round the turn in the corridor, we should see that the solitude is but for a moment, and that the true office of Death is not so much to part from those beloved on earth as to carry to, and unite with, Him that is best beloved in the heavens, and in Him with all His saints.—Alexander McLaren.

In the East is found a wood so fragrant that when buried a foot deep in the earth it yet continues to fill the air with sweetness; the Christian's Spirit must similarly make itself felt, however hidden and silent. But we are not only to make ourselves felt in suggestion and insinuation, we must stand prepared on occasion to avow Christ at all risks, to witness for Him whatever it costs. For our sake, our brother's sake, for Christ's sake, we must tell what a Saviour we have found, or the subtle truth will be revenged upon us in subtle and painful ways.—W. L. Watkinson.

EDITORIALS

Vol. 92. RICHMOND, VA., JANUARY 8, 1927. No. 2.

PARAGRAPHIC RELIGION

"A HAPPY AND PROSPEROUS NEW YEAR TO YOU!" So runs the conventional New Year's Greeting. The two words "happy" and "prosperous" are always inseparably linked, as though they were synonymous. It creates the wrong emphasis. Prosperity does not make happiness, it only contributes to it. Poverty undoubtedly creates much misery, and wealth can do much toward acquiring the necessities and luxuries that add to physical comfort, but true happiness is built up from within the individual, coming from the heart, and cannot be bought with a price. On December 28, a man with $29,000 in his pockets, all his own and honestly acquired, was so unhappy that he committed suicide.

It is true of a nation as well as an individual. Today our Congressmen are pondering over the problem of the mounting millions of surplus in the treasury. It will be well for us all to take as our New Year's message the wise words of warning of the great author of the Book of Deuteronomy, chapter 8, verses 11-12-13, and half of 14, "Beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God, in keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day; Lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein; And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied; Then thy heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God".

THREE HUNDRED CRUSADERS are now assigned to eighty-five dioceses and missionary districts. What of your parish? Have you chosen your missioner? Let vestries, as well as clergy, take a part in this movement, and give thought to this great Crusade. Committees on organization, attendance and follow-up should be appointed at once. Delegates, no doubt, have already been selected to attend the mass meeting of the diocese. The more men who attend these preliminary gatherings, the greater will be the spread of the inspiration from the assembling of many persons with a common purpose. The first thing necessary to the success of this great effort is the spread of a feeling of confidence in its triumphant outcome. Literature on the subject is as follows: Bulletin No. 14, Suggestions for Intercessions; No. 15, List of Books Relating to Evangelism; Form No. 1, Decision Cards; Bulletin No. 20, The Follow up of the Crusade. The Crusade Hymnal including Litany and Prayers, and material for private devotions, can be obtained from each diocesan chairman at $3.20 per hundred.

THE NICKELS AND DIMES collected from all sorts of people at moving picture shows, and in theatres throughout the country for the completion of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, produced some real dividends on December 5, when a great mass meeting was held in the Cathedral for the benefit of the American Christian Committee for Jewish Relief. The speakers were Bishop Manning, Major-General O'Ryan (Roman Catholic), Lewis Marshall (Hebrew), the Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, D. D. (Congregational), and General Pershing. There were hymns and prayers between the speeches. In spite of very inclement weather more than fifteen hundred persons were present to listen to the pleas for contributions to suffering Jews in Russia, Poland and other parts of Europe. The writer well remembers when he was requested by the Jewish manager of a large theatre, owned by a Roman Catholic, to make "a three-minute talk for the New York Cathedral for which a collection would be taken by the theatre ushers". The character of the meeting held on December 5 will justify the universal appeal that was made for funds. Long may this beautiful building continue to offer hospitality to such cosmopolitan gatherings to inspire sympathy and help for God's suffering children throughout the world, of all creeds and faiths.

THE RELIABLE BOOTLEGGER is abroad in the land. Very much abroad he is here today, and gone tomorrow. The more business he builds up the greater the necessity for him to move on. The very nature of his trade makes him a migratory character. He deals with all the protection of an illegal transaction. If he sells poisoned whiskey, as he often does, there is no recourse, because the purchase was contributing to the violation of the law in buying. Yet this mythical being, this impossible person, has a real existence in the imagination of some people. We heard the other day of a good woman, a leader in Church and society activities saying perfectly seriously, "I have a very reliable bootlegger, from whom I get my supply, but I caution my family not to drink anything away from home". It is good people of this sort who help to make necessary the printing of such newspaper headlines as these, "Eleven Die in New York From Poison Liquor", "Four Fatalities In Des Moines From Bad Whiskey". These tragedies occur in all parts of the country, largely because the "best people" refuse to take seriously the Constitution of the United States, and create a market for illegal trade.

STATIC FROM MARS is interfering with our radio communications is the view expressed recently by an eminent scientist. In his opinion the inhabitants of Mars, or some other planet have far more powerful radio apparatus than anything we have yet produced, and in trying to communicate with us they smother our feeble efforts.

Years ago any man making such a statement would have been considered a candidate for the lunatic asylum, but today strange things are happening so rapidly that it is merely noticed as a possible solution of perplexing problems and we hold our breath and wait for the next amazing discovery.

Some may feel that science will supersede religion, but there is no cause for such alarm. The more wonderful the resources of earth, air and water that are discovered, the more extraordinary is the God behind them all. So far from minimizing religion these things only enlarge the scope of God's power, and, since "God is Love", how great, how infinitely tender is that surrounding care and protection that enwraps us, His children!

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

RADIO RELIGION

By The Reverend Edwin J. van Etten, D. D.,

Rector of Calvary Church, Pittsburgh.

"The wind bloweth where it listeth."—St. John 33:8.

I SUPPOSE that every great value has its corresponding dangers. Every gain seems to be offset by certain losses. Every change means a certain readjustment. This is the way it is with every new discovery and invention. Every improvement of machinery means changed conditions and necessary readjustments. So it was with the steam engine. So it was in the textile industry. So it is with all the forms of electricity and the invention of the telephone and telegraph. There has been a revolution in the various fields of industry due to these new inventions. Many men have been thrown out of work. Many forms of business have had to "go under". Conditions of living have been greatly changed. More than half of our people are now living in cities. With the great gains of centralization and efficiency have come also great losses and many inevitable readjustments.

We are thinking about the case of radio in connection with the broadcasting of church services. The marvelous development of this new invention, especially during the last few years, brings us face to face with certain very real problems. It is absolutely certain that we face many changes and readjustments in connection with church services. It would of course take a prophet or the son of a prophet to say exactly what these changes are going to be. Yet any one today thinking earnestly on the subject, can perhaps note certain lines of inevitable change. We want if possible, to guard against losses and dangers and at the same time make fullest use of the possibilities of this new invention.

First of all as to some of the dangers. It may be that the radio broadcasting of church services will prove something of a disintegrating force to the church organizations themselves. People may stay home from church and "listen in" at home. There may be a decrease in the church attendance and of course a corresponding decrease in the churches' financial support. I should hate to see the day when radio were in any way used for collections or financial appeals. If the radio keeps people away from church to any large extent, it seems likely that certain results will follow.

The day will come when every parson will not be a preacher. Of course this does not mean that he will leave the ministry. He may do something very much better along the lines of education and pastoral work, but people will "listen in" to the sermons they like the best. Some one has ventured the rather surprising guess that ninety per cent of the present preachers will quit preaching. The preaching business faces a tremendous economic conflict and perhaps many preachers will be "out of a job". There is no way to avoid this fundamental sifting process in the economic field. The fittest preachers will survive. Many others will quit preaching and do something else.

It may be that the churches will learn the lesson of the automobile and the moving pictures and will themselves use the radio services in such a way as to hold their people. When all is said however, it may be true that many struggling churches will more or less go to the wall. Their people will prefer the better city church's services. It seems to me very likely that we are facing days of greater centralization and indeed competition in church services. I do not see what is gained by blinking these almost inevitable results. We may deplore them. To a certain extent we may prevent them, but they would seem to be part of the price of this new development.

On the other hand I want to speak of certain advantages. There are advantages to particular persons.

Think of the parson himself. When a man realizes that he is speaking to a vast unseen congregation, there comes a certain broadening of view and a certain access of spiritual force. He simply must look out beyond his own four walls and realize that the life of the spirit is not confined by any such barrier. If religion is anything at all, it is something common to all men. He must meet it and speak of it in this way.

When I go down the street Monday morning I can realize as never before a great sense of common humanity. The newspaper boy, the policeman on the corner, the man in the automobile garage, the clerks in the shops, the cashier in the bank, all greet one with a friendly comment on the last night's sermon. Many of them are people who at present could not be induced to go to church. I think that it is good for us parsons to have our horizon extended even though the growing pains may be somewhat painful.

Every week I get dozens of letters. They are mostly from people who are sick and shut-in. They are pathetic letters and yet they shine with a new interest and a new hope. Sometimes persons have beeu shut off from church services for years and never expected to hear another service. Many of them are in hospitals. Some of them are in remote country districts, in coal mining villages and distant farms, snowbound by impassable sable country roads. Some of them are boys and young people staying at home with this new and wonderful interest in the radio instead of hanging around the street corners. There are many family groups sitting around their table or fireplace. There is the possibility of a rediscovered family altar in some very real sense. If the family could again be made the source of moral and religious teaching, I venture to say that this gain alone would compensate for every loss to the churches.

There are advantages to the churches. I believe that the radio offers a wholesome challenge to the churches themselves. I rejoice that at last in this way we may perhaps be compelled to "make good" or to go out of business. I accept the challenge with great enthusiasm and trust to the underlying values in the Church to win the day. When I remember that more than fifty per cent of our American people have no connection with the Churches or with organized religion, it seems to me high time that we confronted some kind of a challenge. Maybe we must change our methods and our manner of work. Perhaps I can sum up what I feel the Churches should do by saying that we must speak a language better understood by the people. Our own Church has an incomparable liturgy written in the most beautiful and wonderful English. I do not suppose that one person out of three can really understand or appreciate it. Even worse are the formal and set phrases which come to be used in extempore prayer and extempore worship. They are every bit as formal and simply lack the beauty of a liturgical form of worship. Many of our words are hollow and unreal. We speak in set phrases, we repeat old words. I mean such words as "sin" and "salvation" and "grace". I do not say there are no such realities. I say that we do not put any real meaning into them. This danger in antiquated and meaningless phrases is to me far more real than any dangers of the radio. If the radio can help to "show us up" and drive us to something better it will indeed serve a real turn. I hear with dismay the repetition of age-worn words which can no longer hold the stirrings and aspirations and point of view of the men of today. I hear with even greater dismay the manifestations of ignorance and fear and ill will which seem to greet any departure from the old and meaningless conventionalities. Cries of "Heretic", "Radical", "Bolshevist", "Red" seem all too ready to fly at the head of any one who dares suggest any new departure. I think it is high time to develop a new manner of speech and to break down old walls of pride and prejudice.

As I speak these words I suppose there are tens of thousands of people listening in. The fact that you have radio receiving sets probably disposes you somewhat in favor of the radio services. You are not predisposed to think that you are doing the "work of the devil" in listening in tonight! I want to tell you as plain as I can two things: radio religion is not a substitute for public worship. You can hear the spoken words and the music, but I doubt if one in ten of you can really enter into the spirit of worship. You are sermon tasters, and service tasters. Many of our churches have put false emphasis on the sermon. That is one reason why they are already half empty. You can read better sermons at home. Two of my old grandfather ancestors were parsons in little New England towns. The word "parson" really means "person". They were indeed the persons of the town. Most of the people did not have newspapers or books in any wide extent. They came to Church for information. That day has largely gone. Many persons in the pews are far better informed than the parson in the pulpit. But listening to a sermon or to a service is not religion. Religion is always a matter of the second person, singular. Boys and girls in grammar school will know what I mean. The first person is the speaker, I. The second person is the person spoken to, you. The third person is the person spoken of, he, she or it. Radio religion makes the mistake of being a religion of the third person. You are listening to me talk about religion. You are listening to the choir sing about it. You are not yourself engaging in a religious service. Worship is a matter between you and God. Unless you yourself are trying to speak to God or "listen in" for God to speak to you, you are not religious. You are missing the essential part of a Church service. I do not mean the collection! I mean the whole atmosphere of common prayer to God and praise to His Holy Name. "Listening in" over the wireless can never take the place of the Church service because it utterly fails to provide the real nub of the matter. I remember when the phonograph first came into general use, people said it would mark the end of musical concerts. They were quite wrong. It simply advertised music far and wide. It could not produce personality and the atmosphere of a real human occasion. Of course radio religion omits entirely the sacraments of the Church. You can not be baptized over the radio, nor can you come to the Holy Table by means of wireless. I have heard of a case of marriage, so-called, by radio. One is so sorry to hear of so solemn an occasion made the vehicle of a cheap sensationalism. Dozens of persons speak to me after Church service and say they thought they would come round to see what the Church was like. There is a human personal touch in the fellowship of people meeting together which cannot possibly be provided over the wireless.

The second thing I want to say is this: radio religion must become active and not passive. It is all very well for you to sit at home smoking your cigar in your big arm chair. It may be very pleasant on a cold winter night to sit there in front of the fire. There is always a danger in the easier way. To slouch back in one's seat in matters of religion is just as distressing as to slouch back in one's seat in society. It is distressing, if I may say so, not so much to God as to yourself. It is disrespectful not so much to God as to your own spirit. The vital things of life and of the spirit require effort and constant sacrifice. You cannot be a "stay-at-home" religious man. You may stay at home but you will grow less and less religious. I am speaking now not so much for the sake of the Churches as for your own sake. Of course I am not referring to those who are ill or shut-in by sickness or by distance. I am not speaking to those who have gone to some place of public worship on this Sunday morning. I am talking to those who may be tempted to rest satisfied with an armchair sort of religion. You will admit that I have spoken with some frankness and I hope with fairness to the short-comings of the Churches. I feel it is a fifty-fifty matter. Half of the fault may be with the Churches. Where is the other fifty per cent?

Why don't you come and help us make the Churches what they ought to be? In any case you must see to it that there is some definite and regular response in your life to the suggestions and the inspirations which come to you by means of the radio religion.

AN EPIPHANY STORY

By the Reverend Joseph T. Ware

WE ARE all familiar with the story of the Wise Men, who brought gifts of gold and frankincense and myrrh to the Infant Jesus. Ordinarily, we assume that there were three of these Wise Men; but, when we read our Bibles carefully, we see that nowhere are we told just how many there were.

One story has it that there were not three, but six, of these Wise Men, who, led in some mysterious way by God, met at a lonely desert cross-roads to journey together to worship the Infant Saviour. Three brought gold and frankincense and myrrh; but the others brought also, the one a pearl of priceless value; the other a rich treasure of silver; and the last an alabaster box filled with precious perfume.

So these six men traveled on their camels, lurching along under the torrid desert sun, hot and dusty and thirsty often, but counting it well worth-while that they might follow the leading of God.

One day, however, they came to a well in the desert. By this well stood a beautiful young woman with a water pitcher. "Sirs," she said, "the well is deep; ye have nothing wherewith to draw; let me, I pray you, give to you and to your camels to drink." The men accepted her courteous offer: and, as they moistened their parched throats with the clear, cool water, they talked with the young woman. "My father's tent," she told them, "is but a short distance away, just beyond that nearest dune: ye must come with me, and he will receive and entertain you."

"Nay," replied the Wise Men, "but we are led of God on a holy mission. We may not tarry." Nevertheless, as the maiden urged them, one of the Wise Men, observing her to be very charming and graceful, said to the others, "It would be churlish to decline this hospitality: do ye go your way: I will abide with this worthy man: and on the morrow, mounted upon my fleet camel, I will speedily overtake you".

But the next day, although the five Wise Men often shaded their eyes and peered into the East, they never again saw their companion; for he had fallen in love, and given to the woman he met at the well the priceless pearl.

So the five Wise Men journeyed on until they came to the great city of Damascus. Here they determined to spend a night at the inn. Four of the Wise Men retired shortly after dinner, desiring to enjoy a much-needed sleep, and to depart upon their mission at the earliest hour possible upon the morrow. But the fifth Wise Man strolled out among the bazaars; at first he merely peered at the curiously wrought products of many lands; but soon he realized that here were wonderful opportunities of using his silver in trade, thereby enriching himself, and opening up a profitable commerce for his native land in the Far East. So he sent back word to the inn—he had not quite the courage to go himself—that he must needs spend a few hours next day in private business, but that he would certainly overtake his companions before they had ridden many leagues to the south and west.

So the Four Wise Men journeyed on; but, although they often shaded their eyes and looked behind them, they never again saw the Wise Man who had stayed behind at Damascus; for he had spent all his silver, and, besides, was too engrossed in business to spare time to continue his search for the Infant King.

The four Wise Men came at length to Jericho. In those days, this was a very pleasant city, noted for the culture, luxury, and hospitality of its inhabitants. No sooner were the Wise Men established in their hostel, than a certain citizen of the town sent his servant inviting them to be his guests at an evening of singing and dancing, and to partake of a sumptuous banquet which he had caused to be prepared in their honor. Three of the Wise Men pleaded excuses; but the fourth insisted upon accepting the invitation. Early next morning, however, when the others were about to begin their journey, this man could not be found. He had not returned to the hostel; and his companions were told by the town crier that there had been a drunken revel at his host's home throughout the night. So the three journeyed on; and although they often shaded their eyes and looked back, never again did they see the fourth Wise Man, for he had poured out the alabaster box of precious perfume upon his host, and had no offering to lay at the feet of the Infant King.

So the Child Jesus received only gold and frankincense and myrrh, and not the priceless pearl, and the treasure of silver. and the alabaster box of precious perfume. So there were three Wise Men only who came to reverence Him; and there were three foolish Wise Men who did not come because, the one, of an earthly love, the other, of business, and the third, of pleasure.

Have you ever thought that Christ means either nothing —or everything? If there is a Good God; if honor and duty are abiding realities; if love and sacrifice are the laws of life; if our years on earth are a journey Godward whereby we may attain eternal blessedness—if what Jesus stood for is true, then there is nothing else of comparable importance, then we are senseless and stupid as were the foolish Wise Men if we let anything—loves or businesses or pleasures—interfere with our coming to Him.

THE NEED, POSSIBILITY AND METHOD OF A UNITED CHURCH

By the Reverend David A. MacMurray, D. D.

By The Reverend David A. MacMurray, D. D.

THERE cannot but be deep appreciation among Protestant Christians for the movement of these days in behalf of formal Christian Unity. A host of Christians of every Communion believe in Christian Unity and work for it. The Conference on "Faith and Order", which is to meet at Lausanne in 1927, will afford an opportunity to every Christian Communion to be represented there and thus to show its Faith in this greatly desired end, a United Church.

It is not something foreign to the trend of the times, but one in harmony with what is everywhere being sought. We see this in the education of today, which is seeking a "more comprehensive plan"; we see it in business with its Chambers of Commerce, as a sort of national and international exchange; we see it in industry with its workingmen's union and its international bureau of labor; and we see it in political government with its League of Nations. Years of effort in thought and prayer and committee conferences, both here and in England and elsewhere, by leading representatives of many Communions, have been given to what this coming conference seeks to bring about. It will be international in its scope and most impressive in its deep spiritual desire to have answered the prayer of our Lord: "That they all may be one as Thou Father art in me and I in Thee, that they may be one in Us." And the purpose of it as stated in its agenda is in harmony with that of the Master: "That through His Church, the non-Christian world should be converted and all human society purified and inspired, a purpose which cannot be fulfilled but by a United Church."

The need for a "United Church" is evident. The Churches of our day have caught a vision of world-needs and because of that vision the movement for formal Christian Unity has been stimulated. We are seeing that a United Church is necessary to meet those needs and to be jointly responsible for them. The very needs, both at home and abroad, are causing many thinkers among us to despair of the future of civilization. But this is certain that there are in every Communion those who believe that "the gigantic problems" of our time cannot be met through the efforts of separate denominations alone, however strong and aggressive they be, but require a united phalanx of all of them working together, unitedly undertaking the one great task of bringing on earth the Kingdom of God, so happily phrased by Dr. Peabody as "a spiritual fellowship of consecrated lives". This conference at Lausanne will be a great opportunity to every Communion in Christendom so to come together. It will be no uprush of a sudden emotionalism, but the result of a process that has been going forward steadily for years. And evidences are on every hand of the practicableness of closer denominational contacts, such as the Community Churches already functioning, the Federation of Churches, both local and national, and the Inter-Church Conference on Missions. These are steps toward the greater unity contemplated and show that what is contemplated can be neither foolish nor impossible, neither merely idealistic nor quixotic.

If we look thoughtfully at this Conference and its purpose in the light of the world's needs of our time surely it will make a reasonably strong appeal to us; but when we see it in the light of the needs of the foreign field alone, it will become to us an urgent necessity. Away back in 1900, we are told, that necessity was felt. Then and long before that year, it was realized that there were not only "needless duplication and expense" on the foreign field, but also that "denominational forms of Christianity cast serious reproach upon the Kingdom of God" in the minds of those among whom our missionaries did their evangelistic and educational work. There is comity on the foreign field now but that is not enough. An arresting portrayal of the need for a present-day united interdenominational approach to the mission problem may be had by consulting an article by Professor A. G. Baker in the Journal of Religion, July, 1926, on a survey of the thought concerning Foreign Missions for the last twenty-five years. There is no doubt but that a pressing need on the Foreign field calls for a United Church movement to win India and China and Africa for Christ. Can we not then unite our denominational forces for the sake of that need?

I believe that such a union of denominational forces is possible. There are many differences among us and some of these are a part of our deepest convictions. As Baptists, for example, we have certain convictions, "first principles" of our Christian faith, we call them, which appear to us to be needed still in our world and to be faithfully adhered to and proclaimed. This Conference has in its agenda a place and time for consideration of a creed for the United Church. It is a Conference on "Faith". What "Faith" or creed shall be adopted? Now Baptists would resist strongly any fixed statement of belief to be received as authoritatively binding. They look upon the great creeds of the Church with reverence and, perhaps, "as aids to the religious life", but never to be "imposed upon the individual Christian, the local Church, or the denomination, as externally authoritative and binding".

These last words are those of Dr. Douglas Clyde Macintosh, Dwight Professor of Theology, in Yale University, taken from his article on "The Baptists and Church Union" and to be found in the Crozier Quarterly of July 1926. The whole statement is worth repeating. He writes: "Historically Baptists have constantly maintained that no fixed form of creedal statement should be imposed upon the individual Christian, the local Church, or the denomination, as externally authoritative and binding". And I find that Dr. E. Y. Mullins, President of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, at Louisville, Kentucky, is in agreement with Dr. Macintosh on this point. Dr. Mullins writes in the Hibbert Journal: "That no such thing as an authoritative creed was ever promulgated by any group of Baptists . . . . Sometimes Confessions of Faith", he continues, "were adopted by certain Baptist groups, but they have no binding authority whatever".

The reason of this Baptist attitude to a credo is found in their acceptance of the New Testament as the sufficient rule of faith and practice and with this, as the very core of it, "loyalty to Christ". Dr. Macintosh is a Baptist and a member of the Northern Baptist Convention through his Church representation, while Dr. Mullins is a representative of the Southern Baptist Convention, and these two leading teachers confirm our view that strong resistance would be made by Baptists against a fixed creed. But would this difference form a barrier to Christian Unity? Or any other difference as to the so-called "Sacraments", or "order" of the ministry, or "Church polity?" These differences show the necessity of getting together around a Conference table and, face to face, understandingly and appreciatively, obtaining other points of view.

Besides unity would not mean uniformity. We can never all be of one mind. But we can all be of one purpose. "We may still differ," says Professor William Adams Brown, "in much and feel bound to defend our differences, but we shall differ as fellow-disciples and as fellow-worshippers". And Professor George Cross, of the University of Rochester, writes of a "unity in which all values of the free and unimpeded life and thought of the Churches cooperating will be preserved". A united Church, therefore, would seek to make room in its institutional expression for differences and dearly held convictions. There would be variety but not uniformity. Uniformity would destroy the Christian freedom of the individual. The united Church would function through "unity in variety".

It should be a unity, therefore, that would include individual religious freedom in relation to God and His Word, variety of attitudes and experience, and room for progress in Christian truth and life under the guidance of the Holy Spirit of truth. Speaking of unity and liberty in regard to Christian unity, Dr. Mullins says that "both are spiritual principles of the highest value. Liberty is possible without formal unity. But unity without liberty is a contradiction". Any kind of unity without either variety or liberty would be disastrous to the whole Protestant movement for Christian unity. There need be no sacrifice of convictions. If we have certain convictions that serve us as a barbed-wire barrier against worshipping and fellowshipping with other Christians then we would better re-examine them in the light that lighteneth every one that cometh into the world.

"See the Christ Stand!
He gazes—tears are in His eyes, and in His ears
The murmur of one thousand years!"

Waiting until we Christians see more in Him than in Christology, more in His Spirit than words or names, more in His redemptive love than in "orders", or in statements of belief. Do you ask what is the mission of a Church? Let Father Tyrrell, whatever his like or dislikes, answer: "The Church's Commission was to teach and propagate a new life, a new love, a new hope, a new Spirit—to teach what Christ taught and no more and in the way He taught it, and not otherwise". Christian unity which will recognize that kind of a mission will center around Christ and cannot but be a dynamic of the Christ will and motive.

Why then should not every Christian denomination be represented at Lausanne? There will be much to gain and nothing of value to lose on the part of any representative at that conference. It will have no power to pledge or commit those Churches participating in it. Its way is the way of understanding and of love. Old prejudices will be dissolved. New appreciations will be stirred and there will be felt a joint responsibility for the welfare of a world. "If I knew all, I would love all." Love never separates. It always unites. The story is familiar in regard to Charles Lamb how when a friend sought the privilege of introducing him to a man for whom Lamb had a preconceived dislike, he said: "I don't know him; I don't want to know him. I can never hate a man I know." The round table at Lausanne will react on all who participate in it in a better understanding of those from whom they may differ and that will mean more Christian love. Some one may say: "See how much we are One in Spirit now. See how closely we live together now. See how well we work together and the many good things we do together now." Yes, but the one baffling reply is as it has been repeated again and again: "We do not worship together" and the non-Church world passes by and says: "We have no use for a divided Church or the Sectarian Christianity it represents". What did the non-Church world say of the early Christians? "Behold how these Christians love one another." And may not the latter be what shall be said of the Conference at Lausanne in 1927?

These thoughts on the need for a United Church, and on the possibility of it through unity in variety and the method of the Conference at Lausanne as the method of understanding and of love, should combine to show us that the unity sought is not "unity of machinery". "We do not want unity by machinery any more than we want truth by machinery or prayers by machinery." There are great problems before our Churches and it is strongly believed that corporate action is needed to solve them. The spirits of men are yearning for the solution of them as the spirit of Christ guides them into the greater vision of the world's needs. We have suggested how differences may exist in a great organization of the Churches and yet unity obtain. And one reason of this would be the transcending purpose for the coming on earth of the Kingdom of God. "A common purpose in a great business—" that is Christian Unity when expressed consistently in an institutional form. And we, as Baptists, believe that all questions in regard to faith and order, government and worship, should be something like these: "Are they in harmony with the teachings of Christ?" "That is, Are they true?" "Does the New Testament endorse them?" "Are they in keeping with the revealing spirit of Christ?" That kind of unity I believe in with all my being, and that kind of unity will be productive of rich fruitage in the years as they come. Here is the new apologetic to a world—a United Church. Here will be found every follower of the lowly Nazarene with "one Master, one will and one motive". Why should it be longer delayed—this unity? Is it because "we will not hold out the hand of co-equal fellowship to all whom God has blessed?" Have we all one Father? And are we all serving the One Lord? Listen to what He might say:

"I will take them all under my wings, endow them with my spirit, illumine them with my light, Till all nations shall serve One God, Speak one language, and sing one song."

And shall the Church, His body, fail its Lord, in cooperating with Him in that great work through a union of the Churches so greatly needed in Our World today?

A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDING BISHOP

THE BISHOPS CRUSADE

"Who then is willing to consecrate Himself this day unto the Lord?"

On January 9, the Bishops' Crusade begins. Three hundred bishops, priests, laymen and women of the Church are to carry to the people throughout the land, a call to rededication to Christ and renewal of allegiance to His Cause.

The Crusade is a spiritual movement. It unites the whole Church in pursuit of a single aim: that our own people may put Christ first in their lives and come to "know the love of Christ which passeth all knowledge", and "be filled with all the fullness of God".

The General Convention conceived and authorized the Crusade; the National Commission on Evangelism planned it; diocesan commissions have organized it locally; Crusaders are going forth to carry its message; results now depend upon all the people of the Church.

The Crusade will succeed if the people will prayerfully seek, not only that it may do something for them, but that through them "the work of God should be made manifest" to others.

May the whole Church rally to the colors! May all of us desire and earnestly strive, by prayer and personal effort, for the "renewing of the Holy Ghost; which He shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour".

THE LETTER AND THE SPIRIT.

Today we are paying a little too much attention to the letter. There is need for a more daring spirit which will send us on into new and untried methods and experiences. The Church pauses and consults the past a little too much; we need to go apart from the busy whir of life and listen to the voice of the Spirit and have the courage to adventure.

Religion and business are doing somewhat the same thing, laying emphasis on methods, rather than ends. We need to have our vision of the ends of life clarified and made more compelling. Organization has robbed us of individual responsibleness and the sense of individual usefulness, and this creates strange outbreaks on the part of many people to satisfy their suppressed individuality.

We need to open wide the doors of our souls and let the wind of the Spirit blow through. We need a real conversion, a real turning to the vision of God as it is in Christ for the souls of men. We need to understand His waiting for us, His belief in us, His love for us.—Bishop Bennett, in The Duluth Churchman.

BOOK REVIEWS

GETHSEMANE IN OUR LIVES. By B. A. M. Schapiro. Foreword by the Rt. Rev. Ernest M. Stires, D. D., Bishop of Long Island. Hebrew Christian Publication Society, 405 Bible House, New York.

In this illustrated pamphlet, Mr. Schapiro has written a plea for brotherhood in the Church and Synagogue. With simplicity, Mr. Schapiro tells the story of his own conversion as a boy in his teens from orthodox Judaism to Christianity, and of the work which steadily he has been doing since to carry the Christian Gospel to his own people of Israel. His has not been an easy experience. On the one hand he has had to pay the cost of scorn and hostility from many of those of his own blood who consider him as an outcast; and on the other hand he is not always met with cordial understanding and help upon the part of Christians. Christianity has meant for Mr. Schapiro a hard, high choice which only devotion could maintain.

From the background of this experience Mr. Schapiro writes his "Gethsemane In Our Lives". He tries to make plain mistakes both on the part of Jews and of Christians which prevent a kindly understanding between them and block the appeal which the Gospel of Jesus Christ ought to have to those from whom He Himself came. To the Christians he says: "It must also be remembered that the Jew, like the educated Chinese and Indian, brings to bear on the Christian Church what has been called 'the fresh eye'. He takes at face value the claim of the Church to express the mind of Christ. And when he finds that 'they are not all Israel which are of Israel', it comes to him as a shock. From his youth he has read of the voice that was Jacob's voice, while the hands were the hands of Esau, but it did not occur to him that, in Christ's own fold, the harvest would include tares, as well as wheat; not only sheep, but here and there, a wolf in sheep's clothing. Of course, it takes all sorts to make a world. But, in this sense, ought there to be all sorts in the Church?"

And to his own race of Israel he makes this appeal: "Why do you prefer to live in a Christian, in preference to a heathen or a Mohammedan country? Why are you in peaceful possession of your property in the midst of a law-abiding citizenship? Why are you anxious to be entertained during the outing season in Gentile hostelries, where Christian guests predominate, or to send your children to Christian schools? The answer is, because Christian influence, Christian manners and customs are instinctively preferred by you to all others. Nothing but antiquated prejudice prevents you from coming forward and saying boldly, 'Yes, we love Christ, we must follow His teachings, we hate to be separated from all mankind. We desire to take the place which is justly our own'. For He is not only the Saviour of the world, but also the Son of David, and the Son of Abraham. He came out of Bethlehem Ephratah, a Jewish town. He was brought up among our people. He was the Messiah foretold and expected, the 'desire of the Gentiles' (Haggai 11:7). He taught in Galilee and Judea, and over His cross the words were written, 'Jesus, the King of the Jews'—not merely for a certain period, but for all the ages, as long as this earth stands, and the sun, moon and the stars endure."

At the end of the pamphlet besides over a hundred comments of many leaders in our and other Churches there is an exceedingly striking compilation of several hundred names with twenty-six illustrations of such men as Bishops, Alexander, Helmuth, and Shereshewski. Dr. Edersheim, author of "Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah"; Felix B. Mendelssohn, the composer; Professor Augustus Neander, the Church historian, and others of like calibre. All converts to Christianity from Judaism.

This pamphlet contains about one hundred and sixty pages.

The Hebrew-Christian Publication Society does not sell this booklet, all its literature is free; but it greatly needs voluntary contributions. It would be well for our people to become acquainted with this Society and its commendable endeavor. Send for this booklet. It may lead to the wish for other publications, of which nearly twenty have already been published by this Society. They were all written by the author of "Gethsemane In Our Lives".

CAN A MAN BE A CHRISTIAN TODAY? By William Louis Poteat. The University of North Carolina Press. Chapel Hill, N. C. Pp. 110.

The views on religion of a professor of Biology might not be expected to be inspiring, but this little volume will be found to hold so clear a vision of the cooperation between science and religion, that it will lead many to a firmer faith and a broader vision. The material here presented was used in the McNair Lectures, delivered at the University of North Carolina in 1925. Being addressed to students by one who has had long association with them from a professor's chair, one might expect to find really live material, and this anticipation is well borne out. The author is a Baptist preacher, as well as a teacher of Biology, and with all his scientific knowledge, he has kept a firm hold upon the fervent evangelism of that group of Christians. The three lectures composing the book are entitled: "Today," "Baggage" and "Peace."

The material is broken up into numerous subdivisions, so that it has not the appearance of heavy reading, although it contains material of the highest scholarship. We commend it strongly as one of the best examples of progress in harmonizing religion and science.

ONE THOUSAND CITY CHURCHES. Phases of Adaptation to Urban Environment: By H. Paul Douglass. George H. Doran, New York. Pp. 380.

It is impossible to give more than the merest outline of the purpose and contents of such a book as this in the space at our disposal. It has occupied a large part of the time and attention of several workers from the Institute of Social and Religious Research since the early summer of 1922. The survey method has been used in other professions and sciences for some time, but it is rather a novelty to apply it to religion. The results of examinations of 1,044 churches are given in this book, under a variety of headings and measured by definite standards. These surveys were made by trained workers in cities all over the country, containing between 100,000 and 200,000 population.

The churches so examined were all Protestant, and included all the leading denominations and some Colored groups.

Any city rector will find helpful suggestions that are applicable to his work from the study of this volume, though at first it gives one the impression of a mass of detail statistics. It is illustrated with numerous charts and drawings, showing the proportionate adaptation of churches to their environments. We believe the book will be found useful by any clergyman or layman who has the interest of his Church sufficiently at heart, to be willing to devote considerable time to a real study of its problems.

FICTION FROM E. P. DUTTON & CO., NEW YORK.

The Lunatic In Charge: By J. Storer Clanston.

"The Lunatic In Charge" is just as clever and delightfully written as it can be. One should read it aloud, for it deserves a big audience, for peals of laughter would follow the absurd adventures of the hero. We hope the lunatic may wander for years, dispelling gloomy uneventful days, with dare-devil pranks. Gay, irresponsible, romantic—one turns each page for new witty orginal ideas, and closes the book with a laugh.

M.

Anne's Crime": By R. T. M. Scott: When one is tired and over-worked, "Anne's Crime" will prove delightful reading—restful, refreshing and entertaining is the story. There is not a dull page in the book, the plot is cleverly woven and dramatically told. The story is ended with regret.

The heroine's love for her fiance is their ruin and in bitter remorse, her outlook on life is poisoned by the knowledge that her selfishness has wrecked his life. He leaves his post in time of battle, to answer her summons—is courtmartialed and ordered to be shot—and his escape is miraculous. Our detective is responsible for reuniting these lovers and bringing them in happiness together.

"The Red House Mystery": By A. A. Milne: This book will appeal to the lover of mystery and high class detective stories, for it is attractively written and holds one's interest to the end. The plot is unusual, and the scene laid in a manor house in an English village. The hero lives with his friend and to the world they are as David and Jonathan, but in reality they are plotting and scheming against each other, with fatal results.

To while away a dull afternoon, we recommend this book.

M.

Devices and Desires: By Vera Wheatley: This book is delightful, because it is so human. There is only one strong character drawn, "Mul", but if we look around us how few there are with whom we come in contact, that we can put on a pedestal and overlook their faults. The characters are so vivid, that we feel we can almost look into their homes and picture their thoughts and deeds.

Propinquity and restlessness are the causes of many marriages, and these lines are often true:

"Wanderers in the middle mist,
Who cry for shadows, clutch and cannot tell,
Whether they love at all, or, loving whom."

Dickie's opinions were resolute, and assured, no hesitations in his life. There were but two roads—the right road and the wrong road. He deplored Eve's extravagance of feeling, as wasting—yet he knew he could not alter a disposition. That with her, here "sense is with the senses are mixed in". While she struggled with the problem of their existence together he could not imagine he was not all that his wife could wish. His thoughts were centered on his work; her thoughts on herself, and so she allows an old beau to monopolize her time.

The picture of her as a girl, then married and her joy and grief over her delicate child, is far more attractive than the sordid, disgusting creature she develops into. If the last half of the story were comparable to the first, the book could be heartily recommended, but there is no excuse for such coarseness.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE COMMUNITY

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

A NEW DEPARTURE.

We are beginning this week a series of articles on Child Training, by Dr. Mary Evelyn Brydon, director of the Bureau of Child Welfare with the Virginia State Board of Health. She has had considerable experience in holding Mothers' Institutes and various kinds of conferences on Public Health, and we believe that her short articles on this subject will prove interesting and helpful to our readers. Although scientifically trained, and holding an M. D. Degree from one of the best Medical Colleges in this country, she is a devout Church worker, and a firm believer in the efficacy of spiritual power in the development of life. It will be noticed that she invited correspondence, and we suggest that letters on this subject be addressed to her, personally in care of the Southern Churchman.

COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING.

By Mary Evelyn Brydon, M. D.

I have a message for Christian mothers. My experience with the Parents' Institutes that I have held in the State during the past two years convinces me that there are many mothers who are utterly confused in their ideas in regard to Child Training. There are some who seem to understand their job better than the average mother, and many of these wonderful mothers have talked to me about their methods. It is such methods that seemed to us in conference to have been productive of the best results that I desire to bring to you here.

This is not a new way that I am using to broadcast a message. It is being used by all sorts of people in all sorts of papers and magazines. Some there are who discuss health only; some behavior; some psychology; and some home making. My message will concern the whole child; his mental, moral, physical, social and spiritual training. It sounds like a large order. But I desire to discuss with you the subject of Training the Child for Life in this Generation and shall make comments from time to time under the heading "Comments on Child Training" in this corner as long as the Editor will give me room, which means as long as you are interested. I shall endeavor to answer questions which may arise in your mind concerning the points that I bring up. I shall not do this alone. There are several sources to which I can go to clear up doubtful points. Right here in the office I have nurses, ers, and doctors available, who are at your service. Some of them, in fact most of them, are fathers and mothers. Then I have a splendid rector who is well known throughout the Church. Therefore, you see that when I say I will answer your questions, I mean that I shall see that they are answered by calling on experts in the various fields of thought and life.

My message to you each week will be short. I am a busy mother myself. I have nearly a million children in my State. It is my job to keep them healthy. And I have much to tell you about their health later on. Only first I must discuss an exceedingly important subject with you before we go into the subject of their health or habits or any other of the important matters.

This first most important matter is about their spiritual development. This is the most important thing of all, because it has to do with their soul welfare, and as they are in your care, and are in trust for you to train, I believe the spiritual side of training must be made clear to you. So the first thing is to get straight in your mind what is meant by the spiritual development of a child.

The Source of the Spirit who lives in us is our dear Lord Jesus Christ. Between now and next week will you give some very definite consideration of the Love of Christ which I know you want to come into your little child's heart, and which can enter most surely if you plan for it with the same zest that you plan to supply his material needs, and between now and next week, in order that you may be ready with an open mind for our discussion, I am going to ask that every one of us Episcopal mothers read the daily portion of Scripture arranged for us to read by the Churchman's Kalendar. Do not tell me you have not time. The longest passage is for January. I read it and timed myself. It took just three minutes, and I did not skip a word. You can spare three of the 1,440 minutes in your day to spend with God's word. Now, can't you? A few extra minutes and you can think about what you are reading. Try it and see.

AN IMPARTIAL OPINION.

Bishop Lawrence is recognized throughout the country as one of the sanest and most practical of Church leaders; therefore, what he has to say at this time on the subject of prohibition is of special interest to everybody interested in this matter and all the more so since it is not written in a spirit of controversy, but is taken from his autobiography, from which we quote as follows:

"Drink was the curse of Lawrence in my day. Young people whose memories do not go back beyond beginning of War Prohibition can have no conception of the power of liquor under license system in a city like Lawrence. Thousands of men and some women wasted a large fraction of their wages in drink; hundreds, if not thousands, were 'beery' a good deal of the time. The waste of child life, the privation of wives, and the personal degradation were unspeakable. But the influence of liquor was pervasive; it represented big money. The patrons of grocers, butchers, and banks, the clients of lawyers and doctors, had some relation with drink or its finances; the City Hall was a centre of liquor and its political influence. Men have got to support their families, and when a man, be he tradesman, banker, or of a profession, sees that by active opposition to the liquor interest he loses his trade, clients, or patients, and his income which feeds his children falls off, he, being human, has not the courage to stand up in the fight for temperance or the enforcement of law; for law under the license system was never thoroughly enforced. Whatever the police might be ready to do, there were the influences higher up that forbade. I mention these things because in these days some people assume that evasions and infractions of the law did not exist under the license system. They were rife, and bribery was frequent.

When I moved from Lawrence to Cambridge, I found a body of men of independent income who without fear for their children's bread could stand firm. Cambridge became a no-license city in 1887. But in Lawrence aggressive action took tenfold courage. A very few men and women dared to act, but of many of the high-minded citizens it was too much to expect. Hence a vigorous, healthy public sentiment against the power of liquor could not be marshalled.

The temperance crusades were left to earnest women. I had been brought up to a moderate use of wine, and believed in local option. Soon after my coming to Lawrence, a temperance revival took place.

Halls were crowded to hear the orators: then came the campaign for pledges, and an earnest, white-faced woman approached me in an office, saying, 'Mr. Lawrence, I have here a pledge which I am getting the ministers to sign, and then I am going out to get the poor drunkards to sign after them. Will you please sign?' The method seemed to me so preposterous, and the woman looked so guileless, that I reacted and said, 'Unfortunately, madam, I am a drinking man, I cannot sign'. Seeing her dismay, I explained my position, but it was no use. She said she 'would not tell on me'. I then said, 'My dear madam, I have in my pocket a pledge signed by a man a month ago. In a drunken frenzy he tore a fistful of hair from his wife's scalp. When sobered, I got him to sign the pledge for thirty days. I have kept an eye on him, and now I am going to get him to renew it. He will not care whether I sign the pledge or not; it would not affect him'.

The question of wine-drinking did not exist in Lawrence; nobody could afford wine. The only issue of temperance was drinking whiskey or beer at the bar or drinking not at all. The most disappointing feature of my eight years in Lawrence was the slight impression that those who stood for high standards could make in the drink problem in a mill city. Of personal work, helping the wife to keep her man from drink, or the husband his wife, to hold together the families of well-meaning drinking people, there was no end, and amidst many failures there were occasional redemptions which paid for all the time and strength.

Since those days I have lived in Cambridge and Boston and have watched a generation of men pass through college and beyond middle life. The great majority of them have, of course, been temperate. I have, however, seen many enter college alert, fresh, and vigorous; then gradually become full-faced and later bloated; some of them dying twenty or thirty years before their time, others heavy and soggy in body and character. I have sometimes been appalled at the moral and physical waste, and the apparent indifference of those closest to them. The cocktail habit, which has come in since my day, champagne, then whiskey, strike at the mental and physical vitality of some of our most promising young men. Starting life I believe without prejudice, and a moderate drinker of wine and beer, I have been driven by facts to think things through; and although I never signed a pledge, I gradually ceased taking even a little wine, and for some fifteen or twenty years have touched nothing. It made me uneasy to feel that my slight example should give any man excuse for abusing his liberty."

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

WANTED A DISTINCTION.

Mr. Editor:

Your readers are indebted to Mr. Minnegerode for his recent contribution, as it goes to the gist of the differences between the members of the Catholic Party and the regular Protestant Episcopalians. The former desire not only a change in the nomenclature of our ritual, but also in the doctrines and practices of our Church.

For Protestant they would substitute Catholic—a name now thoroughly and irretrievably identified with another denomination.

For the Holy Communion they would have "Mass' and "Eucharist". They summon our Presiding Bishop and call their meeting a "Pontifical Congress".

Having borrowed the names common to the Roman Catholic Church, they then propose to adopt its practices and teachings. Although cautious they are gradually coming out into the open. It is difficult to understand why our brethren of the Catholic Party should cling to the Protestant Episcopal Church, which condemns in no uncertain terms certain doctrines of the Roman Church, while the latter offers them all they long for and desire.

It would be enlightening for some spokesman of this Party to tell us what principle or practice of the Roman Church is objectionable to them. The letter of the Rev. M. Johnston contains this true statement: "The English Church has lost the idea of sacrifice in connection with the Holy Eucharist". But God grant that we are not coming to the "better days" of the "bloodless sacrifice" that he predicts.

No doubt the word Mass means sacrifice and for this very reason this term has been forever discarded from the Prayer Book. Sacrifice to appease the anger of a god were the earliest forms of religious worship. Until a degree of civilization was attained, the sacrifice of human beings was common, and is still practiced among savage people. It was probably a common practice when Abraham prepared to murder his only son, Isaac.

Afterwards animals provided a sweet smelling savor to the Lord. The religion of Jesus nowhere requires such a practice. His indignation when He drove the money-changers from the temple was probably aroused by the animal sacrifices being made. His tender mercies reached to the dumb creation.

He nowhere sanctioned such legerdermain as some of our brethren desire adopted in His Church with reference to the elements in the Holy Communion. When Christ said, "This is my body", did any of His disciples think they were eating human flesh? It symbolizes His suffering body. Likewise the wine was symbolical. These words were no more literally meant than when He said, "I am the Vine". No one thinks He meant that He was a grape vine. The Holy Communion is not a "Mass". It is the great service of the Church established by Christ Himself, whereby our spirits may commune with His spirit in perpetual remembrance not only of His death, but of His Life, for it is not solely because Christ died, but because He lived that mankind is redeemed.

The greatest truth Jesus gave the world was spoken to the Samaritan woman, "God is Spirit and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth".

The deification of material things is repugnant to Christ's teachings and reverts to the cannibalistic practices of the savage.

Some of our moderns are developing like atavistic tendencies.

WHO IS THE AGGRESSOR?

Mr. Editor:

My attention has been directed to the very excellent letter of the Rev. George L. Barnes, in your issue of December 18, under the very appropriate title, "Neronian Fiddling".

But does Mr. Barnes' letter state the situation with which the Church is confronted?

The suggestion that controversy in the Church cease is one which must instantly appeal to every loyal member of it, but will it not occur to any thinking person that, had there never been any "Catholic", or "Back to Rome", movement in the Church, there would never have been any National Church League, nor would there have been any occasion for such an organization?

Will it not immediately occur to any reflective mind that the whole unhappy contest has been brought about by the "Catholic" effort to subvert the Constitution, Doctrine, Discipline and Worship of the Church by the introduction into it of the Mass, Reservation and Adoration of the Sacrament, Worship of the Virgin Mary, Invocation of Saints, Auricular Confession, etc.?

Does the fact, as stated by Mr. Barnes, "that year before last the Episcopal Church gained but 12,000 members," suggest anything? And Mr. Barnes might have stated without fear of successful contradiction that, in consequence of the "Catholic" invasion of the Church, there have been many secessions in various parts of the country.

Were the National Church League and all in sympathy with it to cease opposition to those who would destroy the Protestant Episcopal Church and leave the field to the destroyer, would that solve the difficulty?

Let the issue be kept accurately and squarely in mind —the Protestant Episcopal Church as it is, or a medieval Church, with strangely attired clergy muttering Masses, intercessions to the Saints, Worship of the Virgin Mary and demanding confession to a priest as a prerequisite to the Lord's Supper.

Which is it to be? It will very soon be one or the other; it cannot be both.

Let us think in a straight line.

Church Intelligence

Plans of The Next Church Congress.

The Church Congress will meet in San Francisco on the evening of June 14, 1927, and will close on the afternoon of Friday, June 17. The tentative program includes the following topics: "Moral Standards in an Age of Change," "How Can Christianity Satisfy the Religious Needs of All Races?" "The Relation of Christianity to Political and Industrial Democracy," "Do the New Thought and Health Cults Contribute Anything to Christianity," "Some Aids to Personal Religion—(1) Prayer, (2) The Sacraments, (3) The Bible," "In What Sense Our Church Should Be Catholic," "In What Sense Our Church Should be Protestant," "Evangelism (Its Aims and Methods)."

Several speakers have already accepted: Professor Gowen of Seattle, the Rev. Leslie Learned of Los Angeles, Dean Chalmers of Dallas, Texas; Bishop Sumner of Oregon, Dr. Guthrie of New York, Bishop Thomas of Wyoming.

Bishop Parsons, who invited the Congress to San Francisco, is enthusiastic over its coming; and other Bishops of the Pacific Coast have expressed their hearty interest and desire to do all in their power to further the success of the undertaking.

St. Stephen's Seeking Expression: A Public Statement from the Trustees of St. Stephen's College.

St. Stephen's College feels obliged, by the challenge of opportunity and its own fitness to meet that opportunity, to devote itself to the supplying, in part at least, of three educational needs:

1. The need for a country residence college in the Metropolitan area centering about New York City. The metropolis is seriously undersupplied with collegiate opportunity for men.

2. The need of a college for men in the lower Hudson Valley. Between New York City and Schenectady and between the Connecticut and the Delaware Rivers is a district of over ten thousand square miles—with a rapidly growing population, mostly in tiny towns and villages and a few moderate sized cities—in which St. Stephen's College is the only undergraduate college for men.

3. The need of a college free from enforced conformity to type in educational methods, which can face the problems of higher education realistically. St. Stephen's College wishes to help in freeing collegiate methods from conventionalities which have grown up in America, partly from inertia and partly from the pressure of undue numbers of students.

The needs mentioned above are so vital and immediate that the College feels it must attempt to meet them. It is purposed to place St. Stephen's College wholeheartedly at the service of the community at large, and in particular to take at once the following steps:

1. To select its students hereafter with no denominational or racial preferences, but primarily on the ground of intellectual ability and character:

2. To retain in its student body in the junior and senior years only those who have shown in the first two years definite intellectual ability and enthusiasm for learning and to give to these selected and tested men such individual guidance as shall develop fully their potentialities.

3. To continue, as at present, to seek its instructors solely on the basis of teaching ability, scholarship, character, and a desire to work with and for the individual student.

4. To enlarge its housing facilities and endowment so that it may accept two hundred and fifty students, the best number, it is believed, for an undergraduate residence college unit. The amount of money needed to finance this development is $2,000,000.

5. To enlarge its Board of Trustees, by including representatives of important phases of life and thought within the metropolitan vicinity, without regard to religious affiliation. In order that the intention of the founders may be conserved, the President and a majority of the Trustees are to be members of the Episcopal Church and the chapel services are to remain as now in accord with the customs of that communion; but other religious convictions and affiliations are to have sufficient representation to insure breadth of policy and untramelled community service, both now and for the future.

Seamen's Institute Hut in San Francisco Completes Tenth Year.

The men at the United States Marine Hospital in San Francisco, far away from home, if they still have a home, and more often they haven't, these men come from the Seven Seas. Americans, Dutch, Swedes, Danes, Norwegians, Russians, Filipinos, Portuguese—sailors of all nations—are there due to accident or sickness, the incapacity often lasting for months.

They get good care, good food, and splendid medical attention, but of course no institution can provide relatives and friends. Time hangs heavy on the hands of the convalescent. Entertainment and occupation are his greatest needs.

To supply this deficiency, the Seamen's Church Institute of San Francisco established a recreation hut at the hospital in 1917. Today, says The Seafarer, the San Francisco Institute's paper, it is the most popular spot on the grounds, the resort of all who are well enough to come to it.

Mrs. Nelson, who is in charge, is a real mother to the boys. The hut has one large room with a stage, a small library, a small kitchen, and a workroom devoted to occupational therapy. One corner of the main room has been partitioned off for a barber-shop, which is conducted for the convalescent patients.

The large room boasts a fireplace, a pool table, a phonograph, also tables for games and reading or writing. In the library is a fair collection of fiction and reference works, and magazines.

Worsted bags are made by the convalescents, the men receiving a portion of the proceeds. This provides them with much-needed pocket money when they leave the hospital.

The English Lecturer at Berkeley Divinity School this year will be the Rev. S. C. Carpenter, Vicar of Bolton. He arrives early in January and will stay until Easter. Beside his work at the School, where he will teach Homiletics and Pastoral Theology, and give special courses on Christian Doctrine and Missions, he will do a certain amount of outside preaching and lecturing. Mrs. Carpenter accompanies him and will be available as a speaker.

An English correspondent writes: "The Rev. S. C. Carpenter is rector of the large Lancashire manufacturing town of Bolton, one of the most important posts in the Diocese of Manchester, having been specially selected for this responsible position four years ago by Dr. William Temple, Bishop of Manchester. He is a thoughtful and effective speaker and writer. The subjects he has particularly made his own are the relations between democracy and Christianity, and the reconciliation of faith and modern learning.

"Mrs. Carpenter has had much experience in work among women and girls. She is a member of the Central Committee of the Mothers' Union and the Girls' Friendly Society. She has been a very successful producer of Nativity Plays, having for many years filled the Guildhall at Cambridge night after night with her play, 'The Christmas Mystery'; she has also produced religious plays with great success in the Cathedral at Manchester. Mrs. Carpenter is an effective speaker with a wide range of interests and knowledge of human nature, and she faces promlems in a fresh way."

Dr. Helfenstein Consecrated Bishop-Coadjutor of Maryland.

The consecration of the Rt. Rev. Edward Trail Helfenstein, D. D., to be Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese of Maryland, took place on Tuesday, December 28, in Memorial Church, Baltimore, the Rt. Rev. John G. Murray, D. D., presiding. The co-consecrators were the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware, and the Rt. Revfl Frederick Focke Reese, D. D., Bishop of Georgia.

Dr. Helfenstein was presented by the Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker, D. D., Bishop-Coadputor of Virginia, and the Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., Bishop of Southwestern Virginia, and his attending presbyters were the Rev. John I. Yellott, D. D., of Emmanuel Church, Bel Air, Maryland, and the Rev. Thomas K. Nelson, D. D., of the Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia.

The sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., Bishop of Central New York, in which he declared that personal allegiance and loyalty to Christ are not sufficient, but that a Church organization and membership are absolutely necessary, unless Christians are to be "a mere amorphous aggregation of individual souls with a set of views to be promulgated, and a more or less incoherent and unstable set of views at that".

"One thing the modern interpreter of the iLfe of Christ almost invariably omits. He does not see that it is a vital part of Christ's teaching that His religion is always to be lived in fellowship and, therefore, is necessarily corporate.

The Church is not the afterthought men, it is the forethought of Christ. Individual attachment and allegiance is kept strong and steady through the Church. More than that, the Church not only safeguards the individual, but it moves out into the community and redeems the wolrd'.'

"One of the troubles with our modern American type of Christianity is that men readily fall into idiocyncracies and individual extravagances, because their religion does not through corporate fellowship call upon the individual to check up his own conclusions with the thought and experiences of others."

Bishop Fiske showed that the Church was something towards which the thought of Christ moved from the beginning and that was established that it might bear witness to Christ's truth as "a way of salvation for individuals, for communities, and for the world.

"Don't be afraid that the freshness and charm and simplicity of faith will be lost if we try to combine personal allegiance with corporate witness. The Church is as necessary for the perpetuation of religion as government is necessary for the safeguarding of society. In union there is strength for the followers of Christ, just as for believers in modern democracy."

The Rev. Romilly F. Humphries, D. D., Archdeacon of Baltimore, was master of ceremonies, and the registrar was the Rev. Charles L. Pardee, D. D., New York City.

Unusual Meetings Planned For Lenten Season.

Under the leadership of the American Board of Applied Christianity, ten New York organizations, all engaged in different forms of evangelistic, social, educational and relief work, have voted to hold, in the Hotel Iroquois, in the Grand Central District, weekly meetings throughout Lent. These meetings are believed to be of a type never before held in any city in any Lent. There will be no addresses. While spiritual messages are being given in all Churches, the Applied Christianity Board will offer work that begins where lectures and sermons end, and the best methods for the performance of that work.

Announcement is made that tasks can be assigned to all comers, no matter how busy, how limited in ability or financial resources, that all can do —if they are willing to do anything. Reports of best methods for work are now being prepared, and will be submitted in advance of these meetings.

To the effort to supply the need for workers, will be added also one meeting to stress Church unity, and tell of the approaching World Conference on Faith and Order. There will also be suggestions for definite work on the part of all men to advance each Church unity.

The Hotel Iroquois meetings are to close just before Holy Week, to leave that week solely to spiritual things, but it is hoped that daily meetings will be held during the week just preceding Holy Week. Prominent Episcopal, Presbyterian, Methodist and Lutheran pastors, one each, are to preach sermons on Sundays in February on the subject of service by laymen and women, and by arrangements invitations are to be sent to men and women who are leaders to attend them. Cooperation at all points, and not in any sense opposition, will be offered by these unusual meetings. Leaders will be present, but the program of the Hotel Iroquois meetings is a graduate one. That is, men and women will be sought who, in turn, can assign tasks to others. Organizations already agreeing to cooperate include the Big Brother Movement, the National Bible Class Movement, the Rescue Society, the Evangelistic Committee, the Publicity Engineers, the educational, social service, and other agencies where unofficial, and Episcopal, Presbyterian, Methodist, Lutheran lay people. The Board in question formerly was the Seabury Society of New York, an Episcopal organization, but was changed that it might work with all religious bodies. The foundations are being laid for the New York Serbon of Cultural Engineering, and it is hoped to announce its details as the outcome of the Lenten meetings.

Altar Cloth Presented To the Cathedral.

An exquisite altar cloth of lace mosaic, valued at more than $10,000, became a possession of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on St. John's Day, when it was blessed by Bishop Manning.

Made up of delicate lace heirlooms, contributed by seventy-one women, the altar piece is the gift of the Women's Auxiliary.

Following the service the members of the Women's Auxiliary held their annual meeting in the Synod House, with Mrs. Henry W. Munroe presiding. Delegates were present from more than a hundred parishes in the diocese. Bishop Manning told them that "in all its work the cathedral has had no more faithful and unfailing helpers than the members of this Diocesan Auxiliary."

Dr. Carstensen Honored.

The Rev. Dr. Gustav A. Carstensen, after just fifty years since his ordination, has retired from Holy Road rectorship at the age of seventy-five, and will spend a year abroad. He was given by his friends, who are many, a luncheon and a purse of $2,500, together with many words of praise for a long life well spent. Those who attended the luncheon and joined in the testimonials were some of the foremost men of the city, and by no means all Churchmen.

Dr. Carstensen was many years ago rector of St. Paul's Church, Erie, and later a rector in Indianapolis, and was voted for for Bishop of Indiana when last a Bishop was elected for that Diocese. His work in New York, first at Christ Church, Riverdale, next at Holy Rood, and many summers in speaking in Wall Street, caused him to be an outstanding figure, always honored, and steadily gaining in influence.

Bishops' Crusade Meetings.

The mass meeting beginning the Bishops' Crusade in Richmond, which will include the congregation of all the Episcopal Churches in the city, will be held on Sunday evening, January 16, in the City Auditorium. An effort will be made to have a full attendance of all the choirs of the various churches, and every clergyman is expected to be present in vestments. The speakers will be the Rt. Rev. Philip Cooke, D. D., of Delaware, the Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, of Bethlehem, Pa., and Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, of Washington, D. C. Subsequent meetings will be held throughout the entire week in the various churches in the city. It is expected to make this a week of concentrated effort.

The Bishops' Crusade in Alexandria will be conducted by the Rev. Dr. Kirk B. O'Ferrall, of Cleveland, Ohio, and the Rev. George Floyd Rogers, of Asheville, N. C., in St. PaPul's Church, the Rev. P. F. Hall, rector, February 6-11.

Opening of New Church.

An interesting service was held in Galilee Church, Virginia Beach, on Sunday, December 26, at 4:30 P. M., when the new church was formally opened for worship. This church is built as a tribute to the labors of Bishop Tucker in Southern Virginia. The service was in charge of the rector, the Rev. Thomas L. Ridout. Mr. W. W. Robinson, lay reader, read the first lesson. The second lesson was read by the Rev. George S. Gresham, rector of the Church of the Advent, Ocean View, and Emmanuel, Cradock. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, Jr., D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Richmond. A memorial tablet was unveiled by Beverley, III., the eight-year-old grandson of the Bishop of Southern Virginia. The Bishop made a brief address of appreciation.

The inscription on the tablet is as follows:

"Erected in loving recognition of the services and godly leadership of our beloved Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., LL. D."

Galilee Church has been in process of erection since May and was built to meet the growing demands of the congregation, which has been steadily increasing with the development of this popular resort.

Norfolk Clericus.

At the regular meeting of the Norfolk Clericus, held in the parish house of Old St. Paul's Church, December 20, the following persons were elected officers for next year:

Chairman, the Rev. Charles H. Holmead, rector of Trinity Church, Portsmouth; secretary-treasurer, the Rev. George S. Gresham, rector of Church of the Advent. Ocean View, and Emmanuel, Cradock.

The Rev. Mr. Holmead read an interesting review of the book, "Essays Catholic and Critical", by Selwyn. Considerable time was spent in discussing plans for the approaching meetings of the Crusade, which are to be held in Norfolk.

Plans for the Crusade in Southern Virginia are nearly completed. Bishop Ward, of Erie, and the Rev. John Gass, of Charleston, W. Virginia, will conduct the Crusade in Norfolk, Danville and Petersburg; beginning February 6. Immediately following the message of the Crusaders, preaching missions will be held by the clergy of Southern Virginia in every church in the Diocese, each clergyman having been assigned to some congregation outside of his own parish. The Rev. E. R. Carter, D. D., rector of Grace Church, Petersburg, is Chairman of the Diocesan Committee on Evangelism.

The Council: The Bishop of Southern Virginia has changed the place of meeting of the thirty-fifth annual Council of the Diocese from Trinity Church, South Boston, to Grace and St. Paul's Churches, Petersburg, Va. The date set for opening of Council, Tuesday, January 25, 1927 is unchanged.

Ohio Valley Sunday School Institute.

This Institute met in St. Luke's Church, Wheeling, the Rev. C. W. Sydnor, rector, on St. Andrew's Day, November 30. At the opening service and business meeting, the subject for discussion, was "Methods for Increasing Church School Attendance", and the leaders, the Rev. E. N. Maconomy, Trinity Church, Moundsville, and Mr. S. P. Hicks, Wheeling,. Reports were made from schools of the district. An address on "Church School Administration", was given by Mr. Robert Lee Boyd, Wheeling, and one on "The Ideals of the Teacher", Miss Etta Ambler, Field Secretary for Religious Education, of the Diocese.

Kanawha Convocation.

The ninety-fifth semi-annual meeting of the Kanawha Convocation met in the Church of the Ascension, the Rev. W. M. Purce, rector. The first sermon was preached by the Rev. Frank K. Hughes of St. Albans. The Rev. Churchill J. Gibson, of Lexington, Va., representing the National Council, spoke on the Presiding Bishop's Parish, the Bishop's Parish and the Rector's Parish. Miss Etta Ambler, Diocesan Field Secretary of Religious Education, spoke on her work and the Rev. J. L. Oldham on the Bishops' Crusade. The Rev. H. M. Brown was elected dean and the Rev. J. E. Thompson, Secretary-Treasurer. At Evening Prayer the sermon was preached by Bishop Gravatt. After this service the Convocation assembled for a book review by the Rev. H. B. McC. Jamison. He discussed Religion and Life, Foundations of Personal Religion. The subjects treated were Faith and Reason, Inge; God the Father, Cairns; Man's Need, Halladay; Christ, Talbott; Practice of Prayer, Brown; and Christianity and Fellowship, Frere. The next meeting will be held in St. Luke's Church, Charleston, in February.

Bishops' Crusade in Wheeling Clericus: At the December meeting of the Wheeling Clericus in St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, Bishop Strider conducted a Regional Retreat in relation to the Bishops' Crusade. The Bishop celebrated the Holy Communion and gave three meditations on the subjects, "Enthusiasm", "Realization of God's Presence" and "The Mind That Is In Christ". He interspersed these with prayers, silent prayer and Bible readings. After luncheon Bishop Strider unfolded the plans for the Crusade in West Virginia and called upon the Rev. John L. Oldham, Chairman of "The Commission on Evangelism", to display and explain the literature for the Crusade. Besides the regular members of the clericus, there were present the Rev. John Ridout, Parkersburg; the Rev. Guy Crook, Williamstown; the Rev. M. W. Derr, Sisterville, and Archdeacon William Meade.

The Bishop Harding Memorial Chapel.

St. Paul's Day, January 25, has been designated as the time for the presentation of the offering of the Diocese of Washington for the Memorial to the late Bishop Harding, according to an announcement by the Bishop of Washington, the Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D. The memorial to Bishop Harding is the Chapel of the Resurrection in Washington Cathedral and is believed to be the first example of Norman structure erected since the eleventh century. Bishop Freeman, in a letter, describes it as "A beautifully appropriate monument to Bishop Harding's devotional life."

The Norman Chapel of the Resurrection is structurally complete and is open to pilgrims visiting Mount Saint Alban. At the southwest corner of the chancel arch of this chapel a vault has been prepared for the reception of the body of Bishop Harding, which now rests temporarily in the Bethlehem Chapel, and that of Justine Prindle, his wife. Here will be placed a beautiful sarcophagus, designs for which are now being prepared by W. D. Caroe, resident architect of Canterbury Cathedral, England, who designed and executed the tomb of the late Rt. Rev. Henry Yates Satterlee, first Bishop of Washington, which stands in the ambulatory of the Bethlehem Chapel.

Meeting of The Woman's Auxiliary.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Washington was held at St. John's Church, on January 4, beginning with a celebration of the Holy Communion. The Bishop of Washington was the celebrant and preached the sermon. This was followed by luncheon and a business meeting when election of officers took place. On Wednesday, the following day, the Woman's Auxiliary gave a reception at Diocesan House, when all interested women and Church people generally were invited to meet Miss Mary E. Wood, librarian of Boone University, Wuchang, China. Miss Wood gave an address at this meeting.

Church Activities at Wytheville.

A number of improvements have recently been made at St. John's Church, Wytheville, the Rev. Devall L. Gwathmey, rector, and on Christmas Day the congregation had the privilege of worshipping in the church again. There were two celebrations of the Holy Communion. By vote of the vestry the offerings at both services, amounting to more than $100. were designated for the Advance Work of the Diocese and the General Church.

The interior of the church has been beautified by the new features, which include new pews and chancel furniture, amber toned glass in the non-memorial windows, new lighting fixtures, the rearrangement of the vestibule and a rearrangement of the doors of the sacristy. The cost of the improvements amounted to more than $6,000, and was made possible by an anonymous gift of $5,000 last spring for this purpose, two other gifts amounting to $700 and contributions of the Parish Aid Society. Mr. Hobart Upjohn of New York drew the plans for the new chancel and made recommendations for the treatment of the rest of the building and rendered invaluable assistance to the committee in charge of the work. The contractor was Mr. Morris C. Miller of Christiansburg, Virginia, who, like Mr. Upjohn, is an Episcopalian.

There were three Christmas entertainments in the parish. The Church (Sunday) School had its celebration in the parish hall on Christmas Eve. The rector opened the program with the creed and prayers. The singing was led by a vested choir of boys and girls and a pageant, "Christmas Everywhere" was presented before the distribution of gifts from the Christmas Tree. A second entertainment was held at St. John's Chapel (a mission of St. John's Church) on the afternoon of St. Stephen's Day and in the evening of the same day the Young People's Society of St. John's Church had its meeting. As is their custom, the people of St. John's distributed baskets of eatables, clothing and toys among the needy families of the town.

The congregation held its annual meeting on December 6. The members of the former vestry were reelected and one new member was added, bringing the total number to twelve. At a meeting of the vestry the following afternoon a pledge of $2,250 was made on behalf of the parish for the Field Department (Nation-Wide Campaign) in 1927. This is a result of the recent Every Member Canvass and is $100 greater than the pledge for 1926 which, by the way, will have been overpaid when the books of the diocesan treasurer are closed for 1926.

Christmas Services In Cincinnati.

Four years ago the custom of having a midnight celebration of the Holy Communion on Christmas Day was commenced at St. Stephen's Church, Winton Place, Cincinnati, the Rev. C. G. Reade, rector. The attendance has grown steadily each year and this Christmas more than three-fourths of the whole number of communicants were in attendance.

The Sunday following Christmas being this year the feast of St. Stephen was marked by a special musical service by the vested choir directed by Mr. J. Raymond Baker, with an excellent attendance and offering.

The Church School has collected over $30 for the Advent offering for the Children's Hospital and the Junior Choir on Christmas Day accompanied their rector to the Home for Incurables and gave to these poor shut-ins the first Christmas Day service they had enjoyed in years. This junior choir also on Christmas Eve, visited the shut-ins in the village of Winton Place and sang carols. Miss Augusta Williams has trained this choir of young folks with great success. Both this choir and the regular choir of the church will take part in the Community Christmas celebration.

The Cincinnati City Mission, assisted by the Kiwanis Club, Christ Church, several choirs, and a host of volunteer workers held Christmas services in ten

O Lord, we beseech Thee mercifully to receive the prayers of Thy people who call upon Thee; and grant that they may both perceive and know what things they ought to do, and also may have grace and power faithfully to fulfil the same; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Touching grace, we Princes three Firstlings of the Gentiles be:
Pledge hereby of mercy free
For the heathen ye may see.

We beheld a star full bright,
Sign of Christ, the very Light:
Fared we hither, day and night,
Unto God our truth to plight.

Triple gifts in hand have we,
Worthy a Babe of high degree:
Yonder Child on Mary's knee
Ruleth heaven, and earth and sea.

Gold our comely King doth show,
Incense, Priest for evermo;
But the gift of myrrh thereto
Bodeth death of bitter woe.

Bright of yonder star the ray:
We, with you, good kings, today
Tune the lute and raise the lay,
Homage to this Babe to pay.

Why Do We Not Tell Men So?

During the War the French poilu loved to tell a story against his English ally. Two Englishmen from Oxford University were shipwrecked upon a desert island. One rescued from the ship's store a tub of butter, the other a sack of flour. They were, however, never destined to eat bread and butter together. They had not been formally introduced, and so were unable to meet.

The Rev. H. R. L. Shepherd, familiarly known to many Church people as "Dick Shepherd", comments upon this story in St. Martin's Review. He considers the story to be out of date. It might have happened once upon a time, but in recent years the Anglo-Saxon has become more approachable. Two Englishmen so situated, as the story describes, would enjoy their bread and butter while it lasted, and if they could find other means of subsistence, they might live together in great good-will for many years. But it is quite possible that neither one would ever know whether or not the other had any religious convictions. There is a clause in the Anglo-Saxon's unwritten creed of convention which decrees, "Thou shalt not refer to thy religion".

We have no desire that men talk lightly or become garrulous on the subject of their faith. There are some people who like to ram their religious ideas down the throats of others at every conceivable opportunity.

Sometimes this is the outcome of a misapplied evangelistic fervour. We know a lady who hesitates to invite a friend to tea, because, when she does so, her husband insists upon enquiring whether or not her guest is "saved". Such zeal is commendable, no doubt, but there are those who seem to object to it.

There is also the religious controversialist. Like a roaring lion he prowls about seeking whom he may devour in the interests of his own particular way of thinking. He writes voluminous letters to the newspapers, discussing exhaustively minute points of ritual and doctrine. His zeal also is most laudable, when it is according to knowledge. But we cannot help feeling that a little of it goes a long way.

We are not surprised that our realers do not wish to be classed with some types of religious enthusiasts we have known. Nor do we ask them to join forces with religious cranks.

But what we would like to see is this. We would like to see simple and humble men and women of God ready and eager to tell what power and joy the Lord Jesus Christ can give to life. We would like to put an end to the tradition of silence, which makes it appear as though the average layman of our Church "would rather give his body to be tortured than allow his tongue to testify to the faith that is in him".

The fear of seeming to be a hypocrite often prevents a man from mentioning his religion to others. Much as we respect this attitude we would ask if it is a reasonable one. Men do not refrain from discussing politics, business, or sports on the grounds that they have not yet attained perfection in these spheres of activity. We make a sad mistake if we confine the advocacy of the Christian Faith with any implication of personal goodness on the part of the advocate. What we ask is that men will let it be known that, in spite of their failures and shortcomings, they believe that Christ's way of living is worth attempting.

It is sometimes said that the Anglo-Saxon is constitutionally unable to speak about those things which concern him most deeply. We find it difficult to believe this. We have a friend who is an enthusiastic golfer. At this time of year he spends most of his time on the links. No one can doubt that he is deeply interested in golf. Yet he can talk eloquently, even passionately, about the game.

Another friend loves his home, and especially his small daughter. It is difficult to imagine any one feeling more deeply than this man does for his little girl. But he seems to be able to talk about her to his friends and acquaintances. Indeed, it never seems to have occurred to him that the whole world is not thirsting to know all about his wee child. There appears to be ample evidence that strong men can speak freely about matters which concern them deeply without breaking down.

But there does seem to be a real question whether we English-speaking people want the cause of Christ to prevail or not. If we do, why not tell men so?—Canadian Churchman.

A Little Child of God.

M. M. Claiborne.

Some years ago I was doing missionary work in the mountains of Tennessee among the people known in that part of the world as Coveties, or "poor whites". The mission stations of which I was in charge were sometimes situated on the mountain top, and again in the little "coves" or valleys, and I had also chapels in the small towns or villages. These last were my greatest problem, for the people there had come in contact with the outside world, to an extent just enough to enable them to acquire the vices of civilization, without profiting by its virtures.

At the time of which I write, there lived in one of these villages an old woman who was called "Aunt Jane" by every one. She was a social outcast, her life so vile and degraded and her character so hardened that even by the inferior classes in the village, she was shunned and despised. So for years she lived alone on the mountainside, with her only companions, the beasts of the wild, for which she seemed to have a fondness.

One day there come along a company of strolling vagabonds—not gypsies, but people of her type. In their company was a young woman to whom a little child was born—a girl. The mother, ill and neglected, died at the child's birth and left the little one in a world which neither wanted her nor had a place for her. The nomade tried to give her to various people, but no one wanted such a child.

Then, to the surprise of her acquaintance, Aunt Jane came forward and begged to be allowed to keep the waif. Protests arose at once—she was not fit to keep even such a child as that—she would neglect her, and so forth; but Aunt Jane persisted, and others, really caring little what became of the child, so that they were rid of her, turned her over to Aunt Jane, and forgot her.

From that time, a change came over the outcast woman. She now centered upon the child the love she had once lavished upon dumb creatures. She watched over her carefully, giving her such attention and nourishment as she could afford, and when she was old enough, she brought her to the little school which I had established for the poor of that village. This school was in charge of a faithful young woman, devoted to the task of helping these most needy souls.

Here the little Elizabeth came day after day, not only learning her lesson, but having instilled into her principles of love and goodness, and a knowledge the Gospel of Jesus Christ. She was always sweet, lovable, and dutiful; attentive to her lessons and devoted to the kind teacher who represented to her all there was of true kindness and beauty in her life. At twelve years, Elizabeth was brought to confirmation, and was given a little gold cross to remind her that she was now full member in that body which is the hope of mankind in this world.

Soon afterwards, alas! the doctor discovered that tuberculosis had developed, and it was soon evident that Elizabeth was not long for this world. Day after day she lay, patient and uncomplaining, in her poor bed in the rude little hut, her chief joy a doll which she had always longed for, and which some kind soul who knew her wish had given her the preceding Christmas.

Aunt Jane hung over her in grief and despair. Kind visitors came daily with messages of hope and cheer, and love, and always with something to tell Elizabeth about the little chapel to which she was so devoted, and to which she so longed to go whenever the bell called for services.

It was evident that the end of her short life was near. I had been absent in the North, but upon my return some one met me at the train and asked me to come over, as Elizabeth was almost gone. There in the little cabin, with poor mourning Aunt Jane weeping on one side of the bed, I gave the child her last communion. She died that night, with the cross on her breast and the beloved doll clasped in her arms.

Aunt Jane wept bitterly, and told the teacher that she wanted Elizabeth to be buried from the Chapel, as all the time she was sick she had been "just honin' to go, and now she's dead, I want her to go there for the last time". Elizabeth was taken to the little chapel and the Church gave its beloved child its last rite. She is buried on the hillside within sight of the home where her short life was spent, and in the shelter of the eternal hills.

Does this seem to you a sad story, and perhaps a useless life? Not so, for by that little life even Aunt Jane was brought to love and know the Saviour of all of us. Never did the church bell ring, but that Aunt Jane was there among the worshippers—always with her tiny offering—always ready to help in any way she could; and when her turn came to die she was buried by the side of the child whose innocent hands had led her to her Saviour Jesus Christ.

Some day I hope to put over Elizabeth's grave a simple cross, with these words only: "Elizabeth a little child of God."

Recollections of a Minister's Daughter.

Chapter Six.

Anna Swan Reynolds.

I wonder if all ministers' families have such a mixture of circumstances as was the case in ours. My recollections of my childhood in regard to my mother and my father somehow are tinged with sadness and pathos. I think the beauty of their love must have made this, for it was so profound and so wonderful—creating a deep and lasting impression on my childish heart.

These next few pages will tell some of the humorous lines that were drawn around us; for our life had many vicissitudes; months of peaceful wandering in the green lanes of our lovely garden; days of joy and sweet communion and wise counsel; sad and cold and rainy days when we sought the big old rooms of our dear old home; firelit winter evenings, when my father rested from his more profound study, and sermon writing (for he truly made his own sermons) when he read a novel or book of poems to my mother, who sat beside him listening eagerly to every word.

The day of the donation party had dawned. It was an event that was to pass away soon. Perhaps some rejoice and some regret the old-time means of succour that was in the case of my father and mother a most dreaded visitation. It was expected by the parishioners, who hailed it as one of the social events of the village life—although it was also the custom in the large city parishes; but the village parishes held out longer naturally, because there was so little to call people together, and they were always craving an occasion in which to meet in a social, neighborly way.

Perhaps more influence for good came in the old days by people being more simple and innocent in their amusements—only this donation party was not of the simple, innocent kind in its results, so far as I can recollect.

I recall distinctly the Sunday morning at church the very expression on my father's face—very serious, yet with a great cordiality in his strong voice, when he said from the chancel, "The parishioners of this parish have kindly decided to give a Donation Party Saturday evening next at the rectory". I also remember my mother's serene face—the beautiful mouth wearing an expression of sweetness, and the smile in her blue eyes, while the children in the ministerial pew, and we were all in, exchanged the quick telegraphic message: "A party!" and each one of us saw ice cream and cake—cake and ice cream—in large letters mentally, and huge helpings, figuratively, to be devoured at supper.

We children knew nothing of that feeling perhaps that our parents had that was so constantly in those days pressed down on the minister, his wife and family, dependence on so meagre a salary that had to be helped out with a Donation Party to provide the needs of the hard winter.

The village social life was just opening up for the winter, the weather was cold and sunny in the day, and bright, dazzling moonlight made a silver pathway leading over the low hills or bluffs along the great, gleaming frozen river leading from nearby farms and from all the countryside for twenty miles, embracing my father's parish.

The Later Opportunity.

I cannot sit with Christ this later day
Beside some restful modern Jacob's well,
And hear Him, ere I turn to go my way,
Of water of life and of my wanderings tell;
And yet by any stream or well or rill
I meet the Spirit Christ whene'er I will.

As did that long-ill woman, I can't press
My way to Christ through crowds in city street,
To give His healing garment hem caress
And feel in me my healing is complete;
But I can stretch to Him today faith's hand
And hear His spirit voice give glad command.

I cannot lay a tired and trusting head
Upon Christ's breast in great love grown o'erbold,
As John the loving did—so I have read
With rapture in a book that's true and old;
But at another supper I can kneel,
And there in His dear Church my love reveal.

Alas, I cannot serve Him as I might
If I could see Him walk on earth with men!
But if I lead a wanderer to the Light
And bravely bear His cross, I'll serve Him then;
And with His spirit ever in my heart,
The Christ and I need never dwell apart!

What Makes It Rain?

Lucy Chandler Fuller.

Dan, aged five, was given to asking questions. When something that he wanted to know came into his head out popped the question and the nearest adult was at his mercy. One morning in the kindergarten when the other children were modeling, he sat watching the rain splash against the window pane. Suddenly he called to his teacher, "Miss Rutherford, what makes it rain?"

"This is quiet time," remonstrated Miss Rutherford. "I'll tell you after kindergarten."

After kindergarten Dan's big brother was in too much of a hurry to get home to lunch to wait for Dan to ask any of his question. "Will you tell me, then, George," begged Dan as he tried to keep step with the long strides of his brother, "what makes it rain?"

"Oh, I'm too wet and hungry to answer questions," replied George in a lordly manner. "Hurry along, kid, or you will be soaked."

When Dan reached home he ran up to his mother's room. "Mother," he began, "what makes . . . ."

"Danny!" exclaimed the child's mother, "take those wet things right downstairs."

Dan obediently shed his wraps below. When he returned his mother was putting on her hat. In one breath he shouted, "Mother, please tell me what makes it rain!"

"I can't stop, dear, I'm late for my party now. Run down to Pearl and she will give you your lunch."

Dan found Pearl dishing up his soup. "Say, Pearl," he began, "do you know what makes it rain?"

"The Lo'd, I suppose, honey. Now come git yo' lunch." And that was all Dan could get out of Pearl.

All the afternoon it rained, and Dan wandered from the nursery to the kitchen and back again. At the sound of the door bell he peeped over the bannisters and spying the visitor rushed down-stairs with a joyous cry, "Aunt Grace!" He patted the wet mackintosh. "Auntie," he began before his aunt had time to drop her wet things, "what makes it rain?"

His aunt laughed knowing that Dan knew that she was an easy victim. "Well, Dan," she replied, "let's see if we can find out." Leading the excited child over to the bookcase, she took down the Century Dictionary, and, turning to "rain" began reading aloud.

"Tell me," interrupted Dan.

"I'll tell you, dear, but I just wanted to show you where we have to go to find out things that we don't know." And letting the little fellow climb up into her lap, Aunt Grace began a laborious explanation in child language, about evaporation, atmospheric saturation, condensation and so forth. In the midst of it, Dan's mother came home. "Poor Grace!" she exclaimed, "has he cornered you again?"

"Yes," laughed the aunt, "but we've had a fine time, haven't we Dan?" she asked, giving the child a hug.

"You bet," said Dan, returning the hug, and jumping to the floor he began to tell his mother what makes it rain.

"Why, he really understands it," commented the boy's mother.

"Of course he understands it," replied the aunt. "If we grown people would only take the trouble to inform ourselves first and then answer a child's difficult questions in his own language, we could not only give him some background information, but could also excite his desire for further knowledge. Don't you think so? It seems to me the more we encourage a child's natural desire to know things of this nature the more we are going to help that child to grow into a well informed man or woman."

"As usual, Grace, you're right, but it does take so much time and energy," replied Dan's mother.

The Story the Euphrates Told.

By a Relief Worker in the Near East.

Palu-on-the-Euphrates is an Oriental city, hot and unhealthful in summer, but picturesquely situated, whether in summer's heat or winter's splendor. The houses stand as if they had been pushed down from the top of the hill, while the streets and alleys form terraces above the market with its colorful life and activity.

In the early morning I pass through streets resounding to the hammers of the copper-smiths, and up the steep hillside till I reach at length the palisade, standing stiff and proud, rather disdainful of the small, low houses. High up on its summit stands the ancient citadel into whose stones an Armenian king of long ago chiseled his laments. Wonderful old walls; quite too steep to be scaled! I sit down on the rock precipice. What magnificence meets my eyes!

In pure, glistening white lies the mountain chain of the Tauruz; behind it the several lofty summits stand bathed in soft colors of blue and lilac tints. Contrast, and yet a symmetrical picture. Great dark trees lift themselves magnificently from the valley to the opposite walls of stone that stand, saturated with golden light. Beyond them, like a veil, the haze of the still distance spreads itself out.

"O God, Thou art great!" I exclaim, involuntarily. "Great, as one sees Thee in the wide spaces, great in the smallest atom! But never narrow and little as men in their strife have imagined Thee."

Between me and the sheer mountain wall over there runs like a silver ribbon my old friend, the Euphrates. Not gentle and quiet, as is his custom. He seems to have something to tell. Is he speaking of the mountains that press in upon him, now from the right, now from the left? What secret is he disclosing, now softly, now with such impatience that he trembles? Is he talking about the old Roman bridge that lifts itself over him? or of the Kurdish wedding procession which, with brilliant colors and curious music, with wagons and horses and loudly-singing people, has just moved over the bridge? Is it of the song which the Armenian up there on the old fortress is singing, "All is still; the clouds have spread themselves out as a cover?"

No, today my friend the Euphrates tells me very plainly a story about Miriam Chanugian, a girl from Palu. He speaks so impressively that I can not but listen. Yes, there stand the ruins of her home, the house with the broad veranda, high up above all the others —the house in which she lived.

"Miriam! Her parents' greatest pride, the only girl among many boys. I see her still," murmured the river. "The long black braid, the rose in her hair, just as she looked when she played with her friends on my banks. I remember when she came to tell me goodbye, and to say that she must go to college, for she wished to become a wise maiden. And then she would come back and tell me all about Constantinople. It seemed to me then that I needs must weep over some sorrow that lay in wait in the distance.

"Years passed, and again she was there. What joy there was in the house. She stood on the veranda in the moonlight, the same Miriam in spite of all her womanly beauty and all the wisdom she had gained, and in spite of the fact that that day she had become a bride. She waved to me as her childhood friend, and told me the name of him who had become her husband. Oh, I had already known it, long before, when he had come to my banks and asked me impatiently, 'When are you going to bring her back to me?' Now she was so full of joy, it seemed somehow all the more painful to me."

The voice ceased for a time, then began again.

"A few weeks passed—and my waters were red with the blood of the many Armenians that were thrown into my bed. Children of my Creator, who clung to Him, whom they saw not, as if they saw Him, and from whom they would not be separated. Faithful unto death! Reverently I covered them over —the children of God—but I called out to the Power of Darkness, 'Conquered, and yet not conquered'.

"Then from the house up there the flames burst, and there were wild cries. They would not accept the religion of the false prophet and they all died—all but Miriam. And she—oh, what cruelty! She hung as lifeless, bound to the trunk of a tree. She was rich, young and beautiful. 'She must be kept to grace a harem!' they had said. And then they had gone away without her. Night came on. Something stirred the bushes. Some one came under cover of the darkness. Wounded and weak, he crept toward her, and tremblingly loosened the cords which bound her. It was her husband, and taking her in his arms he crept silently away.

"The weeks passed by. Quiet seemed to have been restored, and the hunted Christian people who survived came from their hiding-places. Among these were Miriam and her husband.

"The house of her parents was rebuilt, and in the course of time patient industry brought comforts and happiness. Once again children played on my banks as Miriam had done in her childhood. Then suddenly the war-cry resounded through the land, and one evening the husband and father hurried into the house. 'Miriam, beloved, they are crying for the blood of the Christians!' No sound was uttered. Each member of the family spoke with God—knowing full well that it was perhaps the last time on earth. Oh! Let me forget the picture!" pleaded the river.

"I saw them die," he proceeded, "—all but Miriam, who, like a hunted wild creature, hid herself in a cleft of this rock, and all the night through I listened to her prayer. But they were on her track, seeking her with glowing torches, and they found her hiding-place. 'Christ or Mohammed?' they asked her. 'You need not speak, only lift your finger'. But she feared not those who could kill the body but not the soul. And they struck her with the sword, making a deep wound. She dropped from the cleft which had been her hiding-place, into my bed, and all day she lay there while I cooled the burning wound with my waters. Finally, when she slipped away, there was a look in her eyes as if night had settled over her soul. Without tears, but with burning cheeks and feverish body, and with a heart wounded unto death, She wandered forth. I called after her a parting word. 'He dwells even in darkness and will lead you forth.' But she only laughed, and it was a hard, ringing laugh, as of a soul that had been hunted to death."

"Is that all? Is there nothing more?" I cried.

"You tell the rest," pleaded the river. "You know. Did she conquer? Did she come back to life?"

"You know, old friend," I answered, "that it is far from the beginning to the end, even of a river. And it is so with human life."

. . . . . .

Miriam? How did she happen to come to our city of Aleppo? I know not, and our friend, the Euphrates, knows not. We found her in a half-destroyed shed, a woman, crippled and old, not in years but in suffering. There in a corner, protected a little from the snow and the rain, lay her bed. Her bed? Oh, it was just a handful of straw, papers, and rags that she had gathered together. Typhus, one day, knocked at the door of her dwelling, and entered, not waiting to be invited in. He remained for weeks as her guest, but did not carry her away as his prey. "Even he did not want me," she remarked later.

It is Christmas-time in the homeland, and also in this land to which the Christmas light first came. "Unto us a Child is born, unto us a Son is given, and He shall be called Wonderful, the Prince of Peace". Believest thou this?

Deep snow, icy north winds! Life gone out, everything dead, frozen. In vain the longing, the dreams of the variegated flower-covered plains. Those lie behind me, those wishes and longings, with the struggles of so many human hearts; even as with that woman coming up this way through the snow with bare and bleeding feet, covered with rags, through which the wind whistles its icy song. She seems to feel nothing, neither cold nor physical pain. She raises her tearless face to the heavens, and asks, "Oh, God, why?" She knows only that one word, poor soul, and sees not the lights, nor the bright eyes of the children that cannot remove their gaze from the Christmas tree. She notices not the savory odors of the food for the poor, prepared by the children of the orphanage, and knows not that across the seas in my homeland the love of God has revealed itself in expressions of sympathy and service for these homeless, suffering ones, and that a more comfortable shelter awaits her. But she hears one sentence of the Christmas carols—"God is love. He loveth me." The warmth penetrates to her hard heart; the ice melts, and Miriam weeps—her first tears for many months.

"The recruiting officer, if he wants to get the pick of a nation, does not promise soft beds and good pay and an easy time: he appeals to the heroic, he promises hardships and pains and the risk of death, 'but', he says, 'the cause is glorious'. My call is to that same spirit of heroism in the more glorious cause of peace."—Mr. J. Corner Spokes in the Crusader.

For the Young Folks

The Dawn of the New Year.

Among the shadows of Time gone by,
Now does the Old Year hide and die.
The New Year dawns, with its hopes and fears,
Its joys and gladness, its griefs and tears.
Who may guess—of its gifts to all—
To whom the joys or the griefs may fall?

Oh, God, who knowest the hearts of those Who in Thy Fatherly love repose,
Pay heed to Thy children who cry each day—
Dear Father in heaven, send strife away!
Send down upon earth the gift of peace!
Let hate, and warring among us, cease!

And grant that the New Year's gifts may be Love and charity—blessed by Thee!
"Peace on earth, good-will toward men!"
And a surer trust in Thee—and then—
We will hope for all that is sweet and dear
With the dawn—God grant—of a Happy New Year.

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

The Courtesy of Jesus.

M. L. G.

It is hard to remember good manners, isn't it? To be quiet because there are older people about, to wait one's turn at the table, to listen without interrupting, to say please and thank you and excuse me, these things sometimes put a tax on people that not all the Ten Commandments do! But love is the fulfilling of these lesser rules as well as of the great law for courtesy, as one has said, is love in small things.

It will help us to be careful about courtesy if we remember that the Best Friend was careful about it. It was easy to ask a favor of Him; he seemed always to have time to be kind. When He was on the way to heal Jairus' daughter, He stopped to find what more He could do for the poor woman who had found healing even in the touch of His garment. We have no record that He ever declined an invitation, nor failed to hear to the end any story of need that was brought to Him.

Sometimes it is easier to do a kind act than to receive one. But how graciously Jesus could show His appreciation of a kindness! Once He went to dine with a man who received Him rudely, meaning plainly to show Him that the host did not consider Him one to be honored. Then there crept in a poor sinful woman, and, for the water that should have bathed His tired feet, she gave her tears; and for the towel, her hair. And in return He gave a reward none other could—He washed her dark soul clean, and wiped her sins away.

Would you not like to have been in the place of the one of whom He asked, "Give me to drink?" Or of the lad who could supply His need of a few loaves and fishes, or of him whose part it was to hold the reed with the sponge that slaked His dying thirst? We cannot do those things, but there are other deeds to do for Him:

"——little kindnesses
Which most leave undone or despise."

Every little kindness, every gentle deed, every little self-denial for the sake of others, yes, even ordinary courtesy and politeness, helps to make us more like Him Who has been called

The Greatest Gentleman that ever lived.

The Wild Blue Jabby.

The clock struck twelve, and the jabby gave himself a little shake. The haughty brown velvet camel, against which he had been leaning, moved away and the jabby fell over on the floor.

"My friend, who is this person?" Annette, the French doll, asked curly black Cho-Cho, who had only one bead eye left in his woolen face. Cho-Cho grinned and shook his head.

"I'm afraid he doesn't look very honest," said the swan in the Japanese garden.

"No more he does, thin," exclaimed Bridget from beneath her huge mobcap, "though's he's a pretty enough fellow if you look at his collar."

But now all the toys leaned forward eagerly, for the queer thing opened his red crayon lips and said, in a soft, ravelly voice, "f you please, would you help me stand up again, and lean me against something that will not walk off?"

The brown velvet camel gave a sulky snort and moved a step farther away. But good-natured Bridget began to tug at the jabby, and presently she had him leaning against the red rocker.

"What are you?" asked Annette at last.

"I am a wild blue jabby," answered the beast, rolling his triangular, yellow crayon eye at Annette in her silk frills.

"But what is that?" persisted Annette, in her high, shrill voice.

"Charles made me," said the jabby, "and he said I was a wild blue jabby."

"So you're some sort of homemade arrangement," sniffed Annette. "Do you know that I was made in Paris? And Miss Estelee saw me and sent me clear across the ocean to Sister."

"There are others of distinction," bubbled the camel haughtily. "I myself was constructed of the best silk velvet in New York, by the most famous toy-maker. The largest toy store in Chicago purchased me, and Mother herself selected me as a present for Charles."

"Oh, shure, an' we're all a fine comp'ny," said Bridget. "Miss Estelle's class at school dressed dozens of me, and the teacher said I was the best made of all."

"I, too, do not feel that I disgrace your honorable company," said the swan. "It is true that I was made in a little Japanese store in Los Angeles, but Kuroki himself arranged my garden, and Aunt Grace had a dreadful time bringing me safely to Charles."

Only Cho-Cho said nothing. He remembered very clearly that Grandma had made him out of an old stocking.

The wild blue jabby looked wistful. He could not boast of a journey across the sea, nor of coming from any great city. "I only know that I was made yesterday afternoon," he said. "However," he added brightening, "I heard Charles say I had a beautiful tail and Mother and Sister agreed with him. It is a braided yarn tail, and it is tied on so it will never, never come off. Have any of the rest of you braided yarn tails that will never, never, never come off?"

He looked around triumphantly, but his pride did not last long.

"Indeed, none of us has," said Annette witheringly. "And I dare say we are all thankful. Imagine a genuine Paris doll with a braided yarn tail!" She gave a little shudder.

But though she had just hurt the jabby's feelings, Annette was so curious that she had to ask more questions. "What makes your complexion such a very bright blue?"

"I am a wild blue jabby," he answered. "Charles himself said so, and he made me."

"How did he make you, pray?" sniffed Annette.

"I don't know," said the jabby sadly. "He didn't give me my eye until the very last thing, so I could not see him make any of me except my tail."

"I know how he was made," said Cho-Cho. "I was sitting right there and I saw every bit of it. Charles came into the sewing-room while Sister was having her new dress fitted. And he turned the sewing-machine the buttonhole scissors, and poked all the needles 'way down in the cushion, and upset the pin tray, and after a while Mother picked up a piece of blue cloth and said, 'Charles, suppose you sit down there beside Cho-Cho and do some sewing. If folks want to stay in the sewing-room they must sew'.

"So Charles crawled under the sewing machine and got a great big darning needle and a spool of thread. Mother was using the scissors, so he couldn't cut anything. He had to sew the piece of cloth the way it was. So he folded it together and sewed almost all the way around, in sort of points and scallops. Then he turned it inside out and stuffed it with snips and ravelings until it was nice and fat. And then he took a box of crayons and made a red mouth and a triangular yellow eye. And then he showed the thing to Mother.

" 'What is it, dear?' she asked.

" 'He's a wildblue jabby,' said Charles. 'Isn't he nice?'

" 'He's a beautiful beast," said Mother. 'But shouldn't he have a tail?' So Mother went to the cupboard and got down the yarn bag. Charles put all the yarn on the floor and tried to choose one color for a tail. But he liked the red and the orange so well he couldn't decide between them. He asked Mother which she thought would make the best tail.

" 'Why don't you use them both?' she said. 'Put a piece of that black angora with them and let Sister hold the ends. You can make a long braided tail. I think braided tails are lovely.'

"So Charles braided the tail. Then he tied it on tight, and that's how he made the jabby."

"But what is the jabby for?" bubbled the camel. "He has a great many humps, almost too many, if there can be too many humps. But he could not cross the desert because he cannot walk."

"He has a beautiful blue complexion," Annette admitted. "But I do not think anyone could call him handsome."

The toys were so interested in the jabby that they had not seen the morning come creeping into the playroom. They all started with surprise at the sound of little feet in the hall, and they were hardly settled into their daytime appearance when the playroom door flew open and Charles and Sister appeared.

"Hello, old jabby!" shouted Charles, and plumped down on the floor by the red rocker. He picked the jabby up by the tail. "Doesn't that hurt him?" asked Sister.

"Nope. I didn't put any feelings in him, just snips and ravelings," said Charles. "He's the only wild blue jabby in the world, and the nicest boy in the playroom.

And of course the other toys never said a word!—Beulah Amidon Ratliff.

My Folks.

I think my folks are very queer—
You'd be surprised at things I hear.
Sometimes it seems I'm very small,
And then again I'm big and tall.

At night I tease to stay up late,
But mother says: "No, no, it's eight.
Go right upstairs, and hurry, too!
Indeed, a little boy like you!"

At six next morning from the hall
She wakes me with this funny call:
"Come, come, get up, and hurry, too!
For shame, a great big boy like you!"

When through the night I grow so fast,
How strange it doesn't last!
I shrink and shrink till eight, and then
I'm just a little boy again.

"I'd Rather Fail Than Cheat."

Frank saw the teacher write the ten questions on the blackboard. They were all easy and he was soon finished.

He was about to fold his paper to hand in when he glanced across the aisle and noticed that Henry's answer to No. 5 was 68, and his own—58.

He began re-checking this question and sure enough he had made a slight mistake, which had made the answer ten less than it now came out—68, the same as Henry's.

Satisfied now that every answer was correct, Frank folded his paper, took it to the teacher's desk and returned to his seat.

When class was over he began to wonder if he had done the right thing, and he wondered still more the next day when his paper came back with a mark of one hundred upon it.

"Well, I really didn't cheat, for I didn't copy from any one. I just found out I made a mistake and corrected it. That was all."

Still, something seemed to say that if he had not seen Henry's—slow plodding Henry's—paper, he would have turned in his own, with the wrong answer to No. 5, his grade would not have been one hundred, but ninety.

The more he thought about it, the more uncomfortable he became, and along with this he had a low, mean, sneaking feeling that he had done something which he wouldn't be proud to have his parents or friends know—nor was he proud to know it himself.

On the way home that evening he fell in with Philip. "Say, Phil," Frank remarked, trying to assume a careless off-hand manner, "what do you think of cheating, anyway?"

"I never have cheated yet either in examination or class. In fact, I'd rather fail in every examination, than have to cheat to raise my grade even one point."

That remark settled the matter for Frank. Next morning before classes began he took his examination paper to his teacher, and though the task was one of the hardest he had ever undertaken, he told exactly what had happened, and when she changed his grade ten points lower, he was prouder of that ninety—for it meant a well-earned victory for his better self—than if he had made ten hundreds in a row.

"From now on," he said to himself as he came away, "one of my rules of life is, that I would rather fail in every examination, than have to cheat to raise my grade even one point."

And it was a rule that Frank never broke.—Selected.

THE CHRISTMAS WREATH.

By Carolyn Sherwin Bailey.

All in the woods was ready for Christmas. The little fir tree stood, straight and green, with its branches spread out like arms. It could scarcely wait for the dolls, and the red drum, and the candy sticks that it would hold when it went to the village. And it was even looking forward to having a Santa Claus figure on its very tiptop.

Every time the wind blew the icicle chimes rang a twinkling Christmas tune. A few green shoots of young trees and bushes pushed their way up through the snow to give the hare a Christmas dinner. There were red berries, too, for the winter birds, and some cones for the squirrel.

Way up in the top of a bare tree was a bunch of green leaves trimmed with tiny white balls, like fairy snowballs. That was the mistletoe, very proud indeed; for was it not going to a Christmas party? And the holly tree was dressed in red and green, all ready to go to the party. All the woods expected to keep Christmas—all but the creeping pine.

The creeping pine grew close to the earth in which its roots were set. It was slender and green and very beautiful, but it could not stand up as the rest of the evergreens did. It tried to climb, but back it fell, always to the ground again, and so it decided at last not to try to be a bush or a tree. It crept along the ground, green and curving, spreading a lovely carpet over the earth wherever it went. But the autumn had covered the creeping pipe with leaves and now the winter had covered it with snow. It was buried deep, and although it was the most beautiful evergreen in the woods, nobody had invited it to keep Christmas. Deep down, close to its mother earth, the creeping pine waited, with the roots of the violets and the May flowers and all other lovely growing things that one must hunt for to find in the woods.

The little fir tree was cut and went away merrily on a sledge. The mistletoe and holly were gathered, and dragged in big bunches along the ground. The snow birds chirped joyfully to see their feast of Christmas berries, and the cones clicked as the wind blew them toward the old stump where the squirrel would keep Christmas.

Then it was the day before Christmas, and the woods heard footsteps in the creaking snow.

"I wonder if I shall be able to find any. Grandfather said that he wanted some very much indeed," some one said.

Everything in the woods became still because a little boy had come. He wore a red cap and muffler and mittens, and he had a basket on his arm. He went in and out among the trees, looking down low as he went. At last he saw something green where the wind had blown the snow away, and he shouted with happiness. "Here it is!" he said. "Here is the creeping pine that my grandfather wants to make the Christmas wreath!"

"The Christmas pine had been asked to keep Christmas!" the chime of icicles rang out as the wind blew through the woods. "It has been favored above us all. It will be the Christmas wreath that hangs in the church door!"—The Outdoor Story Book.

A Concentrating Plant.

Martha Ralston came home from school one night with a determined look and more books than usual.

"We learned a new word at school today, mother," she exclaimed. "It's a long, hard one—Con-cen-tra-tion. It means putting your whole mind on what you are doing till it is done. Miss Mason says if we would do that we could do our work in half the time it takes now, and have the rest of the time for other things. It is true; I know it is. I spend two hours on home study and waste half of it talking or playing. Tonight I'm going to concentrate, and then maybe I'll have an hour more to work on my party dress."

The Ralstons were such a comfortable family to live with. When one had a new plan, the others all tried to help it along. So when Martha spread out her books and set to work, the rest let her quite alone.

"It's so easy, mother," whispered Martha, delightedly, when she changed books at the end of fifteen minutes; but almost at that same instant there was a clatter of feet outside the front door flew open, and in rushed a gay party of young people who wanted to take big sister May to a concert.

One of the young men, who was fond of children, tilted Martha's chair until she rolled out of it, and in the romp that followed she forgot there was such a thing as concentration. When it was all over she glanced at the clock in dismay.

"Oh, mother, twenty minutes wasted!" she cried, and flew to her books again.

All went well for ten minutes more, then there was a shriek from the kitchen that struck terror to every heart. As one person, the Ralston family hurried out to see what had happened.

"I told them to send me sliced bacon, and they sent me a big, ugly chunk. I thought I'd slice it tonight in case I should over sleep, and look at that!" wailed Katie, flourishing her wounded forefinger. "It's a piece of my mind they'll get in the morning."

When Katie's finger was safely tied up, Martha ran back to the living-room to find ten more minutes gone. She was working hard to make up the lost time when a tiny draft from somewhere struck the light globe over her head, and it flew, Fred said, "into a million pieces". Not near so many as that, of course, but it took a long time to find them all and to put on a new globe.

Martha gazed at the clock despairingly. A whole hour gone and very little done.

"Mother, I ask you, how could any one concentrate in a place like this?" she exclaimed.

"It isn't always so bad as this; but there will be many interruptions. Do the best you can tonight, and I will put my thinking cap on," said mother soothingly.

Martha had great confidence in mother's thinking-cap; so she was not at all surprised when she came home the next night to find the new concentrating plant all ready. The old piano nobody ever played on had been moved out of the alcove into the attic, where it was just as well off and not at all in the way. The old dining-table had been moved into the vacant place and covered with felt; and the big student lamp had been brought down and polished and filled. It had a green shade; gave a soft, clear light; and was warranted not to explode without warning. The alcove curtains shut this cozy corner quite away from the rest of the living-room.

"This is to be the children's study," said mother, smiling, "and there will be just one rule. Anybody that wants to talk must get up and get outside at once. Visitors won't disturb you if you keep still, for they won't know you are here, and if there is any unusual noise outside, you must not notice it. That is partly what concentration means—paying no attention to what doesn't concern you."

"That's what Miss Mason said," Martha agreed; "but when people roll around and things explode on you, you can't help being disturbed. I shan't mind just noise. If it gets too bad, I'll put my fingers in my ears."

It was Father Ralston who first called the new study a concentrating-plant. A concentrating-plant, he explained, is a place where ores are crushed and worked over and valuable metals taken out of them. The young Ralstons, he said, were getting something more valuable than gold out of their "plant"—precious knowledge and precious time. Martha agreed with him. Her lessons were better prepared; and yet she easily saved an extra hour for other things. —Selected.

Santa Claus and the Spiders.

There was once a most lovely Christmas tree. At the top of it there was a shining silver star, and on the branches there were golden and silver bells, and chains of paper, and colored candies, and flags, and packets of sweets, and presents of all kinds. It was so lovely that Mother called every one in to look at it. Father and the children came in to look at it, and the house-dog with his big brown eyes, and pussy with her big green eyes, and kitty with her little blue eyes, and even the mice looked at it with their little black eyes. Every one looked at the lovely Christmas tree except the spiders, because Mother had said, "This is Christmas, and the house must have an extra clean". And the consequence was that Mother got her broom, and the children got their dusters, and they began to clean in all the corners, so that there was no room for the spiders to sleep: and off they crawled up the wall, father and mother, and uncle and aunt spiders, and the little spiders with their curly legs, and they all sat round the ceiling in a row with their little legs tucked under them feeling most miserable because they could not see the Christmas tree.

Well, they stayed there until Christmas Eve. When Santa Claus came to look at the Christmas tree he heard some little voices calling him. And looking up he saw the spiders round the ceiling, looking most miserable. "Santa Claus," they said, "we do want to see the Christmas tree. May we come down?" And Santa Claus said they could. Down they came, and then they asked Santa Claus if they might walk up the Christmas tree. "Yes," said Santa Claus. So they walked up to the top of the tree, and looked at the shining star, and then they walked along the branches, and looked at the silver and golden bells, and the candles, and the presents. Presently they came down, they said, "Thank you very much, Santa Claus". Then they climbed up the wall again, and sat all round the ceiling, but they were not at all unhappy now because they had seen the Christmas tree. And when Mother came down in the morning, what do you think she saw? Where every little spider had walked on the tree, there was a shining thread of gold. And ever since then all really nice Christmas trees have threads of gold or silver on them.—Selected.

The Lights On the Christmas Tree.

Once the Christmas Tree lights were not lights at all. They were the colors of the rainbow. Just a perfectly good rainbow—the kind you see in the sky after a rain! And when Santa Claus made the very first Christmas Tree, it was easy to see that he needed a rainbow for a decoration. Because all the decorations he had were white. He lived at the North Pole then, you know, as he does now, and when he had powdered the tree with snow and hung icicles all over it and tied snowballs on the ends of the branches, he looked at it and said.

"No—it's pretty, but it ought to have some color on it. It needs some red and green and blue and gold—"

"Oh, Santa Claus," said the Littlest White Bear. "Let's put a rainbow on it!"

"That's just what it needs," Santa Claus agreed. "I'll send the Biggest White Bear to get one."

"Oh!" said the Littlest White Bear. He was so disappointed that the tears came to his eyes. "I was the one who thought of the rainbow. I think you might let me find it!"

"All right, then," Santa Claus said kindly, "but you must be very careful. Rainbows are easy to break you know, and really you are the clumsiest, funny little bear."

"Oh, I will be careful," promised the Littlest Bear, and he ran and ran on his fat little legs till he found the most beautiful rainbow. Then he picked it, and hung it over his back and went home to Santa Claus, walking very carefully. He walked safely past the snow fields and safety past the icebergs and safely past the slippery slides, and at last he came to Santa Claus' steps, and saw Santa Claus in the doorway, waiting for him.

"Hurray!" he laughed, waving his little front paws in triumph. "Here it is!"

And just then both his back feet slipped and—boom! He fell on his back, and the rainbow was broken into a thousand pieces.

"Don't cry, don't cry," said Santa Claus, hurrying down the steps. "You aren't hurt!"

"No, but the rainbow is," sobbed the Littlest White Bear. "And I tried so hard to be careful!"

"Never mind," Santa Claus patted him gently. "We'll put the pieces of the rainbow on the trees."

So they picked up a blue piece and put it here, and they picked up a red piece and put it there, and the Christmas Tree was prettier than if the rainbow had been all together.

"Oh," said the Littlest White Bear, "I'm glad I fell down!"

And ever since then we have had beautiful rainbow colored lights on the Christmas Tree.—Child Life.

Keep me from turning back!
My hand is on the plough, my faltering hand,
But all in front of me is untilled land,
The wilderness and solitary place,
The lonely desert and its interspace,
The handles of my plough with tears are wet,
My God! my God! Keep me from turning back.

TO "HIM THAT HATH TWO COATS".

Christmas, the great joy season throughout the whole Christian world, had a very dark shadow thrown over it for our rural mail carrier at Holy Cross Mission. On Christmas night some vandals broke open his garage and stole his car, and he has been unable to get any trace of it whatever. As he must go over a twenty-mile route every day, over steep and rough roads and in all weathers, this loss of his "Lizzie" is a very serious trouble. Uncle Sam's rural mail carriers do not feed on the fatness of the land, and this one of ours has had much sickness in his young family during the past year which has handicapped him very seriously and he is quite unable to buy another car, so must plod over those long miles in all weathers in a light uncovered buggy with one horse. We workers at the Mission owe much to our kindly "mail-man", but our sympathies are not purely disinterested. We have absolutely no means of transportation from our remote station, either wheels or hoofs and by special permit obtained from Richmond by the treasurer of the Archdeaconry, the mail-carrier has done all our personal "hauling", and now, what are we to do? Ten miles from the station, four from a doctor, twelve from a drug-store or a market, two from a telephone!

Who will extend a helping hand to us and to our faithful friend and mail-carrier? What better way to begin the year?

"He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none."

MARGARET JAMES,
Deaconess-in-charge Holy Cross Mission,
Batesville, Va., Albemarle County.

Deaths

DUFFEY: Died, at his home in Middleburg, Virginia, December 23, 1926, EDWARD S. DUFFEY, aged eighty-five years.

MRS. KENSEY J. HAMMOND.

MRS. CARRIE MACHEN, wife of the Rev. Kensey Johns Hammond, rector of St. Marks Parish, Culpeper, Virginia, was born in Fairfax County July 16, 1867. She was the eldest daughter and child of James Patterson Machen and Georgie Chichester, and sister of Hon. Lewis H. Machen, Assistant Attorney General of Richmond, Va. Thanksgiving Eve, 1896, in Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, she was married to the Rev. Kensey Johns Hammond, then rector of Immanuel Church, Wilmington, Del. During her life in the two parishes she made many friendships of ever deepening strength, and exerted a widening influence for good. Her husband found her ever a wise helpmeet, as she seconded his efforts in the work of the parish; and her children a devoted mother and counsellor. On the Sunday after Christmas, December 26, 1926, as the church bells were calling God's children to their Father's earthly House, she heard His call to the Heavenly Home. The interment was in Spring Hill Cemetery at Easton, Md., on Holy Innocents Day.

DEACONESS RUTH WILDS.

November 15, 1926, will ever be remembered as a day of sadness at Grace Hospital, Morganton, N. C. For on that date Deaconess RUTH WILDS, Secretary and Assistant Treasurer of Grace Hospital, entered into eternal rest. As Secretary and Assistant Treasurer of Grace Hospital Miss Wilds' efficiency was unexcelled. Since the death of Mrs. Walter Houghson Miss Wilds shouldered much of the responsibility of the business end of the institution.

Deaconess Ruth Wilds will be long remembered as a devoted and consecrated servant of the Master in Grace Hospital. Few women possessed the business ability or the knowledge of Hospital Management as did the Deaconess, which was to her credit. She was one of those self-sacrificing women whose aim in life was to give to the Master's service, finding no task too difficult for her frail body.

Deaconess Ruth Wilds was born in Schenectady, N. Y., November 2, 1861. She attended the Schenectady public school and was graduated from the High School of that city in 1901. She was connected with the Schenectady Public Library until she decided to take training at the Deaconess Training School, Philadelphia, Pa., where she completed her course and became Deaconess in 1910. Since that date she has worked in various fields of service for the Master. For a time she worked in Houston, Va., then at the Good Shepherd Mission, near Morganton, later at Trinity Church, Asheville, N. C. Then she came to Grace Hospital under Mrs. Walter Hughson, where she grew in the love and devotion of many friends.

Miss Wilds' work among the Morganton Missions and in Grace Hospital will be noted in the future history of this community and she will live in the lives of several Mountain Girls she assisted in their education.

May her soul rest in peace and perpetual light shine upon her.

public and semi-public institutions, including two large hospitals, and came in touch with over 1,600 persons. About 2,000 Christmas cards were distributed, many pounds of candy and all sorts of useful and pleasing reminders of the day. Six clergymen, a Deaconess, two lay readers and a host of volunteers made this possible.

Epiphanytide Missions.

So far the arrangements for the Epiphanytide Missions for the Crusade to be held by the National Commission are as follows:

The Church of the Nativity, Bethlehem, Pa., missioners, the Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins, D. D., and the Rev. Thomas Semmes of Richmond, Va. From January 9 to 14, inclusive.

St. Stephen's, Wilkes-Barre: missioners, the Rev. K. B. O'Ferrall from Cleveland, Ohio, and the Rev. Thomas Semmes from January 16 to 21, inclusive.

Christ Church, Reading, Pa.: Bishop Sterrett from January 16 to 21, inclusive.

St. Luke's, Scranton, Bishop J. M. Francis, Febuary 8 to 13, inclusive, with a presbyter to be named later.

The Diocesan Commission has arranged for and has accepted private arrangements which had been made previously for missions to be held in various places, dates to be selected by the missioner and parish or parishes concerned.

Mercer-Mitchell Mission Services.

St. Simeon's Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, is joining this week with four other churches in the Lehigh Avenue District, in a week of services. The four are: Leigh Avenue Baptist, Grace Reformed, Gaston Presbyterian, and Cookman Methodist. "Ted" Mercer, a descendant of General Hugh Mercer, of General Washington's staff, and Elliott C. Mitchell, a former Philadelphia newspaper man, are conducting the services.

Next week their services will be held at the University of Pennsylvania. The Rev. John R. Hart, Episcopal student chaplain, has arranged that they be held in the Chapel of the Transfiguration. There will also be campus meetings designed particularly to attract the students.

Processional Cross Dedicated.

In the Episcopal Chapel of the Transfiguration at the University of Pennsylvania, on Sunday, January 2, the Rev. John R. Hart, Episcopal Student Chaplain, dedicated a processional cross in memory of Margaret Frankenberger, who was a member of the class of 1922. She was president of the Women's Undergraduate Association. The cross is the gift of Elizabeth Rhoades, a fraternity sister.

Christmas Services and Entertainment.

The annual Christmas entertainment given by the Seaman's Church Institute, Philadelphia, was held Thursday evening, December 30, in the auditorium of the Institute. The entertainment was under the direction of the Rev. Percy R. Stockman, superintendent and chaplain, who made an address of welcome to the seamen. After his address he presented gifts to Pat English, of Dublin, Ireland, who is spending his first Christmas on land in twenty years; F. Harvey, of Port Elizabeth, New Zealand, the man farthest away from home; J. Hart, the tallest man present; Robert Benham, apprentice boy on the Westlake, the smallest seaman present, and John Struthers, Scotchman, aged seventy-eight, the oldest off shore man of the gathering.

The annual service and dinner was held Christmas Day at the Galilee Mission, Philadelphia. The superintendent, Mr. George W. Wilkins, conducted the service. One hundred and forty dinners were served. This rescue mission for down and out men has a service every night in the year.

R. R. W.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. Chas. Fiske, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. E. H. Coley, D. D., Suffragan.

The Rev. John T. Rose Leaves Cazenovia.

After an unusually long rectorship, thirty-five years, the Rev. John Taylor Rose has resigned the charge of St. Peter's Church, Cazenovia, N. Y., effective January 1, 1927, when he will go upon the retired list.

The first year of his ministry, Mr. Rose served as assistant in St. Paul's Boston, then after a ministry in the Diocese of Southern Ohio, and a short ministry in New York City, he was called from New York to Grace Church, Syracuse. After serving in Grace Church for three years he was called to St. Peter's, Cazenovia, and has been the rector here for the past thirty-five years.

Mr. and Mrs. Rose will spend the rest of this winter in Washington.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Henry Scott Miller begins work on January 1 as assistant priest at Trinity Chapel, New York City. Mr. Miller is a graduate of the General Theological Seminary. For the past two years he has been Vicar of the Chapel of the Epiphany, in Washington. From 1922 to 1924 he was on the staff of Trinity Church, New York.

The Rev. George P. Hoster, D. D., former rector of Emmanuel Church, Champaign, Ill., has been placed in charge of St. Mark's Church, Chester, Ill., beginning the first Sunday in January.

Archdeacon W. M. Walton (Retired) has changed his address from Vicksburg, Miss., to No. 378 South Orange Grove Avenue, Pasadena, Calif.

The address of the Rev. Erskine Wright is changed from Rockland, Me., to Franklin, Tenn.

The address of the Rev. S. S. Ware is changed from Berryville, Va., to McLean, Va.

ORDINATIONS.

In the Church of the Atonement, Chicago, Ill., on Sunday, November 28, the Rev. John Harry Scambler, deacon, was advanced to the priesthood by the Bishop of the Diocese of Chicago. The ordinand was presented by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Fleming, who also preached the sermon. The service was a very happy occasion, as Mr. Scambler was ordained in his own parish church, where his family have long been identified. Moreover, he is the first candidate for the sacred ministry to come from this parish.

On Sunday, December 19, the Rt. Rev. Hugh L. Burleson, D. D., of South Dakota, ordained the Rev. Arthur James Melbourne to the priesthood in the Church of the Redeemer, Flandreau, South Dakota. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Charles A. Weed of Mitchell, South Dakota; the presentor was the Rev. Valentine Junker of Madison, South Dakota, and the Rev. George B. Scriven read the Litany. Mr. Melbourne is a 1926 graduate of Berkeley Divinity School, Middletown, Conn., and came to South Dakota in September as minister-in-charge at Flandreau.

On the fourth Sunday in Advent, December 26, the Rev. John W. Smallsteig was advanced to the priesthood and the Rev. Frederick Thomas Trafford, formerly a Moravian minister, was made a deacon in the Pro-Cathedral Church of the Nativity, Bethlehem, Pa.

Bishop Sterrett, the Coadjutor of the Diocese, ordained the men. The Very Rev. George G. Bartlett, D. D., Dean of the Philadelphia Divinity School, preached the sermon on the text, "As the Father hath sent me even so send I you".

Mr. Smallsteig is a graduate of Lafayette College and of the General Theological Seminary. He served as the Bishop's Chaplain during his diaconate. On December 15 he became the curate of the Pro-Cathedral, the Very Rev. D. Wilmot Gateson, Dean, who presented the men ordained to the Bishop.

Mr. Trafford for some years was minister of the First Moravian Church in Bethlehem. For several years now he has been the Director of the Lehigh University Y. M. C. A. He will continue in his present work.

Dr. T. Edgar Shields, the musical director of the Pro-Cathedral, had prepared a very fine musical program in connection with the Ordination. A special feature was the presence of the children of the Church School until after the laying on of hands.

The Rev. Leslie Charles Bacon Hill was advanced to the priesthood in the Church at Holy Trinity Church, Spokane, Washington, on December 27. This was Bishop Cross' first ordination and he was perceptibly affected by it. Mr. Hill was made deacon about two years ago by Bishop Herman Page.

The Rev. J. A. Palmer presented the candidate; the Rev. B. A. Warren, of Walla Walla, was the preacher, the Very Rev. H. G. Hennessy read the Litany; the Rev. Messrs. T. A. Daughters and Fred W. Pratt read Morning Prayer; the Rev. M. J. Stevens and the Rev. H. J. Gurr read the Epistle and Gospel, respectively.

Following the service, Mr. Hill's parents were hosts at a breakfast at the Davenport Hotel. Included were the clergy, relatives and immediate friends, about thirty being present. The Rev. Mr. Hill has not as yet been assigned to any field.

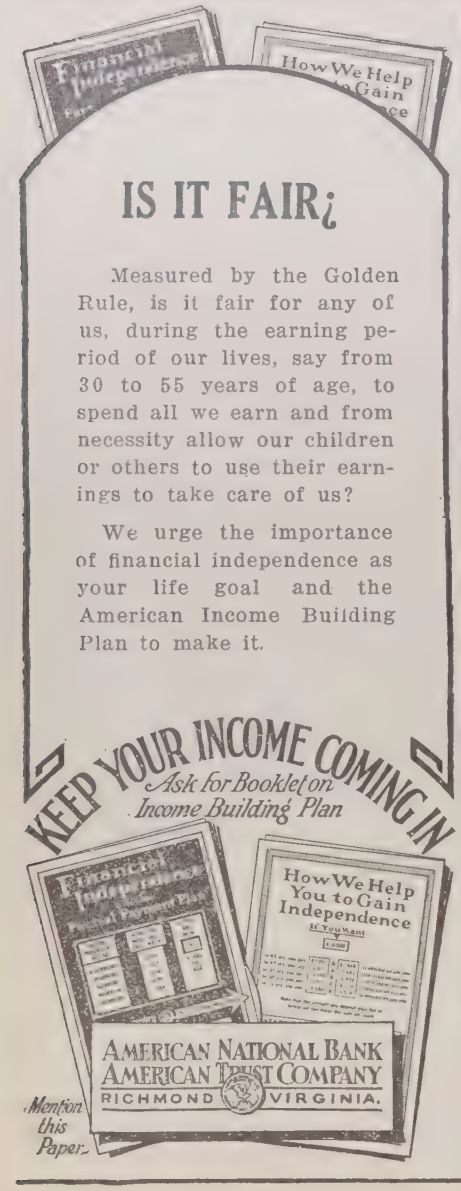
In the Cathedral of All Saints, Albany, N. Y., on December 15, 1926, the Rt. Rev. G. Ashton Oldham, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Albany, ordained to the priesthood the Rev. William Martin Tilton and the Rev. John James Paulsen.

Dr. Fleming James, of Berkeley Divinity School, was the preacher and also presented Mr. Tilton. The Rev. Dr. J. Wilson Sutton, of Trinity Chapel, New York, presented Mr. Paulsen. Assisting them in the laying on of hands were the Rev. Messrs. N. M. Burroughs, of Syracuse, and the Rev. W. J. Brown, of Manchester, Vermont. The Rev. J. Lee Roney, canon of the Cathedral, was the Bishop's chaplain.

The Rev. Mr. Tilton has been in charge of the Church of Our Saviour, Lebanon Springs, and of St. Luke's, Chatham, for more than a year. The Rev. Mr. Paulsen was recently appointed to St. Thomas' Church, Tupper Lake.

In All Saints' Church, Chicago, on Tuesday, December 21, St. Thomas' Day, the Rt. Rev. S. N. Griswold, D. D., Suffragan Bishop of Chicago, ordained to the diaconate Karl Johan William Tullberg. The candidate was presented by the rector, the Rev. F. E. Bernard, and the Liany was read by the Rev. W. S. Pond, rector of St. Barnabas' Church. Bishop Griswold was the preacher.

DEATHS.



The Rev. Myron G. Argus, chaplain at the Milwaukee Soldiers' Home, Milwaukee, Wis., died Tuesday afternoon, December 21, of penumonia.

The Rt. Rev. Benjamin F. P. Ivins, D. D., conducted the funeral services at All Saints' Cathedral, Milwaukee, Friday morning, in the presence of the clergy of the diocese.

The Rev. G. A. Chambers, rector emeritus of Grace Church, Jefferson City, Mo., died suddenly in Boston, December 17, 1926. Mr. Chambers graduated from the General Theological Seminary in 1873, was ordered deacon the same year and priest in 1874 by Bishop Potter. He held numerous charges both in the Eastern and Western dioceses; and in North Dakota was secretary of the standing committee as well as examining chaplain from 1892 to 1895. In 1908 he was a delegate to the Pan Anglican Convention in London.

On December 19, the Rev. March Chase, who for thirty-three years was rector of Trinity Parish, Mineral Point, Wis., and who had retired from active work several years ago, died at his home in Hammond, Ind.

The funeral services were held on Wednesday, December 22, at St. Paul's Church, Hammond, Ind., the rector officiating. The burial was at Rose Hill Cemetery, Chicago.

Vol. 92. RICHMOND, VA., JANUARY 15, 1927. No. 3.

The Bishop's Crusade

The hermit Peter called to arms
The Christian soldiery to win
Good Jesus and King David's Tomb
From sword of Saracen.

Mailed knights, men of the bow
Before God's altar made
Their solemn vows . . . and liege and lord
Went to the great Crusade.

A glory lights that holy past . . .
Who knows to-day, perchance,
God's soldiery may launch at last
Crusades of new advance?

Cannot we seek new fires of faith
As now our shepherds bring
God's grace of zeal, new strength to know
Their holy shepherding?

Snow.

"Stepney."

'Tis nearing eve; the sun is low;
His parting rays if light
Cast a golden trail across the snow
That pales as he sinks from sight.

The Earth in her robe has wrapped her well,
The downy shrubs and pine,
Are beauteous bowers where fairies dwell
Since touched by the hand divine.

Ere long beneath moon's silvery beam
And twinkling stars so bright,
A hallowed place will the old world seem
In her pearly gown tonight.

The world is old, and man was crude
Who saw the snows of yore,
And those who pitched their tents so rude
Sleep on 'neath many a snow.

For thousands of years it may come or go
When we have long passed away,
The sun's last flame will gild the snow
Just as it has today.

This beautiful thing that's sent in love,
This emblem of One that's pure,
Wings swift our thoughts to the realms above
To Him who sends the snow!

By THE REV. T. TRACY WALSH,
Author of the Word Abideth
Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Upper South Carolina
With an Introduction by
THE RT. REV. WILLIAM CABELL BROWN, D. D.,
Bishop of Virginia.

"The author's statement of Church doctrine seem to me to be singularly free from the narrow partisan views, and I feel certain that the book will serve to increase the love for the Church on the part of those who are already members of it, and will do much to remove the prejudices entertained by those who look askance at the Church because of their lack of knowledge of her history and the sweet reasonableness of her teachings."—From Bishop Brown's Preface.

Old Christmas Evans tells us in his diary, "I tethered my horse and went to a sequestered spot, where I walked to and fro in an agony as I reviewed my life. I waited three hours before God, broken in sorrow, until there stole over me a sweet sense of His forgiving love". And then he went and preached to a great concourse of people with such power that they too knew that God was both near and friendly. —Selected.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

An inspiration is better than an agreement.

Brains and religion make a combination hard to beat.

Love's old method is good enough for modern needs.

The power that comes down is the only one that will lift up.

The more a man knows himself the less he says about it.

Give our Lord your confidence and He will keep your character.

Life more than anything else is companionship, friendship, fellowship. Given a man's associations, and we know the man.—James L. Snowden.

Oh, as the years go by us,
As year by year they wave.
And many trials try us,
And everything is vain—
If God doth not deny us,
How can our hearts complain?
—Harriet Kimball.

Here seasons change, leaves fade, roses pale, mountains crumble, friends die, but the victory which God gives His people is an everlasting victory. It is a triumph that places its possessors on thrones that never shall fall, where they shall reign for ever and ever.—M. W. Knapp.

God is able to open the iron gate for you and for me even as He caused the great iron gate of the prison to open of its own accord. Let us expect everything from God, and He will do it if it is for His glory, and our good and profit! He can do miraculous things in these days as well as He could in the middle of the first century.—George Muller.

Worry is the antithesis of prayer. Prayer is an acknowledgment of faith; worry is a denial of faith. In prayer I tell God of my needs; by worry I cut myself off from the help which He would give. Prayer is putting my hand in God's, trusting to His loving guidance. Worry is withdrawing my hand and denying His power to lead me. Prayer leads, through the door of faith, into the presence of God. Worry leads, through the door of anxiety, into the darkness of loneliness and discouragement. If prayer does not cancel worry, worry will cancel prayer.

Creation is Thy symphony, O Lord,
And in it each of us a tone
Sentient with will to choose a happy chord,
To play our part within Thy score—
Or else—to sing our Psalm of Pride—alone.
Then trembling, throbbing, our untuned soul
Travailing, walks atonement's way,
And, fainting, sees attunement, its for Goal
Flicker—then flare bright again.
But now—through anguish—it learns to pray.
—Selected.

SHALL WE RESPOND?

Let everyone bring somebody else to the Crusade mass meetings. It is only through the personal work of all our people that this movement can become the success it should be, and will be, if it is enthusiastically entered into. There is no reason why any one should hesitate to invite a friend to attend one of these gatherings. They are of a purely inspirational character. There is no financial drive in the background. This whole effort is to advance the spiritual life of our Church.

From its very beginning Christianity has spread through communication, one to another. Let us get back to first principles. A glance at the first chapter of St. John's Gospel will show that it was the testimony of St. John the Baptist that caused Andrew and "the beloved disciple" to follow Jesus, and spend the night with Him. "One of the two who heard John speak and followed Him was Andrew, Simon Peter's brother. He first findeth Simon, his own brother, and brought him to Jesus."

A few verses further on we read of the calling of Philip, and then, "Philip findeth Nathaniel . . . and saith unto him, 'come and see'." There in the record of a few verses is shown that the number of the disciples jumped from two to five, by the power of personal contact, and the spreading of the great news.

So it should grow now. If Christianity means anything to us, His followers today, it surely means enough to make it worth while to tell others about it, to induce them to come and hear its message.

Why not break down the conventional reserve of Episcopalians, and put that enthusiasm behind this effort that a great cause deserves? It is not the purpose of this movement to proselyte, or bring in people from other churches, but to arouse our own people to a new nearness to God, and a keener appreciation of the value of His presence in the heart, and to seek those who are not now in any church.

Every congregation should be organized by companies of twenty, or fifty, according to its size, sub-divided into groups of ten or five, with captains, and leaders, each of whom will pledge themselves to reach from five to ten persons, either with a letter, or a personal message.

Some one will object to this plan, saying that they don't like to make a nuisance of themselves to others. How much life insurance would be sold in the business world, if all the agents were to assume that attitude toward their work? Of course, a few people will be disagreeable about being reminded to go to a church service, but if all God's work were pleasant, what credit would there be in doing it?

If the Bishops' Crusade is to be a success, and we believe it surely will be, it must be through the cooperation of the men and women of the Church. No amount of eloquent preaching can touch the people if they are not present to hear it.

The clarion call is going out to our people. The Protestant Episcopal Church will be on trial before the eyes of the country for the next three or four months. Shall she call in vain? The answer is with the laity of this Church.

PRACTICING PEACE

Christians of all branches, and the religious press of the world have been exerting all the influence they have to bring about a warless world. Now in the present Mexican situation we have an opportunity to practice what has been preached.

Already the agencies of evil are busy. It is one of the chief activities of the Devil to use a good quality for an evil purpose. The feeling of patriotism is one of those emotions, which in itself is most laudable, but can be easily turned to the uses of serious harm. Nothing is more gratifying to the Powers of Darkness than to stir up the fires of patriotism, and then turn on a strong wind from the wrong direction. That very thing is happening today in our neighbor republic.

They have had an enthusiastic meeting of their Congress, and there are other gatherings being held to denounce American aggression and sing patriotic songs. Even in this country some writers, like the witty Brisbane, with whom we mostly disagree, but who has an enormous following, are beginning to refer to a war with Mexico.

Why should we think of war in connection with the adjustment of matters with Mexico any more than two perfectly respectable business men should think of a club, or a pistol in arranging the settlement of some business difficulty?

There is no issue of that wonderful inflamable influence, heretofore poured into international disputes at critical moments by the Devil and labelled "International Honor". The whole world knows that the United States is not afraid of Mexico, and so we can afford to treat her with the utmost magnanimity and generosity.

If she has decided to adopt a new and different policy with regard to mines and oil fields within her own boundaries, which will involve taking over by the government of such properties, we must remember that, after all, Mexico belongs to the Mexicans, and that those Americans who have gone into another country to make money, should have taken into account the chaotic conditions which have existed there for more than a decade, and so have figured upon this possibility before they made their investments.

Of course, there is, unfortunately, the religious issue, which is always a dangerous one, and apt to be full of irreligious bitterness (another use the Devil makes of pious implements) and the K. C.'s (Knights of Columbus) have been supplying the K. K. K.'s with just the sort of food that is needed to keep that mischievous organization alive, by carrying petitions to the President. But again it will be well to keep in mind the fact that not only is it strictly the Mexicons own business what kind of religion they want, and what brand of education, but further; that so far as the Roman Catholic Church is concerned this little dispute is strictly a family affair, and if good Roman Catholics in Mexico have decided that they are a trifle overpriested that is a matter to settle within the nation and their own Church.

Finally this is a matter of the utmost importance to Christian people and it should be approached in the Spirit of Christ. He did not think in the terms of armies and navies, or dollars and cents, but on the broad basis of human welfare and love.

Some may think that all of this is the affair of our statesmen and national leaders, but the psychology of a nation is a curious thing, and every individual contributes his share, and it is the Christian duty of each reader of the Southern Churchman to think on this subject as though we had no army or navy to enforce our demands, and so to "Practice Peace".

CURRENT COMMENT

MORE THAN TWO HUNDRED THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS, representing over fifty seminaries of Christian Communions, ranging from the silent Quakers, without any forms or sacraments to ritualistic high Church Episcopalians, gathered at the Inter-Seminary Conference in Milwaukee, on December 27-28. They met to confer upon the great work of the ministry, whether carried on by an unemotional Lutheran, or a Methodist with all his traditions of spontaneous conversion.

Addresses were delivered by such Christian leaders as Dr. Henry Sloan Coffin, president of the Union Theological Seminary of New York, and Dr. Glenn Clark, of McAllister College, St. Paul, Minn.

Dr. Studdert-Kennedy was another of the speakers, and, as usual, he gave inspiration and went to the meat of the matter, summing up the purpose of the Christian ministry in one sentence, when he said, "Our business, as Christians, is to reproduce the love of Jesus".

Such gatherings as these make the best possible preparation for the coming Conference on Faith and Order at Lausanne next summer.

THE HIGH COST OF WEATHER IN 1926," is the title of a very interesting article in the "Review of Reviews" for January. It gives lists of the havoc wrought by the freaks of the weather in various parts of the world, and the losses, and sometimes the profits, caused thereby.

But the thing that interests us about this High Cost of Weather, is the fact that wherever calamity may occur, and whatever may be the sums necessary to repair the damage, and prevent suffering, the means to do so is always ready in the person of the Red Cross organization, which stands behind the cyclone, or follows the subsiding waters of the flood, on its errands of mercy and relief. Some people may think this agency is just the natural product of our modern spirit of cooperation, but, as a matter of fact, it is the direct result of the operation of the teachings of Jesus. To find the record of the first Red Cross expedition, we have only to turn to the eleventh chapter of The Acts of the Apostles, where we read in verses 27-30, "And in these days came prophets from Jerusalem to Antioch. And there stood up one of them named Agaus, and signified by the Spirit that there should be great dearth throughout all the world; which came to pass in the days of Claudius Caesar. Then the disciples, every man according to his ability, determined to send relief unto the brethren which dwelt in Judea: Which also they did, and sent it to the elders by the hands of Barnabas and Paul".

SOLEMN PONTIFICAL HIGH MASS and Requiem Masses were said in the Roman Catholic Cathedral of the Sacred Heart, Richmond, Va., recently on account of the death and burial of the Rt. Rev. Dennis J. O'Connell, Bishop of the Diocese of Richmond. The late Bishop was a real Christian leader, who took an active part in all civic matters, and was respected and beloved by all who knew him. Among the honorary pall-bearers were Protestant clergymen and a Jewish Rabbi, who considered it a privilege to pay respect to the memory of a worthy citizen.

On occasions of this kind, at the departure of a good soldier of the Cross, for the other life, we are drawn to a fuller realization of the Fatherhood of the Almighty, and that we are all struggling to attain the same end under the mighty leadership of His Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ.

THIS WEEK'S CONTRIBUTORS

MARGARET PRESCOTT MONTAGUE, born at White Sulphur Springs, West Virginia, has written several novels, and is a regular contributor to the Atlantic Monthly. She is best known for her short stories. "England to America" won the O. Henry Memorial prize in 1920 for the best short story written during 1919. "Twenty Minutes of Reality" first published anonymously in the Atlantic Monthly, as a religious experience, created considerable comment. In the past two or three years she has devoted a large part of her time to the study of Mysticism (the development of the inner self), and has promised to contribute some articles on this subject to the Southern Churchman during the coming year.

RT. REV. CHARLES LEWIS SLATTERY, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Massachusetts, was born in Pittsburgh. He went through Harvard and took his theological training in Cambridge Seminary. After teaching for a short time in St. Mark's School, and serving in the Diocese of Minnesota, he began a notable rectorate at Grace Church, New York, from which he was elected Bishop Coadjutor. He is a writer of distinction and charm. Some of his best known books are "Why Men Pray", the "Gift of Immortality", and his Life of Bishop Greer. The article by him in this week's issue is the first of a series on Character Building to be written by different authors and published during the next few months in the Southern Churchman.

RT. REV. JAMES E. FREEMAN, D. D., Bishop of Washington, is one of the most outstanding figures in the Episcopal Church of America. Born in New York City, he won distinction as rector of St. Mark's Church, Minneapolis. After building that parish up to an unusual state of efficiency, he accepted a call to Epiphany, Washington, from which he was elected Bishop of that Diocese, in the course of a few years. He is a virile and versatile speaker a man of tremendous energy and force. His book, "Every Day Religion", is of a practical nature, at the same time written in an attractive style.

MARY EVELYN BRYDON, M. D., born in Danville, Va., is a graduate of the Women's Medical College of Philadelphia, and has for a number of years been director of the Bureau of Child Welfare of the Virginia State Board of Health. She has written a number of articles for Medical Journals, and had wide experience in the conduct of Mothers' Institutes. Her series of articles on Child Training will continue to appear on the Christianity and Community page in the Southern Churchman during the coming months.

THE INDIVIDUAL'S PART IN THE BISHOP'S CRUSADE

By Margaret Prescott Montague

WHAT may the individual, the average Church member, do to further the Bishops' Crusade? What may you and I do?

In attempting to suggest an answer to this question, let me pause a moment and recall an experience of a few weeks ago; an experience which I do not doubt may happen to any of us.

During the Christmas holidays I lunched one day in a large public restaurant. My table was surrounded by a number of other tables, at which Christmas shoppers were laughing and chattering while they snatched a hasty meal. The whole picture was vivid with the excitement and gaiety of the sason. It was probably this spirit of gaiety and good fellowship running from heart to heart, like unseen quick-silver, or a secret messenger, which intensified my emotions, and cleared my perceptions, so that I was ravished by the beauty of humanity, and by the value and importance of life. One person after another leaped forth in vivid beauty. There was a little boy at a nearby table, so keen and alert, so bird-like with his bright eyes and cocked head, that it seemed he should have been flitting through summer trees, rather than perched at a city table. Across the way was a man drinking a glass of milk. A very ordinary act, certainly, performed by an every-day man, yet the slant of that white milk in the glass was on the verge of the miraculous. The young girls here and there, the waitresses whisking about with trays, the sunshine, the music, the flowing gaiety, all "were parts of an eternal glory", as Masefield has put it. With that insight came another, the lifting delight in the realization that all these human beings were in some hidden manner related to me, that there was a tie which bound us all together. This realization was a fleeting insight into the relationship which should draw all humanity together. Most of us believe in the brotherhood of man, or at least pretend to, but every now and then in moments of exhultation, we are vouchsafed a clearing of the inner vision so that we actually see the truth of our belief. The great spiritual instructors of the race have had full knowledge of this truth, but the average ones of us cannot hold the vision, and do not indeed brush more than the hem of its garment; nevertheless, even these half-sights make one extraordinarily happy, and pour the heart out in affection toward all the world.

This small experience is, I dare say, common enough, and would hardly be worth recording now, if it were not for the thoughts it engendered in connection with the individual's part in the Bishops' Crusade. These thoughts came as I pondered the experience afterwards. First, I wondered why a sudden realization of my kinship with all that Christmas crowd, should have made me so astonishingly happy. Why should I be glad, for instance, that there was some unseen bond between myself, and a plump woman eating spinach? There seemed to be no reason to rejoice over it on the surface of life, and yet down underneath, the thought made me so happy, that I felt sure if the others had seen the same thing, they, too, would have been so infected with joy, that it would hardly have been astonishing, if we had all with one accord, picked up our plates of bright-colored fruit salad, or more sober ones of pie and mutton chops, and gone off into a mad dance of joy. Yet again, I questioned, why an insight into the brotherhood of mankind should be so fraught with ecstasy? Then I realized that this scene of kinship, which extends not only to humanity, but to animals, birds, flowers, and sunshine, indeed to every aspect of life, is what is sometimes called "Cosmic Consciousness", and that Cosmic Consciousness translated into religious phraseology is the consciousness of the presence of God in every manifestation of life, and is perhaps what the Christian means when he speaks of the mysitcal Body of Christ. So indeed there was good reason for joy in what I had seen; for the bond that united all of us Christmas shoppers, was the actual presence of the Holy Spirit in the midst of us. When that revelation comes, one finds that the command to love one's neighbor as oneself, is not a difficult one, but that, on the contrary, not to love one's neighbor is well-nigh impossible. Pondering further, it seemed to me that the best service which the individual could render as his contribution to the Bishop's Crusade, would be a vivid belief in this fact of the actual presence of God in the world, and that the Kingdom of Heaven is already here. It is here! It is here! The Kingdom of Heaven is with us, and what we have to do—every Christian in the world—is not to bring it from some far-off remote place of the spirit; not to be looking back wistfully into a dim past, nor straining our eyes peering into the future for a hoped-for millennium, but rather to clear our vision to the overwhelmingly joyful fact that the Kingdom is already here.

> "O world invisible, we view thee,
> O world intangible, we touch thee!
> Yea in the night, my soul, my daughter,
> Cry—clinging Heaven by the hems;
> And lo, Christ walking on the water
> Not of Genmesareth, but Thames!"

Our temptation has been to look back too much, or to look forward dreamily, whereas "Now is the appointed time", "Now are we the sons of God", and now are we the inheritors of the Kingdom of Heaven, which is already in our very midst. What greater gift to the world may a Christian make at the present moment—or indeed at any moment—than to consecrate his heart, and clear his inner vision, so that he may actually perceive that "World invisible" so clearly that the knowledge of it not only informs the whole of his own life, but through him bursts forth vividly for the other human beings as well?

When the Psalmist sings "Lift up your heads, O ye Gates, and be ye lift up ye everlasting doors, that the King of Glory may come in", I believe that by the gates and everlasting doors, He means the gate of the human heart, and the door of the mind, which if lifted up—that is cleansed and purified by an ardent consecration—do literally make a pathway through which the King of Glory, the Holy Spirit, comes into the world, or rather becomes manifest to the world, for He is already in it.

How may we do it? How may we every-day people consecrate ourselves so that through the gate of our personalities the King of Glory may reveal Himself. Well, innumerable books have been written on methods by which the spirit may be dedicated, and the vision cleared, but for us ordinary every-day people, the whole method is summed up in eleven words in our Communion Service. in the Priest's command, "Lift up your hearts", and the people's response, "We lift them up unto the Lord". For the finding of the Kingdom of Heaven, there is nothing else necessary than the lifting of our hearts up unto God, that is, the eager turning of our whole personality toward God, adoring Him, purifying ourselves for His service, listening for His commands, and faithfully and joyfully carrying them out. Loving God, and serving man—it sounds simple, but we know that to do it properly requires all that a personality has to offer.

This, then, may be the individual's part in the Bishops' Crusade, and not alone in the present effort, but in the whole crusade of the spirit which lasts as long as we are here; to take home to our whole being the fact that the Kingdom is already present, and believing this wholeheartedly, see what we can do to open our inner eyes to a sight of it, for when one seeks and finds the Kingdom of Heaven all things are added unto one—all things that is not alone of material gifts, but also of love and kindness one to another, and vivid joy in the service of God. Shall we not, therefore, as our response to this Crusade, lift up the gates of our hearts, and the doors of our minds that the King of Glory may come in?

THE BOY AND HIS CHURCH

THE MINISTRY

By the Right Reverend Charles Lewis Slattery, D. L

PEOPLE are apt to say that the ministry has not its former prestige. By this is meant that no cast-iron public opinion forces a man to go to Church. There was a time when, in Spain, for example, if a man did not go to Church once in so often, thumb-screws were applied, his joints were pulled from their sockets, he was pierced, beaten, scalded, burned. Even in our Puritan New England, the man who absented himself from the meeting-house for several Sundays had a bitter time of it. Of course, the clergy in such conditions were, in a sense, masters of the situation. They could dictate foolishly, perhaps even basely, and people were obliged to listen. Now it is all changed. Men come to Church or not, as they are inwardly moved to do so. The prestige of that old time is gone.

And who is not glad that it is gone? The ministry of today cannot be inefficient and still look for followers. The ministry of today is the most exacting of vocations. It demands of a man that he be his best in every direction—in training of mind, in soundness of body, in cleanness of character. We, who are in the ministry must expect to fail just in so far as we are not our best. Every year the man who is not willing to submit to long and strenuous education, who is not willing to cultivate his physical strength, who is not willing to refine and ennoble his character, is of less and less use in the ministry. He may float from parish to parish, he may even be a bishop; but his use to himself or to the world must be trifling. I do not for a moment wish to intimate that a man must be a Solomon, Hercules, and Galahad, all in one; no superhuman brilliance or strength is demanded. But a man must strive most tremendously to be his best, or go to the wall, a criminal failure.

You will say at once: "This is strange encouragement to give in urging men to come into the ministry. You begin by telling its exactions." Yes, I do. First, because I am sure that I speak the truth. And, secondly, because I think our young men of today have enough fibre and fire to be undismayed before such a prospect. I do not invite you to a life that is easy; I do not invite you to a haphazard sort of life, intellectually, morally, spiritually, physically—in the expectation that, by hook or by crook, you will get on in this supposedly easy vocation called the ministry. This is not the age of the Eighteenth Century English parson; it is the age when to get on at all in the minsitry you must live with all your might. Every year you will feel the demands more bewildering, more enticing. Every atom of your nature will be called upon to yield its highest excellence. The ministry, in a word, calls on you to be your strongest, wisest, best. That to my mind, is grave cause for desiring a place in its ranks. It calls for everything you have—and everything at its best.

"But," you question, "does the ministry of today do any especial good in the world?" I shall pass over certain greatest benefits which the ministry holds in trust for all ages, not because I esteem them lightly, but because you are quite familiar with them. By such greatest benefits I mean the preaching of the Gospel of Christ, the administration of the Sacraments, the strengthening of feeble wills, the formation of sturdy Christ-like characters in the lives of the young. What I wish to do is to point out the peculiar uses which the ministry has for our own day.

1. In the first place, the minister belongs to every class. Being a member of every class, he has the opportunity to keep the classes of society together, in mutual understanding and love.

It takes no large gift of insight to tell that the most serious menace to the stability of modern civilization is the bitterness and suspicion that lie between class and class. The rich distrust the poor, and the poor envy the rich, and wonder how they got their money. The learned despise the ignorant, and the ignorant are afraid of the wiles of the learned. The governing forces first cajole and then hoodwink the people; and the mob cries out for anarchy rather than submit to what it believes to be despotism. One does not need to say that there is no cause for distrust; yet one may rightly be alarmed when some demagogue tries to kindle the flames of discontent. He is the most dangerous man in the nation who, appealing to bitterness and prejudice, attempts to array class against class. No true reform can be done by invective, calumny, fury.

Now the minister of Jesus is of necessity a bond between classes in the community. He is a servant of that Christ who was at one time so poor that He had not where to lay His head. Still, the power and riches of the universe were at His command. When a minister of Christ says that he cares just as much for the ignorant parishioner as for the learned, as much for the poor as for the rich, he is not schooling himself to say it. It is part of his very life to feel it, as well as to say it. These people are all in some way his. Other persons may divide people into classes and draw distinctions. He cannot. He not only does not wish to do so; it is impossible for him. For remember whose minister he is—not man's, not the world's—but Christ's. How did Christ treat men?—that is, his measure. A man is a man, no more, no less. If you fall to serving Christ in earnest, the outer distinctions drop away with startling rapidity. Perhaps the man to whom your heart goes out with truest affection has a million dollars, perhaps he has nothing but his daily wage. You don't think about that. It's the man you think about—what he is and is to be.

If some time, in loneliness or distress, people think the particular minister they happen to know best is more interested in one class of men than in another, I wish they might know what experience teaches me to be an assured fact; namely, that in a round of afternoon calls, for example, the minister has as keen pleasure in meeting his friends in one place as another; the outward trappings make singularly little difference. God's sunshine and the friendly heart of a man are the same in a king's palace and in the most remote cottage of the little village.

I hate to talk of classes. I wish the word and the idea could be abolished. Both are foreign to Christianity and to a free republic. But it is something that there is one vocation, the Christian ministry, pledged by the life of the Galilean King—at once the poorest and the richest of mankind—to break down all artificial barriers and to look at men and to value men for what they really are in themselves. Men pledged to war against such distinctions in any and every direction, can, if they will be true, do vast service in this age of envy and contempt.

2. Let me now pass to a second reason why the ministry has peculiar use today. It has the opportunity to answer questions, in a convincing way, upon vital subjects. One high function of the ministry is to teach. You sometimes hear that this is not an age of faith. People do not listen so calmly as once they listened to the voice of authority. They insist on knowing why, and how, and wherefore. The questions they ask are frightfully difficult. The weakling in the ministry cries out that it is all too bad; these incredulous people are, to his thinking, an insufferable nuisance—O that the age of so-called faith would return! I suppose no vigorous minister would wish to have that age of unquestioning faith (if it ever existed) back again. For it is not the highest sort of faith. A real faith is so serious that it puts itself to infinite trouble to know what it undertakes to believe. Sometimes this confidence comes as naturally and easily as it seems to have come to St. John; sometimes it comes with as hot a conflict as it came to St. Paul. In any case, it is not cause for complaint or regret that our age throws out question after question, asking persistently why it is that we dare to put our faith in so sublime a master as Christ.

The Christian minister of today, to be efficient, must, however modestly, be a student. I have no patience with the man who says that we need a ministry of trained intelligence in Massachusetts or New York, but a ministry of little or no education will do for the village in Idaho or Montana. I feel that the school-mistress who sits in the last pew of some mission school in Idaho can ask as keen and perplexing questions as any parishioner of Trinity Church, Boston, or Grace Church, New York; and I am surer still that it as much more important for her to get a sane and satisfactory answer from her minister. The minister is not expected to know more than his parishioner about business, or medicine, or geology, or law, or engineering—he ought to be excelled in all these departments by many of his congregation. But he ought to know more than they know of the present stage of knowledge about the Bible and about evidences for the truth of Christianity; and he ought to know the modern ways of meeting difficult questions. I may be wrong, but I cannot see how a man can meet these questions satisfactorily till he has had the intellectual contact and training of a great university or college. A man of rare power may get the training some other way, but most of us need the drill and the intellectual incentive which comes from facing pitiless critics who make us fight for our faith and so fortify us with impregnable conviction—not with a few glib shibboleths, which are apt to come tumbling about our ears the very day we try to build them into a real and solid faith.

The minister need not be what we technically call a scholar. Indeed, he rarely can become a scholar. But he must know the current thought of his day. He must read. He must know. Then his faith will be a bulwark for those who count upon his integrity and honesty. People will know that to the authority which he has from the Church, he adds a reasonable conviction. If some one has told them a startling modern theory, and the news makes them pale and trembling, it is wonderful relief to find that the minister knows all about it, is able to unwrap the truth from the falsehood, and is able to give that truth its place in the noble house of unshaken faith.

It is one of the glories of the ministry today that it dares to obey the old command, and, with all the modern implements and weapons, stands ready to give a reason for the faith which is in it, and which it has received from the past. Is it not then a high function for any class of men in the community to aim at least to be an authority on the vital facts of life and eternity—just as the physician aims to be an authority on the vital laws of health—and to try to bring assurance and conviction to men, whether they find faith easy or difficult? Tell me, does not the world very much need men who will make themselves sure of these supreme realities, and who will interpret them in the language of this generation?

3. I have only one other reason to give why the ministry has peculiar use today. That is because it offers a field for heroism. The crusades are over. Perhaps, among civilized nations, wars are over; certainly war is no longer the only way to settle a dispute. True, in order to get rich quickly, men brave the Arctic cold and the tropic heat; but someway the sane old world refuses to attach the name of heroism to such selfish hazard. Heroism, by its nature, must be unselfish, as well as adventurous. Now, strange to say, the ministry which often seems tame, offers today the one preeminent crusade of the hour. It sounds just as ringing an appeal as ever Peter the Hermit made—and it is a thousand times more rational. It cries: "Young and strong men, would you do hard things, great things? Then, off to the corners of the earth, and tell men of Christ! The climate is dangerous, the loneliness is unspeakable, the distance from home will seem unbearable, the obstacles to success are almost insuperable. You must learn a language of amazing intricacy, you must learn to think as if you were of another race of men, your whole life must be turned upside down. It is heroism to the last degree—it is hard, hard, very hard! But the battle-cry is "The world for Christ—will you enlist?" The men who say, "Yes," to such an invitation must be of finer stuff than the anxious people who trudge through bitter cold to get the gold of Alaska. They must even be of finer stuff than the best soldiers who go off to fight their country's war. No ancient crusade ever had half the splendor of this modern appeal. And it is rational, practical, sensible, real.

The men who are going, one by one, to India and China and Japan have better minds, stronger bodies, whiter souls than most of the best of us at home—and they are not fanatics. Their eyes shine with a clear-seen purpose. They are building so carefully, so strongly, that empires yet unborn shall bless their work, though these empires may never know their names. You should read of their schools, their colleges, their orphanages, their hospitals, their churches. You should read of their patience as they wait for prejudice to turn to trust, and trust, at last, to love. We say—through smiles, through tears, our hearts swelling with pride—"It seems as if it were going to be dawn in a little while". They shout, "The day has come—the Kingdom of Christ is to be everywhere—every heart shall own Him!"

I am only a prosaic person in a pleasant Massachusetts city, but I can tell you that my heart beats fast when I think that the most heroic heroes of this generation are my brothers in the Christian ministry who have sought out the hardest places in the world, to give all they have, without count of cost, to bring in the beautiful Kingdom of Christ. Other vocations can boast their heroes, too; but, I make bold to say, no other can show so many who by a fixed purpose make a business of heroism—though, with the perfection of devotion, they do not know it.

So it is that I have no apologies to make for the ministry. The Church is not begging people to come into the ministry, because, as people sometimes suppose, anybody will do. Anybody will not do. The Church wants only such men—not geniuses, mark you—as are willing to be their best. Any straight, intelligent man who honestly will be his best, and will submit to long scholastic training, will find that this particular time has use for him. He may help the world by breaking down class-spirit; he may help the perplexed by giving them a reasonable faith; he may help himself by giving his life to a complete heroism.

The ministry was never so attractive as it is today. May God keep out of it those who think that it is easy—for they will fail. May God bring into it those who know that it is hard—for they will be the happiest of mortals, and they will help the world to be glad, in the light of Jesus Christ.

THE CHURCH IN THE WORLD TODAY.

We need a Christianity which keeps prominently before the attention of men its genuinely spiritual quality. We need not so many wheels, but "the spirit within the wheels". The tendency of recent years, particularly since the craze for efficiency came in with the war, has been to make the machinery of religion more and more complicated and to have that machinery driven by technically trained men and women who keep it going by humanly generated forces, such as are often startlingly foreign to the Spirit of Christ. The craze for up-to-date Church organization, with a multitude of societies to enlist the energies of men, women, and children, ramifying in every direction from the congregation to the nation, claiming the attention of hosts of secretaries and business agents, turning the pastor into a bewilderered director of an administrative system, perpetually engaged in inaugurating, sustaining, reviving, and galvanizing into appearance of life a multiplicity of unnecessary organizatons, has done not a little, while stimulating the physical energies of the Church, to diminish its real power and influence in the community. . . . .

Not a little of the disbelief of the world today comes from the consciousness of a Church which in its lust for competitive organization, in its foolish habit of depending upon the reputation for statisticalized greatness, in its employment of methods more ingenious than religious to entrap men to the hearing of sensational pieces of self-advertisement, must surely be an offense against God and a blasphemy against Christ.

As soon as we turn the whole force of our ministry and the love and activity of our congregations into the task of spiritualizing the atmosphere of the communities in which we dwell, men will not be slow to appreciate the savor of our witness. To withdraw from the noisier world into the secret place wherein power is generated for the whole world's uses is not to relinquish the service of an active life. It is rather to manifest that new and higher type of activity which is not the less real for being primarily spiritual.—H. H. Gowen, in The Universal Faith.

GIVE, AND IT SHALL BE GIVEN UNTO YOU.

We are a part of what we gather to ourselves day by day, a part of the lives that touch ours. Whether we will it or not, contact works a subtle change; we may choose whether it shall be for the better or the worse, but change of some sort there will assurely be. We receive and give unconsciously, but we attract to ourselves only that which in some sense belongs to us. The magnet may pass through many substances, but it gathers and holds only the metal for which it has a mysterious affinity. If we draw out the best that is in others it is because there is something in ourselves to which it responds. If we find ourselves gathering opinions, ways, habits that are unworthy, let us not blame any one's influence, but look within to find what makes such accretions possible.

Mind is a magnet, that which it continually thinks it will draw to itself. Keep the mind fixed on strength, power, and love, and you will draw strength, power, and love to you.—P. Mulford.

LAST APPEAL TO CRUSADERS

By the Right Reverend James E. Freeman, D. D.

WITH the beginning of a New Year we undertake our crusade for Christ and His Church. It is not a crusade going forth in search of the Holy Grail, but a crusade for that which the Grail symbolizes. It is not a crusade to recover some holy sepulchre, but a crusade to make evident to men a living Christ whom death and the grave could not hold.

There is a call, a tragic and persistent call, for that which the Master alone has the power to give. The present age is characterized by strife and confusion. The spiritual ideals that challenged men during a World War have for the while been obscured to their vision. Materialism arrogantly claims the place of supremacy. The siren call of worldly pursuits and pleasures that disclose no consciousness either of propriety or reasonable limitations is rendering the appeal of Christian faith that imposes restraints and discipline futile and impotent. Sinister forces that openly defy and affront our Christian institutions, and seek to destroy our existing Christian order, are more clamorous and emboldened today than they have ever been.

The shadow of distrust and disbelief falls across the very threshold of the Church itself and halts those who seek it for sanctuary and repose. The oracles of the faith are questioned and challenged by an age of speculation, bewitched by new and strange doctrines that rob it of its balanced judgment and sense of repose. It is true that we have fallen upon a time wherein "men's hearts (are) failing them for fear, and for looking for those things that are coming on the earth". It seems like a new "fullness of time", yes, a "fullness of time" weighted with responsibility and rich with ever-increasing opportunities for broader and more consecrated service. The mightiest epochs in human history have been those when the courage of the Church disclosed itself through the challenging voice of the prophet, the prophet who dared in the name of the Lord to resist the tendencies of a vice-ridden age. History and civilization itself have witnessed revolutions in thought and practice that have lifted men to new levels of thinking and living, because a voice was heard speaking with an authority that would not reckon with opposition and would not countenance defeat. In a commonplace world uncommon men, empowered by God, have scattered the shadows, overcome the forces of entrenched evil, silenced the scoffer and set men on the way of truth and holiness. These have been the golden ages of mankind. Seeing with increasing clearness the trend of the age, a dying president of the Republic declared: "Our civilization cannot survive materially unless it be redeemed spiritually. It can be saved only by becoming permeated with the Spirit of Christ and being made free and happy by the practices which spring out of that Spirit". Another great president maintained that "people educated in intellect, but not educated in morals and religion will become a menace to the nation".

The situation that confronts us is one that calls for all that we have of intellect and devotion. We believe that religion, the religion of Jesus Christ, is indispensable to our security, our peace and our permanence in this world, and the only guarantee of happiness and peace in the world to be. We take up arms against the invader in defense of home and fireside; we are challenged today to call into action all our forces in defense of the faith by which we live. We need to be solemnly reminded of the dangers of a conceited security, and an arrogance that grows out of an unchastened pride. We turn with humility to Him who from the cross has moved the world. We lay aside our poor, man-made instrumentalities and systems and seek to be the inspired channels of His reviving and renewing Holy Spirit. We forget our little successes, our parochial and diocesan agencies and mechanisms, and with humility pray to be made His ambassadors, clothed with a power that He alone can give. We would substitute for a passion for organization and machinery, a passion for souls. To go forth in the power of His might and to feel the thrilling consciousness of our ambassadorhood, means to kindle a flame throughout the land that by His grace shall never be put out. Let us dare to challenge the evils of our time, however entrenched and strong they may be. We are hedged about with social, economic and political forces that would subvert the teachings of a Christian Church and render it quiescent and obedient to their selfish designs and purposes. We would be diverted from our quest for souls by a record of prosperity and affluence unprecedented and incomparable. We would be advised by those who are enjoying their selfish ease and prosperity that there is no need for aggressive action or an undue stressing of the claims of a Christ whose teachings impose self-discipline and restraints. Even within the sacred confines of the Church we would be admonished to leave undisturbed conditions as they are. It is to a world of sin and indifference we are called to go. To "make the indifferent different", to boldly rebuke vice, to assail and take the strongholds of evil, to show the folly and fallacy of nostrums that alleviate, but do not cure, to bring the whole Gospel of Christ to bear upon modern problems, this is the high and solemn challenge of this Crusade. It must not be another kind of mechanism whose power we invoke for a brief space, only to discard it as new mechanisms engage our interest. It must not be one more feeble and ephemeral effort designed for a brief period to arouse a lethargic Church. It might better not have been than to be so regarded.

To your hands we commit this high and holy task; to your lips we pray may be given an utterance inspired by His mighty Spirit; to your labors we trust may be given that measure of success that shall issue in lives redeemed. To His Church we believe shall come, in fulfillment of His promise, that grace and power that shall make it the compelling force to give new hope to an age that is wistfully seeking for light on its darkened pathways. May His grace be sufficient for you.

GOD IS KIND.

Surely the world has no greater need than to gain the assurance that God is absolutely kind; and, furthermore, to learn to look for the reflection of this kindness among men. In the simple acts of neighborliness, self-forgetfulness, and forgiveness, we may gain a true sense of God's kindness if we recognize these as manifestations of His love.

How patiently Jesus taught of the heavenly Father's care, using for illustrations the smaller things—the ravens, the sparrows—none so small, however, that it was not cared for by Him who reigns over all. And He brought home His teaching by the statement, "Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, . . . shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?" More than this, He proved that God is kind to the children of men, by healing all manner of sickness, lifting up the fallen, and healing grief. He was continually admonishing His hearers to be kind one to another; to forgive as they would be forgiven; and to do unto others as they would have others do unto them. Thus He taught that God is blessing abundantly, pouring His blessings continually on the evil and on the good, the just and the unjust alike.

The erroneous teaching which has made us regard God as a limited, corporeal person rather than as infinite divine Love, has also led us into believing man to be a mortal with a finite mind capable of hating, given to envy and strife, liable to sin and disease. So generally have we accepted this as the true status of man that all too frequently we fail to see much else in our brother than the qualities which are the exact opposite of Godlikeness.

Pause to consider the fact that the kindness of God must be expressed in kindness, and that this is the function of man, the real man. Whatever the creator is, man, the created, must be like; for man is image, reflection. Even as music must have notes to express the harmony of sound, so infinite Love must have ideas to show forth His qualities or nature. The Principle of man's being is divine Love, infinite, tender, true, kind. Every loving, unselfish thought and deed, therefore, has its origin and life in Love, the Father of all. What loads of fear would be lifted from mankind if they would ponder more earnestly these truths; what malice and strife would be stifled! God's idea, man, is at one with divine Love.

That Life is most holy in which there is not only petition and desire, but most of waiting upon God; that in which petition most often passes into thanksgiving.—F. W. Robertson.

MORE HELP NEEDED.

A calamity has overtaken the Colored work in South Carolina. In a letter just received from Archdeacon Baskervill, after thanking us for the publicity given him on this page, says:

"Since sending you our appeal our missionary work has received another severe blow. The bank in which all of our Colored missionary fund was placed on deposit has failed and we are now without money to pay salaries to the clergy, lay reader teachers and women teachers on February 1. We had to make special arrangements to meet our pay roll for December. We respectfully appeal to our friends within and without the Diocese to help us in this emergency. It would be lamentable to close the doors of our missions and schools in the country districts for lack of money to meet the payroll of our workers. The candle of opportunity must be keep burning in the Black Belt f South Carolina.

"Money for this most worthy cause may be sent to E. L. Baskervill, Archdeacon, 54 Bogard Street, Charleston,S. C., or the Rt. Rev. Wm. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop of South Carolina, 195 Broad Street, Charleston, S. C."

We again commend this very worthy cause to our readers.

ARTICLE II.—COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING.

My Mary Evelyn Brydon, M. D.

Child training in habit formation involves three factors; subject-matter, methods and result. By subject-matter I mean those things or habits you wish to teach the child. Methods is the means you use to teach him. Result means success or failure, the checking up part—whether you taught him or not. Here it is in brief:

Subject-matter—what to train in Methods—how to train
Result—whether trained or not trained.

This summary is for your convenience, keep it in mind.

Telling a child over and over to do a thing is not training of the kind I mean. Such a method is excellent for making your child dependent upon you for memory, initiative and resourcefulness. However, if you want him to possess these qualities in a way he can always use them whether you are present or not—well this method is about the worst in the world. He never will form the habit until he learns to do it without a reminder.

Here is an incident that will show you what I mean:

Mary was a charming, well-bred girl. I knew her well as a patient in the college infirmary. One day I inspected some rooms in her dormitory. Then I sent for her.

"Have you any idea," I asked her, "why your mother taught you to keep your clothes on the floor?"

"But she didn't teach me to keep them on the floor; she taught me to hang them up," she exclaimed indignantly.

"Oh, no, she could not have taught you that for I have just come from your room and find the floor littered with your clothes. Your roommate's clothes hang in her closet, but yours lie upon the floor."

"But my mother did teach me! She did! From the time I was born until I went off to college she never missed a single day to remind me to pick up my clothes!"

That girl is doubtless still depending upon her mother for reminders; and incidentally, she is not trained. Let us sum it up briefly for the mother:

1. Subject-matter: Teach Mary to pick up her clothes after using

2. Methods: Remind Mary daily to pick up her clothes

3. Result: At eighteen years of age, Mary is not trained to pick up her clothes.

Shall we look at Mary's mother a moment? Why did she fail? She wanted to teach neatness, conservation of wearing apparel, orderliness, thoughtfulness for others, property rights—possibly also, obedience. Out of these years of training, Mary possibly was well trained in obedience. She probably respected her mother's wishes, and on each reminder promptly picked up the clothes in question. She was loyal to the point of fighting resentfully any aspersions seemingly cast upon her mother. Loyalty, love, and obedience. You may say she came through splendidly equipped as regards those qualities. I agree with you, but I repeat; she was not trained in the habit her mother set out to train her in; the result was negative. Do you imagine this mother is satisfied with this result of her years of patient training?

To properly train a child, or any one, to do a thing until the habit becomes automatic, requires something on the part of the mother which we might call, for lack of a better name, impersonal viewpoint.

Sometimes a mother's love for her child obscures her vision and she finds it difficult to think about the child's habits as they may or may not affect other people. Her point of view is naturally personal. This is not a criticism. All mothers are naturally personal in their treatment of their children and we would not have them otherwise. But I insist that the mother, or whoever is going to train the child, in her training process must also treat the child impersonally. Think of him, if you will, as a bundle of instincts, uncoordinated activities, and insatiable curiosity. These are personal angles. This point of view is necessary, but it isn't all. Think also of him as one who must live for the rest of his life with and among other people. The process of preparing him to live with and among other people requires a plan of a kind, call it orderly thinking about the problem of child training; call it organizing the training process; call it what you will, it involves an impersonal attitude of mind which you must use in operating this life business of yours. You use it unconsciously.

This impersonal program is what I have already enumerated above, but before we go into these matters with any degree of thoroughness we need to clarify our thinking in regard to values. Were we to set down on paper a list of the things, habits and traits, etc., we would like our child to possess, we would see a list of words running up into the dozens or even scores. Of all these things to teach, which is most important? We cannot decide this alone, so before we go much further we must call for help. But before you go into what to train in, that is, your subject-matter, or into how to train, that is, methods, or result that is success or failure let us get back to fundamental principles and get certain things straight in our minds: First—It is the Holy Spirit which is in you (if you have surrendered to Christ and have asked Him to come in), who will guide you in these matters. Second—That He can teach (and no one else except those whom He commissions) you everything you need to know in your job of child training. Third—That all the belief in the world that the Spirit is right now in you and that He can teach you all things will not help you in the slightest degree unless you take yourself to Him for instructions. A teacher cannot teach unless the pupil comes to him in a receptive mood. You will get nothing from reading this unless you are willing to learn.

This is such an important point that we shall have to discuss it a little further before we can get on to subjects and methods. Therefore, next week we will talk about "Keeping our Communications Open", and between now and then in order that you may be ready with an open mind for our discussion, I am going to ask that every one of us continue to read the daily portion of Scripture arranged for us to read below:

Jan. 15, Heb. 10:1-25.
Jan. 16, Rom. 12:6-16.
Jan. 17, James 1:19-27.
Jan. 18, Col. 3:12-25.
Jan. 19, Mark 12:28-34.
Jan. 20, James 2:19-26.
Jan. 21, 1 Cor. 3:1-17.
Jan. 22, Titus 3:1-8.
Jan. 23, Rom. 12:16-21.
Jan. 24, Exodus 23:1-8.
Jan. 25, Acts 9:1-22.
Jan 26, Mark 9:38-50.
Jan. 27, Genesis 45:1-15.
Jan. 28, Heb. 3:1-13.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

A BOOK EVERY CRUSADER SHOULD READ.

Mr. Editor:

Let me recommend to every Crusader, through your columns, as a preparation of the first rank for his high task of crusading for Christ and His Church, the quiet, thoughtful, meditative reading of the little book by E. Stanley Jones, "The Christ of the Indian Road". Bishop, Priest, Layman, Laywoman, read "The Christ of the Indian Road" before you go out on the Bishops' Crusade. If you have already read it, read it again—especially with a view to getting spiritual meat and drink to carry you through this great movement. This book is a schooling in evangelism that I would not have missed for any consideration.

"Christianity must be defined as Christ." Christianity is not an argument but a life. Christianity is not a Church or a sect—but the life of Jesus in the human soul, and mind and conduct. Christianity is not sacramentarianism, or modernism, or fundamentalism—but Christianity is Christ!

"Christ must be interpreted in terms of Christian experience, rather than through mere argument." Ah, so many of us have no real and vital "experience" of Christ —there's the rub. Christianity needs no verbal defense—it needs Christian conduct and Christian character and the reproducing of the Life of Jesus!

"Christendom is 'finding a precarious living by washing each other's clothes'." There is a sermon in a sentence! Denominationalists, sectarians, "I-am-holier-than-thou" men, modernists and fundamentalists, ritualists, High Churchmen, Low Churchmen—these are all too busy "washing the other party's clothes". We are all too much concerned with the spiritual cleanliness of the other group—and too little concerned with our own spiritual "uncleanness!" This is the worst kind of paganism—and it is no Christianity at all! THINK ON THESE THINGS.

CHURCH EXTENSION AMONG COLORED PEOPLE.

Mr. Editor:

Evangelism is our present great theme. For forty years, as a minister of this Church, has the same subject been dear to my heart, with special respect to the people of the group of which I am a part. I say it rather with a feeling of sadness, our Church seems more than a half century behind in aggressive earnestness with respect to Church extension among the Colored people. When I recall such familiar names as Messrs. John L. Williams, Lewis Ginter, Joseph Bryan, Joseph Wilmer, Mann Page, and Drs. Dashiell, Pike Powers, Weddell, and others, and remember their activity and zeal in this department of the Church's work, in the presence of the present indifference, I marvel.

We have not kept pace with the material and intellectual progress of the Colored group. The Episcopal Church is yet practically unknown to them. We are failing to effectively touch the advancing life of the Colored race. We are, indeed, helping on the education of that race, but we are not extending the Church among them. I have the courage to plead for a General Missionary in every Province of the Church, where Colored people are numerously settled.

Three or four of the very best Negro priests that we have should be called into this larger service of the Church in making known her gifts and blessings for the Colored race. And, of course, these men should be neither deaf nor dumb. We must send forth to this people men who can talk, who have a live message, and who are so well acquainted with Negro life, conditions, and organizations, as to gain a ready hearing before the masses of the race. Men who will not hold themselves aloof from their denominational brethren, but who will go in among them, and, by virtue of their superior equipment, and sympathetic concern for their race, easily take their rightful place of leadership.

The Church must soon make a bold and aggressive effort in this field, or else, I verily believe that the opportunity will be lost.

The Great Commission

THE NATIONAL CHURCH MISSION IN JAPAN.

By The Rt. Rev. John Cale McKim, D. D.

The Church in Japan at its 1926 General Convention decided to celebrate the fortieth anniversary of its founding in 1927 by holding a National Church Mission throughout Japan. The Missionary Council of the Church in Japan has requested the cooperation of the Press Evangelistic Bureau. The Press Evangelistic Bureau has been engaged in the past few years in doing what is called "newspaper evangelism", or the putting of Christian articles in the Japanese press and following them up by inviting correspondence with those interested. To such correspondents suitable literature is sent, together with information about the "New Life Society", for those who want to go further in their studies. As paying members of this Society they are entitled to certain privilege, e. g., the use of a Christian Circulating Library, a monthly magazine, a Bible study course, Church introductions where possible, and where impossible a correspondence course.

As a result of these weekly articles in the secular press, the Press Evangelistic Bureau has had over 10,000 applications from all over the Japanese Empire; it has enrolled over 1,600 members in the New Life Society, and it has lent over 10,000 books, ninety per cent in non-Christian homes. Over three hundred persons are taking this Bible study course, and over two hundred have been introduced, at their own expressed wish, to local churches, and news of baptisms comes nearly every week. This work is something more than mere publicity, it is definite evangelism. This bureau is asked by the Missionary Council of the Church in Japan to cooperate with it in the National Church Mission by placing in the local press Christian articles, both before and during the Mission in every one of the one hundred and fifty centers where the National Church Mission is to be held. By this means a tremendous number of people will have been reached by the written word, and through it it is hoped many of them will be attracted to hear the spoken word at the time the Mission is held in each one of these centers.

The Japanese Church is shouldering the greater part of the general expenses of the Mission, and they now invite the assistance of the Mother Churches of America, Canada and England in this supplementary but vital Press Evangelistic Campaign. This campaign in each Mission station, as outlined above, will cost from fifty to one hundred dollars, according to the number of insertions of Christian articles before and during the time of the Mission. There are fifty or more central stations in the three districts for which the American Church Mission is responsible. Are there not individuals, or groups of individuals, who may care to adopt one or more stations and bear the expense for this Press Evangelistic Campaign of the National Church Mission, so that all may realize their share in the National Church Mission?

ST. BARNABAS' HOSPITAL, OSAKA.

Work of More Than Fifty Years Interrupted by Lack of Equipment.

There are only two mission hospitals in Japan, St. Luke's Tokyo, and St. Barnabas, Osaka. St. Barnabas' is less familiar than St. Luke's, but it has been there for more than fifty years, starting as a dispensary in 1874. The fine work of Dr. Henry Laning is known to all who are familiar with the Church's Mission in Japan. He began work there in 1873, built the hospital in 1883, and continued as its director until his retirement in 1915, less than two years before his death. Dr. McSparran was in charge until 1924. St. Barnabas' is now under the directorship of Dr. Teuesler, head of St. Luke's, Tokyo, with Dr. J. D. Southworth as resident vice-director.

The Advance Work program contains an item of $25,000 for surgical equipment, plumbing, electrical installation, beds and other furniture.

The new building, whose erection was interrupted by the earthquake of 1923 and by other delays, is finished, but not yet equipped. A dispensary is open, and plans go forward for developing a demonstration hospital, small but valuable in a special field of immense need in Japan, the care of women and children, with follow-up social welfare work.

To appreciate at all the need for and the value of such an institution it must be realized that Osaka is no picturesque Japanese village, but a huge industrial city of more than two million population. And in Osaka there are fewer than two hundred free beds in maternity hospitals. There are fifty-two beds in a children's hospital, none free. The death rate of babies under one year of age was over sixty-seven per cent in Osaka in 1925; 42,502 babies died.

Much is heard of Japan's advance in the medical profession and much is true, but the fact remains that the average Japanese physician cannot be rated at more than a fair standard, and the functioning of Japanese hospitals leaves much to be desired. Imposing buildings with beautiful entrances reveal dirt, soiled uniforms, crowded, dark wards, where friends and relatives carry on both conversation and cooking. Rooms where the experimental animals are kept have been seen in better condition than those of charity patients.

The standing of nurses in Japan is pitiably low. Ordinarily, they are justly described as the slaves of the doctors, as different in position as can be imagined from the high-minded women of the nursing profession as we know it, or as mission hospitals are revealing it to the Orient, where, for example it bears such fruit as our own Araki San in Tokyo.

Recognition of the need for social service work done in connection with a hospital is in many cases making lamentably slow progress here at home. In Japan it is all but unknown.

It is hoped that support already long delayed may enable St. Barnabas' to become a small but model demonstration hospital for maternity care and for work with women's and children's diseases, together with all the follow-up instruction and home care that is included in the best standards of hospital social service.

Furthermore, "to us missionaries", writes Dr. Southworth in The Church in Japan, "the religious influence of St. Barnbas' is the all-important side. This is under the direction of the Rev. P. A. Smith, aided in every possible way by myself. Under his immediate supervision is the hospital chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Tanaka.

"The hospital will in every way possible cast its Christian influence on all who come within its doors. Its social service department will carry its Christian influence into thousands of home. . . .

"Old St. Barnabas' Hospital was a tremendous power in the spread of Christianity in Osaka. God grant that with His divine guidance and assistance we may make our new St. Barnabas', with its so much greater facilities and increased opportunities, such a force in the Christianizing of Osaka and Japan, that long after our humble efforts have been forgotten, St. Barnabas' Hospital, still carrying on the ideals of its founder, Dr. Laning, will live in the memory of the Japanese people."

To Move Berkeley Divinity School to New Haven.

Decision of the Trustees of Berkeley Divinity School, located since 1854 at Middletown, Conn., to move the institution to New Haven in close proximity to Yale University, was announced at a dinner at the Hotel Commodore, January 5, given in honor of the Rev. G. A. Studdert-Kennedy, by the Berkeley Associates. The announcement was made by Henry Goddard Leach, editor of the "Forum". Other speakers were Canon Anson Phelps Stokes, of Washington Cathedral, President James R. Angell of Yale University, and Dr. Studdert-Kennedy. About three hundred guests were present.

The following evening, January 6, the announcement was made to a large gathering of the Connecticut clergy and many prominent lay men and women by the Rt. Rev. Chauncey B. Brewster, Bishop of Connecticut, at a public meeting in Woolsey Hall, New Haven. Dean Clarence Mendell, of Yale, and Dean Charles R. Brown, of Yale Divinity School, spoke in addition to Dr. Studdert-Kennedy.

It was made clear that Berkeley Divinity School had no intention whatever of losing its identity by moving to New Haven. The School would not become connected with Yale in any way other than that of becoming a neighbor and thus gaining use of libraries, other facilities of a great university and the possibility of Berkeley's students' taking certain courses valuable to their work. Dean Brown welcomed the move as beneficial to all concerned and said Yale Divinity School looked forward eagerly to the new association. President Angell and Dean Mendell were equally cordial in endorsing the plan.

Dr. Stokes, in his New York address, declared that never before was there a greater need of training ministers than today. He cited the number of Congressional investigations into graft in politics, the crime records in America, the ratio of one divorce to eight marriages, the low moral tone of the theatre and popular literature as evidence of something wrong in the country. He then contrasted such a condition with the Kingdom of Christ wherein every man was brother to his neighbor and righteousness and justice prevail. To bridge the gap a trained ministry is needed.

Dr. Stokes said that there were precedents in great number for Berkeley undertaking to move to a seat of learning. The best medical school in the country, he said, was located at Litchfield, Conn., a century ago. Today it is not possible to find a medical school of importance standing outside a large city or a university center. A similar trend exists in the legal world. Why not in the theological world? He said he wished wealthy persons would become as much interested in this phase of education as they have become in the growth of other professional schools. Otherwise, without a ministry trained to the full, Dr. Stokes said he "despaired of the future".

Intercessions for the Bishops' Crusade.

In response to the request of the Commission, January 7 was observed as a Day of Special Prayer and Intercession for the Crusade at the Church Missions House, New York, from 9 A. M. to 4 P. M.

The Holy Communion was celebrated at 9 A. M., as usual, and the remainder of the day was divided into fifteen minute periods.

At the opening period of each hour a brief address was given on the seven objectives of the Crusade; the other periods were for silent prayer.

Missionaries In China Safe.

A cable signed by Bishop Roots from Hankow was received at the Church Missions House on January 6:

"Staff in Hankow and Wuchang all safe and well. No violence reported from out-stations."

Through our Shanghai office we have received the following cable from Bishop Roots:

"Have accepted the assurance of the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Cantonese Government that missionaries will be protected. All missionaries are therefore remaining at their stations."

Field Department Secretary Gdes to St. Paul's, Albany.

The Presiding Bishop has accepted with regret the resignation of the Rev. A. R. McKinstry, who has been elected rector of St. Paul's Church, Albany, N. Y., succeeding the Rev. Roelif H. Brooks, now rector of St. Thomas', New York City. Mr. McKinstry, who assumes his new duties on the first Sunday in February, has been corresponding secretary of the Field Department since 1924.

Since 1924 Mr. McKinstry has rendered conspicuous service in the administration of the affairs of the Field Department and in developing certain aspects of the work which have enabled the Department to render more effective service to the parishes.

While his going will be a great loss to the Field Department staff, the ripe experience he has had in the past three years will always be an asset to the Church's work wherever he may be.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. H. St. G. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor.

Appointed Chaplain at West Point.

The Rev. Arthur Barksdale Kinsolving, assistant minister at St. Paul's Memorial Church, University of Virginia, has been appointed chaplain at the U. S. Military Academy at West Point, N. Y. He reported for duty on Friday, January 7.

Mr. Kinsolving is a son of the Rt. Rev. L. L. Kinsolving, Bishop of Southern Brazil. He was educated at the Episcopal High School, near Alexandria, and at the University of Virginia. He saw service abroad during the World War and upon his return to this country was engaged in business in Philadelphia for some time.

Old Prayer Book Presented to the Church House.

Miss Kinnie E. Smith, of Parkersburg, W. Va., has presented an ancestral Prayer Book dated 1739, printed in Old English, to the Church House in Richmond.

It is in a fine state of preservation, and belonged to Colonel James Goodwin, one of Virginia's earliest settlers.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishops' Crusade in Southwestern Virginia Begins at Roanoke.

Sunday, January 9, was the opening day of the Bishops' Crusade in Roanoke, and the various services of the day inaugurated in a fitting manner this great movement in the Protestant Episcopal Church.

Holy Communion was celebrated at St. John's Church at eight o'clock in the morning.

The Rev. G. Otis Mead, rector of Christ Church, being ill, the Rt. Rev. George W. Davenport, D. D., of Easton, Md., preached an inspiring sermon in that church from Revelations 3:15—"I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot; I would thou wert cold or hot".

At the morning service in St. John's Church, of which the Rev. Alfred Rives Berkeley is rector, the Rev. Jennings Wise Hobson, who is assisting Bishop Davenport in the Crusade, was the preacher, taking his text from Jeremiah 50:4-5—"In those days, and in that time, saith the Lord, the Children of Israel shall come, they and the children of Judah together, going and weeping; they shall go and seek the Lord their God. They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward . . ."

In the afternoon there was a special service at Christ Church for the young people of the Roanoke and Salem Churches. This was conducted by the Rev. Mr. Hobson, taking as his subject that stirring statement of Saint Paul, "Whereupon, O King Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision".

The Crusade opened officially with the evening service in St. John's Church. Christ and St. Peter's Churches were closed and St. John's was filled to its capacity. In the chancel were Bishop Jett, Bishop Davenport, the Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley of St. John's and the Rev. Alfred C. Bussingham of St. Peter's. The music was rendered by the choir of Christ Church.

Bishop Jett discussed briefly the Crusade and its objectives and introduced the visiting Crusaders. Bishop Davenport preached the sermon from the text, "Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand".

Each morning from Monday to Friday, there will be a celebration of Holy Communion at 7:30 A. M., at both St. John's and Christ Churches. Each afternoon at three o'clock, from Monday to Thursday, inclusive, the Rev. Mr. Hobson will lead a series of congregational conferences, in St. John's Church. The subjects of these, from day to day, will be: 1, The place of the Bible in Christian Living; 2, Prayer and the Devotional Life (including worship and the sacraments); 3, Personal Evangelism, and 4, Combatting Worldliness Through Consistent Christian Living.

On Tuesday and Thursday afternoons there will be special services for young people; the Rev. Claudius F. Smith of Big Stone Gap being the speaker on Tuesday and the Rev. Devall L. Gwathmey, of Wytheville, on Thursday. These services will be held at Christ Church, and will be conducted under the auspices of the Young People's Leagues of the Roanoke and Salem Churches.

The feature services of the week will be the mass meetings at eight o'clock each evening from Monday to Friday, inclusive, in St. John's Church. The public generally will be cordially welcomed at these and the various other services of the Crusade.

A number of clergymen from various points in Southwest Virginia will be the guests of friends in Roanoke during the week and it is expected that there will also be many visitors from Buchanan, Fincastle, Bedford and other nearby points.

Death of Mrs. B. D. Tucker.

Mrs. Anna Maria Washington Tucker, wife of the Bishop of Southern Virginia, passed away quietly Friday morning, January 7, at her home in Norfolk, Virginia. Funeral services were held from Old St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, Saturday afternoon, by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Covington, assisted by the Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., and Bishop A. S. Lloyd, a former rector of St. Luke's. Interment was in Charles Town, W. Va., where Mrs. Tucker lived before her marriage.

Mrs. Tucker was a grandniece of George Washington, the daughter of Col. John Augustine Washington. Her father was the last owner of Mount Vernon before it was sold for preservation as a historic shrine and Mrs. Tucker made her home there until the War Between the States.

She was married to Bishop Tucker, who was then rector of Zion Church, Charles Town, W. Va., on July 22, 1873.

Besides Bishop Tucker, Mrs. Tucker is survived by thirteen children, all of whom were at her bedside at the time of her death, with the exception of two sons who are missionaries in China. These two are Dr. Augustine Tucker, of St. Luke's Hospital, Shanghai, and Prof. Ellis N. Tucker, of St. John's College, Shanghai.

Mrs. Tucker also leaves two sisters, Mrs. R. P. Chew, of Charles Town, W. Va., and Mrs. Eleanor Selden Washington Howard, of Washington.

An Unusual Carol Service.

The District of Columbia Chapter of the American Guild of Organists was the guest of the Chesapeake Chapter of the Guild in Baltimore on Tuesday evening of January 4. Dinner for the two chapters was served, when Mr. John DeNues, dean of the Chesapeake Chapter and organist of Grace and St. Peter's Church, presided. Mr. Frank Sealy, Warden of the A. G. O., was the guest of honor. After dinner, the members of the two chapters took seats reserved for them in Emmanuel Church, where a beautiful and unusual service of carols was held. The choir of Emmanuel Church, under the direction of Mr. Frederick Ericsen, organist, rendered in a finished and masterful style this service, singing a capplia throughout the service. The Rev. Hugh Birckhead, D. D., rector of the church, gave a short address, explanatory of each group of carols sung, the groups representing German, English, French, Russian and Spanish carols. The two neighbor chapters of the A. G. O. have entertained each other several times in the past and in every case a musical service or organ recital has been a special feature of the occasion.

The dean of the local Chapter of the A. G. O. is Mr. Adolf Torovsky, A. A. G. O., organist of Epiphany Church, and the Rev. Z. B. Phillips is chaplain of the District Chapter.

St. John's Church, Georgetown, will be the mission church for the Bishops' Crusade in Georgetown, instead of Christ Church, as previously announced. Dean Massie of Lexington, Kentucky, will be the Crusader. Other churches to be used for the Crusade are Epiphany, St. Mark's and St. Margaret's. The Rev. C. E. Kinckle, of Mount Joy, Pa., has been added to the list of Crusaders for Epiphany Church and noonday services will be held every day during the period of the Crusade at Epiphany Church. The Woman's Auxiliary of Christ Church, Georgetown, held a meeting on Monday afternoon, January 10, when Auxiliary members of the neighboring churches, St. John's, Grace and St. Alban's, were invited to be present. Mr. Leon C. Palmer, Executive Secretary of the Commission on Evangelism, was the speaker, taking for his subject the Bishops' Crusade.

The Twelfth Anniversary of the consecration of the Rt. Rev. Thomas Campbell Darst, D. D., Bishop of East Carolina, was celebrated on the Feast of the Epiphany in Bethlehem Chapel, when Bishop Darst was the celebrant of the Holy Communion for staff members of the National Commission on Evangelism. Bishop Darst is chairman of the Commission, with offices in the Cathedral Close, where he has been directing the activities preparatory to the Bishops' Crusade.

Mr. Ernest Stires, son of Bishop Stires of Long Island and a student at the Virginia Theological Seminary, will take charge of the services at Epiphany Chapel, until June, and perhaps until a new vicar is appointed, to succeed the Rev. Mr. Miller, who has lately left to take work elsewhere. Mr. Stires expects to receive his ordination in June.

The Episcopal Home for Children, through the Board of Lady Managers, made a special appeal at Christmas to all members of the Diocese of Washington, and all lovers of little children to give something, much or little, to the funds that must be raised for the new buildings to be erected on the tract of nine acres of land, given a year ago by a lover of little children who is neither a resident of Washington nor a member of the Episcopal Church. The land is splendidly located and the new buildings are urgently needed for the care of the children brought to the Home.

The Crusade.

For "The Bishops' Crusade" in the Diocese of Pennsylvania, which includes Philadelphia and the four contiguous counties of the state, arrangements have been made for three six-day missions to be conducted during the week of January 16-21, and during the subsequent week, January 23-28, there will be eighteen two-day missions conducted in as many centres through the diocese.

Crusaders who have been assigned to the Philadelphia area, include the Rev. James M. Owens, Shreveport, La.; the Rev. George Davidson, Los Angeles, Cal.; the Rev. William Smith, Worcester, Mass.; the Rev. Hiram R. Bennett, Williamsport, Pa.; the Rev. Karl M. Block, St. Louis, Mo.; the Rev. A. T. Young, New York City, and Mr. C. W. Brickman, Yonkers, N. Y.

The Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins, rector of Holy Trinity Church, Rittenhouse Square, is chairman of the Commission on The Bishops' Crusade in the Diocese of Pennsylvania.

Visiting Crusaders will conduct the six-day missions January 16-21 in Holy Trinity Church, Rittenhouse Square, St. Luke's Church, Germantown, and the Mediator, West Philadelphia. Sunday night services in all other churches will be suspended on the night of January 16, so that virtually all attention may be directed to the three larger mission centres.

Presentation of the Advent Offering.

Upwards of 1,500 children representing the Episcopal Church Sunday Schools of the Diocese on Saturday afternoon, January 9, took part in the Annual Presentation Service of the Advent Offering and the Bishop's Bricks Fund at the Chapel of the Mediator, West Philadelphia.

Bishop Garland officiated and received the combined offerings. The Bishop was assisted by the Rev. Granville Taylor, Vicar of the Mediator; the Rev. Frederick E. Seymour, Diocesan Director of Religious Education, and the Rev. Paul Micou, rector of St. Luke's, Bustletown, who is also in charge of the new mission at Rhawnhurst. The proceeds of the combined offerings this year have been designated for the Rhawnhurst Mission. For a number of years this children's offering has been an annual feature in the Diocese.

The Rev. Dr. Joseph Fort Newton, rector of the Memorial Church of St. Paul, Overbrook, began a series of talks Sunday evening on the subject of telling the story of Jesus, His life, times and teachings. The series will end on February 6.

The subjects are as follows:

January 9—The World Into Which Jesus Came;

January 23—The Four Gospels;

January 30—The Birth and Boyhood of Jesus;

February 6—Eighteen Hidden Years.

Columbus Clericus Elects Officers.

The Columbus Clericus met at the Church of the Good Shepherd on Tuesday, December 21. In the absence of the President, the Rev. Maurice Clarke presided.

The report of the nominating committee was approved and the following officers elected for the year 1927—The Rev. S. E. Sweet, President; the Rev. A. I. E. Boss, Secretary-Treasurer; and the Rev. F. C. F. Randolph, Chairman of the Program Committee. The next meeting of the Clericus will be held at the home of the Rev. F. O. Granniss on Thursday, January 20.

The London Prison Farm.

The Christmas Spirit was carried out in the life of the men at the London Prison Farm in a wonderful way. The State spent considerable extra money in a real dinner for the prisoners and chicken was cooked and served together with all of the other Christmas dinner side dishes. At the plate of each prisoner was a Christmas greeting card. These cards were made possible by the Church Periodical Club of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Columbus.

After dinner an hour was spent in rest and relaxation and the Church call was blown by the farm bugler and out of the population of four hundred and ninety-seven that day, four hundred and seventy-five men were in attendance, the largest attendance at any service of a voluntary nature given at the Prison Farm. There were a few men who were on special detail, such as the boiler room, kitchen, tailor shop, hospital, etc., that could not attend.

The program in the chapel was opened by the orchestra. The orchestra is composed entirely of men in the Prison Farm and their training has for the most part been given by Chaplain Utts of Trinity Episcopal Church, London, Ohio.

The Christmas story as found in the Version of St. Luke, was read, after which prayer was offered. The program was then turned over to the men.

There are still a few needs that the men have been requesting, such as a saxaphone, Eighth Grade Reader, mending materials for the books in the library, Spanish Lessons and History of the United States. If anybody would care to contribute any of this material, it would be greatly appreciated. A piano is also needed for the honor camp. This could be placed as a memorial for some person or organization and would be under the supervision of the guards. It would not need to be a new one, but one that could be played on for religious and similar services.

Church's Program Made Real.

For three weeks in November the Field Department of the Diocese was supplemented by the addition of two fine representatives of the Field force of the National Council; the Rt. Rev. E. Cecil Seaman, Bishop of North Texas, and the Rev. John G. Magee of the Mission Church at Nanking, China. In the course of three weeks, these two speakers covered the larger number of the parishes and missions of the diocese and spoke to hundreds of interested Churchmen.

Trinity Cathedral's Fortieth Anniversary.

On Sunday morning, December 19, Trinity Cathedral commemorated the fortieth anniversary of the holding of the first regular services of the Episcopal Church in Phoenix and the founding of what was known as Trinity Mission.

In the fall of 1886, Dr. G. H. Mitchell, a lay reader, started the services in Pythian Hall, under the leadership of a committee composed of Messrs. N. A. Morford, E. J. Bennitt, W. R. Morris, Colonel Hatch and Dr. R. E. Lightburne. At occasional intervals previous to this, services of baptism and confirmation had been held in Phoenix by the Rt. Rev. George Kelly Dunlop, the second Bishop of the combined territories of Arizona and New Mexico. In 1883 Bishop Dunlop reported that there were five communicants of the Episcopal Church in the town of Phoenix.

At the anniversary service special congratulations were given to those who have been members of the Cathedral during this forty year period and also to those who have been connected with the Church twenty-five years or more. The Dean, the Rev. E. S. Lane, preached on "The Early History of Trinity Church".

New Year Sermons.

Two sermons preached in New York on the first Sunday of the year are typical of most others on that day, and also of the watch night addresses. In Grace Church, the Rev. Dr. Bowie said American has stood for years before an open door of opportunity, and has neither profited herself, nor helped others to profit. Europe entertained hopes, and America dashed them. Good will has been changed to ill will, and he feared the latter is justified. In the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, the Rev. Dr. Carstensen was caustic in criticism of conditions. He warned against the dangers of prosperity, as did a score of other preachers on the same Sunday. He said America has not kept pace in culture with its money profits. Slacker voters he scored, and he called for companies of men among Protestants similar to the Holy Name men among Catholics. There is a growing feeling in New York, he believed, that will insist upon changes for the better, not by talk, but by work.

Old French Church Sold.

More than two centuries ago there was founded a French Protestant Church in New York, and it later became Episcopal. A quarter of a century ago it sold its property just south of Twenty-Third Street, and astonished most people interested in its prosperity, but not members of its congregation, by erecting a handsome edifice right under the eaves of Madison Square Garden, and near to the rear entrance of that famous institution. In the street in front of the church elephants and tigers were often seen, on their way in and out of the Garden. So also horses innumerable. The Garden is gone, and now the church has been sold and used for the last time. The congregation will worship in a French institution's hall up town, and will erect a new edifice. A loft building is to occupy the old site. The present rector is the Rev. J. A. Maynard.

Memorial Services For Former Rector at Hoboken.

On the fourth Sunday in Advent at Trinity Church, Hoboken, the Rev. M. A. Shipley, rector, a memorial service for a former rector, the Rev. James Clayton Mitchell, whose ten years of service began on that day in 1898, was held. In memory of Mr. Mitchell his widow presented the Title Deeds of a three-story brick house, standing next to the rectory and the parish house, to make part of the endowment of the Church. As an income-producing property, it will greatly strengthen the parish. Mr. Mitchell became the rector of Calvary Church, Germantown, and died some years ago. He left in Hoboken an abiding remembrance of his gentleness, goodness and devotion to the care of his people and the interests of the community, of which Bishop Lines spoke in his sermon.

One Hundredth Anniversary of St. Peter's, Morristown.

A remarkable anniversary service was held in St. Peter's Church, Morristown, on the second Sunday after Christmas, marking the completion of a century of the organized life of the parish. Services had been held and the congregation gathered in the last decade of the Eighteenth Century. The service was that of the Holy Communion, preceded by very brief addresses by Bishop Lines and Bishop Stearly, the Rev. Mr. Attridge, rector of the Church of the Redeemer, and Dean Philemon F. Sturgess of Boston, the immediate predecessor of the present rector, the Rev. Dr. D. M. Brookman. A message came from the Rev. Dr. Merritt, the only other former rector living. Several former curates of St. Peter's, the Rev. Messrs. W. P. Taylor, R. S. Nichols, John C. Lord, in charge of St. Paul's, Morris Plains, V. W. Mori, R. R. Upjohn and V. T. Sutphan, were present and assisting. The mid-day services at the Church of the Redeemer and St. Paul's, Morris Plains, were suspended, that the congregations might be present at St. Peter's. The offerings were divided between the new parish house of the Church of the Redeemer and the new Mission Church at Morris Plains. It was a remarkable day and service in one of the historic parishes of the country and one of the most beautiful of churches, with everything done to make the service reverent and beautiful. It was a bright winter day and as the congregation and friends from all about came together the strains of, "Oh, Come All Ye Faithful", from the carillon fell like a benediction over the whole community.

The Parish House of St. Paul's, Jersey City, is being greatly enlarged and equipped for the increasing needs of the parish. The Rev. Edgar L. Cook is the rector.

Dr. Smith Celebrates Fifty-First Anniversary.

The Rev. Dr. Charles H. Smith, eldest of the clergymen in active service in Western New York, conducted services on Sunday, January 2, that marked the opening of his fifty-second year as rector of St. James' Church, Buffalo. Scores of old parishioners and old friends attended, congratulated Dr. Smith on his anniversary and wished him continued health and success.

More than a half century ago he came to Buffalo and began his Church work in Saint Peter's free mission. He became rector of Saint James' Church fifty-one years ago. In his many years as a minister, he has been instrumental in the founding of a number of missions that afterward became churches.

Dr. Smith is one of the oldest living graduates of Hobart College and of the General Theological Seminary, New York. For many years he was chaplain of the Sixty-fifth Regiment.

Preliminary Preparation For The Crusade.

The preliminary preparation for the Bishops' Crusade in the central territory of the diocese, began on Saint Andrew's Day, with the celebration of the Holy Communion and continued with intercessory prayer throughout the day. An interesting feature of these intercessory services was, that six men, members of the Rector's Bible Class served as intercessors, leading the devotions at the hours assigned them. The rector, the Rev. Dr. Capers, has used his Bible Class as an opportunity for training its members in the conduct of the services of the Church, and as leaders in devotional and group meetings. Within the past two years Bishop Bratton has licensed eight lay readers in Saint Andrew's, and there are at present one postulant and one candidate for Holy Orders from the Parish.

On Wednesday, January 5, the intensive preparation for the Crusade began in Saint Andrew's for this part of the Diocese. The Crusaders are the Rt. Rev. Wm. G. McDowell, of Alabama; the Rev. John M. B. Gill, of Petersburg, Virginia, and the Rev. L. N. Caley, D. D., of Philadelphia. The date will be January 23-28, inclusive.

The program followed in Saint Andrew's in directing the thought and preparing the mind of the people for the reception of the Crusade message is: Conferences led by the rector each Wednesday afternoon, on the subjects assigned by the Commission, The Place of the Bible in Christian Living; Prayer and the Devotional Life; Worship and the Sacraments.

It has been arranged by the membership of the Parish, to hold group meetings daily throughout the intervening weeks before the Crusade for the study and discussion of such subjects as: Personal Evangelism, Combatting Wordliness Through Consistent Living, etc.

The Rev. Walter B. Capers, D. D., has been assigned with Bishop Finlay, of South Carolina, and Dean MacDonald, of Fresno, California, to conduct the Crusade in the Diocese of Western Missouri. The Crusade to cover the date February 13-25, inclusive. The centers in which this Crusade is to be conducted in this Diocese are Kansas City, Saint Joseph, Springfield, and Sedalia.

Bishops' Crusade Notes.

The opening service of the Bishops' Crusade in the Diocese of Lexington was held in the Church of the Nativity, Maysville, January 9. The Crusaders will be the Rev. John L. Oldham, rector of Trinity Church, Martinsburg, W. Va., and Mr. Samuel H. Seymour, of Chattanooga, Tenn.

From Maysville, the same Crusaders will go to the Church of the Ascension, Frankfort, Ky., the Rev. J. Howard Gibbons, rector. The services here will be from Sunday, January 16, to Friday, January 21.

Beginning January 16, in Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, the Crusade services will be conducted by Bishop Green of Mississippi, and the Rev. Dr. Mercer P. Logan of Monteagle, Tenn. Mr. Walker, a layman, will also be a Crusader in Lexington.

From Lexington Bishop Green and Dr. Logan, together with Mr. Samuel H. Seymour, will go to Trinity Church, Covington, Ky., to hold a Crusade meeting, from January 23 to 28.

The Rev. C. S. Hale, rector of Calvary Church, Ashland, Ky., will conduct in February a Crusade meeting in Mary's Church, Middlesboro, Ky.

The Rev. W. S. Blackshear, rector of St. John's Church, Versailles, Ky., held Crusade services in St. Andrew's Church, Lexington, the mission for the Colored people, beginning January 9.

Weaving them into Thy one perfect whole.

Into Thy kingdom as threads or as pebbles,
Place in the structure Thou givest to all,
If we but yield to the hand of the Builder,
As for each pebble, each thread comes the call.

We do not know the design of the Builder,
And cannot fashion ourselves to His need,
If we but yield to His will He can use us,
In His great building so wondrous indeed.

If we but yield to His will, there's the trial,
Test of our faith, of our love for our King;
Yielded, we open Heaven's treasures to others,
And to His children God's kingdom we bring.

How Can the Bishops' Crusade Be a Success?

The Rev. Thos. F. Opie, D. D.

If the success of the Bishops' Crusade depends solely upon the two hundred and seventy-five Bishops, priests and laymen who have enrolled for service, then this success will be only relative, at best. This great movement cannot be a real success, unless the great mass of Episcopalians all through the Church take it seriously and give themselves to it without reserve.

Without man's cooperation, even God is powerless to lift humanity. If you will not, God cannot. Long enough have we waited for the Almighty to destroy this old world and usher in a new order. If there is ever to be a new and better order, called the Kingdom of God, men, women and children have got to show themselves children of the Father and live as a family in love.

All down the ages men have been God's instruments for making a better world-condition. From Abraham to Isaiah and from Paul to Savanorola; from St. Alban to Wycliffe, and from Calvin to Cadman, God and man have cooperated in world-building. God's message must be delivered not only by the Bishop and priest and chosen layman—but by every soul signed with the sign of the Cross—by word of mouth and by life and by love; by action and deed, of friendliness; by faith, hope and charity; by attitude, relationship and conduct. "Ye are epistles read of all men." Your sermon is the life you live.

There is an ancient story that when Christ went back into heaven after His resurrection, He was asked what plan He had laid down for the salvation and re-making of the world. He replied, so the story goes, that He had put His message of love into the hearts and lives and mouths of men—and that they were to live and teach and act this message until it had encircled the globe and transformed men everywhere. "But suppose these men fail you?" He was asked. "I have no other plan," was His instant reply. That plan has carried the gospel all over the world, and has won for it more members and more devotees than any other religion boasts today. It is this plan that will be further intensified and vitalized during the coming crusade, when bishops, clergymen and lay men and women will go everywhere, calling men to Christ and His Church.

If the Crusade is to succeed, men and women everywhere in the Church will be needed to make it so. First, the best of us have got to repent. What have we done—that we should repent? "We have done nothing," I seem to hear many self-righteous people declaring indignantly. In the name of Christ and of His Church, what could be worse than that—doing nothing! In this age when the world is frantically active luring thousands with the glitter of material things and with the lust of pleasure and excitement—the Church and all Christian people must be up and doing. Prayer is not enough. Sermons are not enough. Worship is not enough. If these do not lead to purity, to service, to holy example—to the very life of Christ expressing itself through Christ's people, the Crusade itself must fail!

Mahatma Gandhi, the famous Hindu, who is said to be the most Christ-like man on earth, though himself not a Christian, declares at least three things to be necessary on the part of Christians, if they are to impress the world and lead it to Jesus: (1) "All of you Christians must begin to live more like Jesus Christ" (note: "BEGIN" to live like Jesus!); (2) "You must practice your religion without toning it down"; (3) "You must put your emphasis on love—for love is the center and soul of Christianity."

If we all set ourselves to this high task and seriously undertake to live daily lives of love and of sacrifice and of service such as characterized the life of Jesus—then we shall make the Crusade a tremendous and arresting success. If we do less than this, we are not worthy the name Christian—and we are a reproach to God, to Christ and to the Church. God grant that the Bishops' Crusade may make a few real Christ-men and Christ-women and set them forward in the service of the King!

Recollections of a Minister's Daughter.

Chapter Seven.

Anna Swan Reynolds.

The day of the Donation Party was full of excitement, for the inmates of the rectory.

We children were simply wild with excited interest, and in our efforts to help were more or less in everybody's way, and under everybody's feet.

Whenever the door bell rang the whole crowd of younger members of the family rushed to respond to the call, and help to carry in the numerous bundles, baskets and bags.

My mother and eldest sister and my most important eldest brother were busy in the dining-room arranging flowers and evergreens—for even in winter my mother had every window where the sun shone full of beautiful, blooming house plants that were for this occasion scattered about on mantle and table and book case.

The rectory was furnished in a rather unusual way for a western village parish, as my mother had lived in the east, and had brought from her old home beautiful, quaint pieces of furniture, and a great deal of china, crystal, cutglass and silver—her marriage portion.

Our little maid of all work, Eliza, was busy fixing up her kitchen for the close and, as she insisted, impudent inspection of Mrs. X. Y. and Z., who would in all likelihood want to make the coffee in her big wash boiler in order to have enough for all the guests.

We had all been cautioned many times sternly by my eldest brother and sister, that if seen, at least we were not to be heard; while my gentle mother quietly answered all our questions as to what we were to wear, how long we were to sit up, and a thousand other things to our satisfaction.

My father was most of the day pushing his books and papers out of the way in his study with many a sigh—making way and room for the coming of Vandals into his sanctum sanctorum.

A long table had been set in the dining-room; and in the firelit room of early evening was beautiful with its satin-smooth damask—silver and cut-glass, with a lovely centerpiece of flowers arranged by the fingers of my eldest sister, while the "little curate" close by, insisted that she was an "artist", and other remarks, absurd to our childish, scornful "long and listening ears"—for we knew his flattery would spoil her for a week. I remember we all took a hasty lunch in the nursery school room (and it was well we did) of bread anda cup of tea. Of course we were joined by the "little curate". Our anticipations of a feast of good things—cake and cold ham and pickles—were not as abundant and forthcoming as we had looked for at our Donation Party. The first ladies who arrived went to the dining room and kitchen to see that there had been plenty sent for their supper that night. (We were beginning to have grave fears for other meals than supper by the way they unpacked the various hampers of cooked food, canned fruit and cake for the delectation of the evening's guests. Bob whispered to me that if he saw the opportunity he would secrete one box that he knew held cake (no doubt he had already sampled it), so as to insure our having some left for our Sunday night supper.

My beautiful mother, dressed in one of her gowns of past-time prosperity, and my father in his least shiny clerical suit, were chatting with the members of the Dorcas Society, who had the party in hand.

My eldest sister and brother stood just inside the door-way to receive the young people—my sister lovely in her dainty blue merino with rare old lace in neck and sleeves—my brother holding his head high, and speaking in a deep spulchral voice not natural to him, but caused by his wearing an unusually high collar.

Of course, the "little curate" was not far off, and looked unlike himself in a second-best clerical suit of my father's. Now the "little curate" was almost as round as his eyes, and my father was six feet tall, and somewhat slim at this time, so our "little curate" was almost afraid to move even his eyes on account of his somewhat compressed condition, and Bob said we ought to be thankful that he was restrained in his movements, for there was great danger some of the buttons might give way to rash pressure. Nothing of the sort happened that I know of, however, rather to Bob's disappointment.

There was a great "turning out of the parish", as the Senior Warden said, and promised well for the sound interest of the parishioners and the popularity of the rector and his wife. I don't think he paid any compliment to the minister's children. My mother was kept busy thanking this lady and that, one lady for a piece of flannel, which mother thought was intended to make a bed comforter of, but the lady said she had thought it would make the little girls such sweet dresses. Alas! Girlie and I had to wear those dresses, when we were bad, made of that Donation Party flannel. To this day when I recall them I rub my poor neck where they scratched it red!

The New Star.

Today a star shines in the East
For us from out the dark,
Where warfare's stern, relentless hand
Upon a dreary, wasted land
Has left its cruel mark.

There many little starving ones
In anguish plead for aid;
Their fragile forms before us rise
In fancy, and we hear their cries,
Forlorn and sore afraid.

O let us then this Christmastide
Hark to that call afar,
And in the Christ-Child's name shall we Present our gifts that we may be Like followers of the Star
—Eroll Hay Colcock.

Robert E. Lee, the Christian.

The Duke of Wellington is reported to have said, "A man of fine Christian sensibilities is totally unfit for the position of a soldier". But no one doubts that Robert E. Lee, the great soldier, was also a great Christian.

Dr. J. William Jones, who knew him well in peace and in war, said: "If I have ever come in contact with a sincere and devout Christian—one who, seeing himself to be a sinner, trusted alone in the merits of Christ—who humbly tried to walk the path of duty, 'looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith', and whose piety was constantly exemplified in his daily life, that man was the world's great soldier, and model man, Robert Edward Lee."

In discussing the question as to whether Lee was approachable and had near and intimate friends, Dr. Gamaliel Bradford closes his discussion of the subject by saying: "Lee had one intimate Friend—God." That short sentence is worth a whole chapter in giving us an insight into Lee's religious life. Dr. Bradford's comment is so illuminating that we quote a paragraph:

"So I think we may conclude that the cardinal fact of Lee's life was God. . . . . Everywhere and always he had God in his heart, not so much the God of power, or the God of justice, or even the God of beauty, but the God of love, tempering the austerity of virtue, sweetening the bitterness of failure, above all, breathing loving kindness into the intolerable hell of war. There have been fierce saints who were fighters. There have been gentle saints who were martyrs. It is rare to find a soldier making war—stern war—with the pity, the tendernes, the sympathy of a true follower of Christ."

R. E. Lee, Jr., bears this testimony to his father's religious life. "His was a practical, every-day religion, which supported him all through his life, enabled him to bear with equanimity every reverse of fortune, and to accept her gifts without undue elation." A better description of the spiritual life of Lee, perhaps, has never been given than that.

Writing of his army to President Davis, just after Gettysburg, he said: "Though reduced in numbers by hardships and battles through which it has passed since leaving the Rappahannock, its condition is good, and its confidence unimpaired. I hope your excellency will understand that I am not in the least discouraged, or that my faith in the protection of an all-merciful Providence, or in the fortitude of this army, is at all shaken."

Referring to these words, Thomas Nelson Page says: "When was that constant soul ever shaken! God had established it beyond the power of adversity to touch, much less to shake it."

Here is another example of how his religion sustained him in the hour of trial: His son, Fitzhugh Lee, had been captured while wounded, and carried off a prisoner. Writing to his wife, he said: "But we must bear this additional affliction with fortitude and resignation, and not repine at the will of God. It will eventuate in some good that we know not of now. We must all bear our labors and hardships manfully."

He expressed preference for those sermons that were "simple, earnest, and contained 'the very marrow of the Gospel'."

It was due in large measure to Lee's influence as a Christian commander that great revivals often occurred in the army. Dr. Jones speaks of a great revival among the troops in which over 15,000 men in Lee's army professed conversion, and says: "It is believed that no army in the world's history ever had in it so much of genuine, devout piety so much of active work for Christ, as the Army of Northern Virginia, under the commond of our noble Christian leader."

So concerned was Lee for the spiritual welfare of his soldiers that one of his biographers says: "One almost feels as if he cared more for winning souls than battles, and for supplying his army with Bibles than with bullets and powder."

One of the chaplains of the army, while calling at the General's tent, said: "I think it right that I should say to you, General, that the chaplains of this army have a deep interest in your welfare, and that some of the most fervent prayers we offer are in your behalf." The old hero's face flushed, tears started in his eyes, and he replied, with choked utterance and deep emotion: "Please thank them for that, sir—I warmly appreciate it. And I can only say that I am nothing but a poor sinner, trusting in Christ alone for salvation, and need all of the prayers they can offer for me."—Rev. H. H. Smith, in Christian Advocate.

Darning.

Helen Bayley Davis.

Tiny stockings of yellow, pink and blue,
Sturdy ones of tan and grey—
I wonder where the little feet
You clothe will stray?

As I darn each hole with colored silk,
I draw, first under then above,
Another thread unseen and spun
From Mother-love,—

A thread as strong as tempered steel, to guide
My children's footsteps up the grim
Steep path of life and then to bind
Them close to Him.

The Word "Amen" Is One of the Oldest in the World.

The word "Amen" which we all pronounce at the end of prayers and hymns is one of the oldest used in the world. A clergyman in London said the following about it:

"On Friday, at the Mohammedan mosques, millions of devout worshippers prayed the prayer which is their equivalent for the Lord's Prayer; and the full-toned Doxology rang out from the throats of Islam, Amen.

"Yesterday, the Jewish congregations in the synagogues responded to their ministers who, at the close of the great Chumish Prayer, said, 'Say ye, Amen', and they all said, 'Amen'. Today, throughout the Christian Church this word closes our prayers and praise.

"Few words in the vocabulary of religion are more widely used than the word 'Amen', and few, to my mind, are less intelligently uttered. This short word is repeated continually, until I fear it has become blurred and blunted by usage.

"It is a Hebrew term which has passed unchanged into Greek, Arabic, Latin and English. Wherever the soul of man, Jewish, Mohammedan, or Christian, bows before God, the one 'Amen' comes to the lips. It means 'Truly' —'So be it'. We commonly say Amen in worship to some statement by another person if it is a term of response, meaning that if a statement of God's truth is made in our presence, we say Amen to it if we agree with it.

"In the Early Church, in the fourth century, we are told the word Amen rang from the congregation sometimes like a clap of thunder; people poured their hearts into it. In a number of our congregations today, I mean in some churches, the use of Amen at the end of prayers has been discontinued, which is a real loss."—Canadian Churchman.

"Come Unto Me."

A friend to you I'll gladly be;
A friend is what you need, I see:
The burden pressing hard on you,
Could not have stayed, had there been two.

I'll share your sorrow and your pain,
And soon you will be well again:
The trouble could not thus have grown:
Had we as friends been better known.

Our fellowship shall never cease,
Our love will dipen and increase,
Until your heart is one with Mine,
Until My strength is wholly thine.

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

The Truthfulness of Jesus.

M. L. G.

Do you think it was easy for Jesus to be truthful? "He was Himself the Truth," we say, "and He could not have been false." Yet so really was He a man, so perfectly did He take our nature upon Him, that some of His most severe temptations were to be—perhaps only a little—untruthful. "Throw yourself down from the Temple," suggested the Spirit of Evil, "God's Angels will care for you, and the people will then accept you as a God." But Jesus knew that such a believing could not make the sinful pure nor the proud child-like. So He chose the hard way, the slow way, the strait way of Truth. He lived it, and for it He died. "Art Thou the Son of God?" asked the Chief Priest and Scribes on that last dreadful morning. To confess it means death; and Jesus said, "I am".

Our Master will not deceive us! He is the Truth. We will never have to unlearn what He teaches us. Let us trust ourselves to Him; let Him guide us; let Him keep us; for we are not trusting one who may fail us.

And to follow such a Leader we too must be true. True of speech, true of life, and true of heart.

The Three Kings.

Felita was a little Porto Rican girl who was very poor. One day she was talking with a new teacher at a mission school about Three Kings' Day. "Who are the Three Kings?" asked the teacher.

Felita looked at her in astonishment. She didn't know there was any one in the world who didn't know about the Three Kings. "Didn't you ever hear about the Three Kings? Why, when Three Kings' Day comes the Three Kings ride through the country on their horses. They ride in the dark while it is night, so no one can see them. If you put out a box in the evening and fill it with grass, the tired horses will eat the grass as they pass by, and then the Three Kings will leave a present in the box for the good little children who feed the hungry horses."

Felita's face had been full of light as she told about the Three Kings, but her eyes became very sad and her little lips quivered as she stopped speaking. Two tears came into her eyes and ran down her cheeks. Two more tears started after them. "Sometimes the Three Kings forget to leave presents," she said, "if you are very, very poor and if you have no mother."

The kindergarten teacher drew the little girl close in her arms. She knew that Felita was very poor and had no mother and that her father was not kind, but that he beat little Felita cruelly when she displeased him.

All day Felita thought of the box she would fill with grass on Three Kings' Day. She knew that when she hurried out to look in it it would be empty, as it had been last year. If only she could find a present in her box as the other little girls did!

"If I were the Three Kings," she thought to herself as she went to bed, "I'd put presents in the boxes for the poor children first of all. Oh, I wish I were not so poor, and I wish I had a mother!"

That night Felita dreamed that it was Three Kings' Day and that she found a beautiful present in her box.

Nearer and nearer came the great day. On the day before Three Kings' Day Felita slipped quietly out and bought a present for herself with her own money. With great care she filled her box with grass for the horses of the Three Kings. Then she shut her eyes and slipped her present in the box. "I didn't see who put it there," she said, "and I'll play like the Three Kings left it there for me."

She was so excited that she could scarcely sleep. In the morning she jumped up and ran to her box. There was a beautiful present for her. Straight to the kindergarten teacher she went to tell her all about it.

There were both smiles and tears in the eyes of the teacher as she heard the lonely little girl tell about the present she had given herself. Then she told Felita again the story of Christmas. Felita listened with wide-open eyes as the teacher said that the happiest people were those who gave gifts to others.

Felita was very happy when the kindergarten had its Christmas service, and the teacher pinned bows of snow-white ribbon on the dresses of all the children who wanted to give the white gift of loving hearts to Jesus their King. She knew in her heart as she sang the Christmas carols and recited the Christmas verses that when next Christmas came she would not spend her money to buy a present for herself, but she would give something to some one else, as the boys and girls in the States had done when they sent the kindergarten teacher to Porto Rico.—Everyland.

Jed and the New Year's Skates.

Jed stood at the window, working on the straps of a pair of old skates. Now and then he glanced toward the park, where he could see a number of boys on the ice. He was a-quiver with impatience to join them, but the skates must be repaired first. Because he had needed a new suit Christmas, he had told his mother that he could get along with his old skates this winter. And now, on New Year's Day, the matter looked doubtful.

"There!" he exclaimed frowningly as a strap broke. "That settles it!" And at that moment Fred Vincent appeared at the back door and calling out, "Want to use my skates this morning? I can't go to the park till afternoon, so you can have them all forenoon if you want them".

There was no question about Jed's wanting them. Five minutes later he dashed out of the little flat and rushed with headlong speed down the stairway, a pair of shining new skates swung over his shoulder.

As he opened the big hall door he saw coming toward him the little old lady who had just moved into the room across the hall. He paused and held the door open for her.

"Good morning!" she greeted him as she came up the steps. "Going skating?" Jed answered. He did hope this would end the conversation, but not so. "And I suppose these are your new Christmas skates," smiled the talkative stranger.

"They're new Christmas skates," laughed Jed, "but not mine. My chum lent me these to use till noon." He hoped the hint in this last sentence was not too broad to be polite.

It was, however, evidently unnoticed. The little woman beamed more happily than ever. "And you will be home at noon?" she queried.

"Perhaps you would help me get a box down from a high shelf in the storeroom. Boys are always good at climbing."

"Why, certainly."

"I'm going out to dinner at twelve, so if you will come in a little before that I'll be ever so much obliged."

"I'll be there," Jed was too grateful to see his new acquaintance turn toward the stairway to consider at the moment what his words meant. He recalled them as he hurried off to the park. "Before twelve—" he thought ruefully.

He forgot all about the matter, however, when he reached the park. There were only a few boys out compared with what there would be that afternoon. And at night the ice would be alive with moonlight skaters; but Jed, gliding swiftly over the ice, was too full of joy in the present to think of that.

Something else, however was gliding by quite as swiftly as were the boys, and that was time. Jed could scarcely believe Ralph when he called out, "It's almost twelve!"

"And I've got to be home by that time!" Jed announced.

"What for? Fred won't be here till one," cried Ralph.

"I know, but I promised," and Jed explained the situation.

"Oh, forget about it!" urged Ralph.

"I might have forgotten about it if you hadn't reminded," answered Jed, with an injured feeling. "Now I've got to go."

"Just tell her you didn't get back in time," suggested Ralph. "You need not say why. You can get the box down tonight. What's the difference?"

"Maybe she keeps her best dress in it or something else she wants to wear today," answered Jed. He took a few more turns on the ice, meditating on the matter the while. It was certainly very trying. He had started out this morning with a fine new set of resolutions and here at once was a temptation to break two or three of them.

At last he skated slowly up to the bank and began unbuckling the skates. Then regardless of all urging, he started home. "She's a freaky little woman to spoil my last holiday this way," he said to himself. She certainly did not look "freaky", however, as she met him at the door. "I was afraid you'd be late," she exclaimed, with her sunny smile. "We've just time now."

Jed mounted the tall ladder, brought down the box and pried open the lid. "It must be her best bonnet she wants," he thought, for he recognized the fact that she was already in holiday gown.

She bent over the box with a pleasant, little excited air. "I suppose they're in the very bottom," she laughed, as she hurriedly removed a variety of articles that made Jed open his eyes in surprise. "There," she at last joyfully exclaimed, as she handed out a pair of beaming skates. "I want you to have them."

"Me!" exclaimed Jed, breathless with astonishment.

"Yes, you! They are Jack's."

"Who is Jack? I'm—I'm so much obliged."

"Bless you," laughed his friend, "I haven't told you yet about Jack. He's my grandson—just such a boy as you. He's traveling in the South with his father, and will be gone another winter yet. There's no skating there, so he wrote me to give these skates to some one who could make good use of them. He says he will have outgrown them before he gets back. I don't know any one here to give them to, and besides—it's foolish, of course—but I didn't like to think of any one but a nice boy wearing Jack's skates."

"How do you know I'm a nice boy?" laughed Jed.

"I know a boy who stops to hold a door open for a lonely home-sick old women when he's in a hurry to go skating is pretty nice. You can't fool me about boys. I know Jack too well."

At home again he marvelled over the gift. "I don't see why I should have a fine pair of skates just for a little thing like holding a door open for a lady," he said.

"You surely know that we don't receive rewards that way, Jed," answered his mother. "Sometimes they are a long time coming. Then something pleasant may happen that is the fruit of many little kindnesses. For instance I had a reward today for something I have been patiently trying to do for fourteen years. I have always wanted my boys to be kind and polite, especially to elderly people. This morning Mrs. Eagan said to me, 'I've always noticed how thoughtful your boys are to older people'. That was a reward that made New Year's Day very happy to me."

"You don't know how very near I came to spoiling my record this morning, mother," answered Jed, "nor how glad I am that I didn't do so."—Baptist Boys and Girls.

The Beginning of Butterflies.

The Rev. Louis Tucker.

Once upon a time there was a Pre-Raphaelite Giraffe who had a quarrel with the art-director of the museum of Mabonga land. This was many, many years ago, before the white man came, and at that time the museum of Mabonga land was all outdoors. The art-director was an able and intelligent hippopotamus, as art-directors mostly are, and he had attained his proud position by trampling all competitors under his feet, as art-directors mostly do. He claimed that the most beautiful sunsets Mabonga land had ever seen were hung on the western wall of the museum during his days; and as for tapestries, he pointed with pride to the wonderful flowers that adorned a thousand fields; for most of Mabonga land is velt country, and at that time it really did produce the most beautiful flowers in the world.

The Pre-Raphaelite Giraffe did not approve of the arrangement of these flowers; also he objected to sunsets, and he had a special plan of his own by which he held that sunrises could be improved. He did not know how to change these things himself, but he presumed that the art-director did because he claimed credit for them. So he went to the director's office, which was the shadiest and coziest and most delightful mudhole in all Mabonga land; and there he sat down on the bank, so that he could wave his hoofs, and he told the art-director all about it. The director would not have listened if he could have helped it; but he had gotten one hind hoof caught in the deep, deep mud between two tree-roots and could not get it out; and he was afraid to mention it for fear his neighbor, the ten-ton crocodile, should hear of it. So they talked, using the museum art languages; which is a Hittite dialect of the sacred speech of the Philistines. Now and then the giraffe would stop to eat lunch or take a drink; and now and then he would take a nap; though naps really made no difference, because he talked in his sleep anyhow; but when he came back the art-director was always there because he could not get away. And so, slowly but surely, the giraffe talked him to death, which has never happened to any other art-director in any gallery or museum in the world.

When the other animals found it out they were exceedingly sorry; so they got the principal python to go down into the water and pull the director out, and then they arranged a grand funeral for him. The white ants dug the grave, and the giraffe furnished the funeral banquet; for the lion, who was in charge, said that he could not possibly do less. When everything was ready they decided to pick all the flowers in middle Mabonga and line the art-director's grave with them. It was common talk all over the velt and the flowers heard of it. Now flowers understand art. So they could not and would not be used at the funeral of an art-director. They begged and pleaded, but their voices are gentle and sweet and the animals would not listen. So, on the morning of the funeral, when the mists rose from the meadows the flowers rose with them and flew away. There were red flowers and pink and purple and green and gold and blue and all the other colors, and they flapped their petals into wings and danced off in the golden sunshine and spread all over the world and became butterflies.

When Stonewall Jackson Was a Boy.

At the "Old Cummins Jackson Mills", on the West Fork River, in what is now West Virginia, was living, years ago, a healthy boy, who had very definite ideas of honor and a strong sense of right. Little Tom Jackson, like a good many other boys, was fond of fishing, and equally fond of selling his fish whenever he could find customers.

In the village of Weston, three miles above the mills, Conrad Kerster kept a small store and market. He had agreed with the boy to give him fifty cents for every pike a foot or more in length that he caught in the mill-pond

The boy was only ten years old, but he made the contract in good faith; and, as the sequel showed, he knew how to keep it.

As time went on, a good many twelve-inch pike were delivered at the market, with mutual satisfaction to both parties in the trade. One day the boy was seen tugging through the village an enormous fish that almost dragged on the ground. It was two inches over a yard long. Colonel Talbot, a gentleman who knew the young fisherman very well, halted him and complimented him on his success.

"A noble fish, Tom. Where are you going with it? I want to buy it."

"It's sold to Mr. Kerster," said the boy, without stopping.

"That can't be. He hasn't see it. Say, I'll give you a dollar for it."

"I tell you it's sold. 'Tisn't mine."

"What's Kerster going to give you for it?"

"Fifty cents," shouted Tom, still keeping on his way.

The colonel called after him, "I'll give you a dollar and a quarter!"

Tom turned a moment, with an indignant look, and replied, "If you get any of this pike, you'll have to get it of Mr. Kerster". And on he went, bending under his load until he reached the store.

Mr. Kerster was astonished. "Fifty cents isn't enough for that fish," he said. "I shall have to give you a dollar."

"No, sir; it's yours at fifty cents," insisted Tom. "I'll not take any more. You've been kind enough to pay me for some that were pretty short." And fifty cents was the price paid for the big pike.

This story, Mr. Kerster himself, in his old age, gave to his nephew, Judge McWhorter, who gave it to the Chicago "Standard".

The fine conscience and keen sense of honor that ruled the boy fixed the habit of a lifetime. The name by which he became known to the world was "Stonewall" Jackson.—Selected.

A New Year Prayer.

"We're only little travelers, Lord;
The New Year stretches wide,
Oh, set thy star to lead us far,
And let thine angel guide.

"We're only little children, Lord,
And there is much to do.
Show us the way to work and play
All this fair New Year through."

When the Twins Tried to Agree.

The twins, Molly and Dannie, had quarreled. The trouble was that one twin was just as stubborn as the other and they were both too stubborn to speak first.

It worried big Sister Vera to have them quarrel, for mother and father were away on a business trip and she had the house to look after and the twins to care for. But now she had an idea that she thought would make them speak. She called them in.

"Now, here is twenty-five cents," she said, holding out a bright, shining quarter, "and I want you to go up to the little store and agree upon something to buy for both of you."

"Now, remember," sister said, "that you are not to divide the money and buy something separately, but you are to spend it for something that you will both like."

"Who is to carry the money?" asked

Dannie.

"Well, you will have to settle that between yourselves," sister said.

"Well, you can carry it for a while," Dannie said to Molly, "and then I will carry it the rest of the way so that I will have it to pay the lady."

"All right," Molly said, already forgetting the quarrel.

But deciding upon one thing for both of them turned out to be a difficult task.

"Let's get a ball," suggested Dannie.

"Oh, I don't want any ball," objected Molly, "but I would love that little doll."

But Dannie scorned the doll idea. "Everything you want is so girlish," he said.

"Well, everything that you want is so boyish," Molly complained.

"Let's get candy, then," Dannie suggested.

"Oh, we can have candy any time," Molly said, "but we don't very often have a whole quarter to spend and we ought to get something nice with it. Isn't Sister Vera the grandest sister you ever saw?"

"You just bet she is," declared Dannie emphatically.

"Oh, Dannie," exclaimed Molly, "maybe we could agree on something to get for Sister Vera. Wouldn't that be nice? It would surprise her."

"Oh, let's," agreed Dannie. "It ought to be easy to find something for her."

Bye-and-bye they came hurrying into the house.

Sister Vera greeted them with a happy smile. "Did you finally agree on something?" she asked.

"Oh, sister," cried Molly, "we couldn't agree on anything for ourselves but we found that we could agree upon something for you, so we bought this pretty handkerchief for you. It has a pink border and Dannie let me carry it all the way home."

"Oh, you little dears," exclaimed Sister Vera, taking them both in her arms, "who ever had such dear little twins?"

"Molly wanted to get one with a yellow border," Danny said, releasing himself, "and I wanted one with a blue border, but then we remembered that you liked pink so we got the pink one."

"Oh, I do love pink," said Sister Vera, "and it will match my new muslin dress."

Then the twins went out to play a game of croquette, forgetting all about the quarrel they had had over the last game.—Lutheran.

The One Who Wouldn't Fuss.

Mrs. Peter Marshall was running some long tucks on her machine, and every time she got to the end of a tuck she stopped to fasten off her thread. And while the machine was silent she kept hearing a little voice below her window, talking in loud, angry tones.

"You are just horrid," said the voice, "I don't love you a bit."

And another time: "You are just as ugly and stupid as you can be—so there!" And about the end of the sixth tuck: "I've a great mind to knock you in the head."

"Dear me—dear me!" exclaimed Mrs. Peter Marshall, "who in the world can this be that Daisy Bell is quarreling with? I must call her in."

But when she put her head out of the window and called, "Daisy—Daisy Bell, a smiling little face looked up through the leafy bushes. "Who is that with you, daughter?" asked the mother.

"Nobody, mother dear, except 'Peggy-from-Paris,'" answered Daisy Bell, holding up her best doll. "I have been trying to get up a quarrel with her, but she won't say a word, and you just can't keep on fussing with a body who won't answer back."

"No, thank goodness, you can't," laughed Mrs. Peter Marshall.

Another day the lady was writing a letter on the porch, but this time she was disturbed by the same sounds as before, only today somebody was answering back. Daily Bell and her brother Wilfred were fussing over a croquet game.

"Come here, daughter, just a minute," said Mrs. Peter Marshall; "I want to ask a favor of you."

The little girl came at once to her mother's side, and listened to something whispered into her small, pink ear. "Will you try it?" asked the mother, kissing Daisy Bell's cheek.

The little croquet player nodded and ran back to strike her ball. After that there was no more fussing.

Would you like to know what Mrs. Peter Marshall whispered in the small, pink ear. I will tell you: "Try Peggy-from-Paris's plan for not fussing!"—Western Recorder.

Smiles.

Eugenie du Maurier Meredith.

Just keep on smiling,
When anything goes wrong;
Don't speak in cross tones;
Just sing a little song:

Life's not all shadows;
Shadows fleet and die;
If all day long we sing,
And never frown and cry:

Try to keep smiling,
Though the trying cost;
Always you will find Smile are never lost:

Clouds must come with shadows;
There's no use in whining;
Always behind the clouds
Shines a silver lining:

So keep on smiling;
Every smile is needed;
Life is what we make it,
When its voice is heeded:

Through the shadows shining,
Each smile has its place;
So keep on smiling
The shadows to efface.

Wanted! Preachers!

These reflections are induced by reading Porritt's "Life of John Henry Jowett".

The Church can never get beyond the divine plan of saving God's people. Paul declares that it is by "the foolishness of preaching". Organization, education, institutional methods, may be good, but nothing supercedes the preaching of the Word. The danger to the Church is the same that it was in the early days—the temptation to turn aside "to serve tables". Every kind of enterprise is demanding the time, energy and thought of the ministry. A pastor of one of the largest churches in the state told me he had devoted six weeks of time to raising " a Community Chest".

With over two-thirds of the race of man living without any knowledge of Jesus Christ and the other third with only a more or less clear view of this saving knowledge, is it not time for the ministry to be preaching Christ? While few of us may have altogether the original gifts of Jowett, yet his methods, his devotion to a single work, his untiring energy furnish an immense encouragement to men of lesser equipment to fit themselves thoroughly for the single service of preaching the Word of God.

It would seem well for young men to realize that the greatest mission is the proclaiming God's message of salvation—not to become administrators, or organizers, or even pastors. The pulpit is a minister's throne—the seat of his power—his hour or two a week, his opportunity for a service angels might envy.

When some one asked Dr. Hoge the secret of his preaching, he said: "Any man ought to become a better preacher as the years go by, barring a physical breakdown, if he will study."

Books, and especially the Bible, were Jowett's constant study. As the sermon was the one thing always on his soul, God spake to him out of every book, out of nature, out of providence, out of human writing, till he had an illustration or an epigram for his use.

Especially does the study of words in all their subtle meaning open up vistas of truth. The shades of meaning that lie, like lovely violets, in the various words of the Bible, were ever an attraction to Dr. Jowett.

The two great centralities of the preacher's sermonizing are—Sin and Grace.

With all the varieties of human experience, with all the consolations of the Gospel, with all the tremendous verities of Heaven, with all the demands of the hour, surely there is no place for trifling sermonettes in the pulpit of today. The chief end of a preacher is to preach. What the Church needs is not men to enter the pulpit and drawl through some words, perform a few perfunctory offices and draw a salary, but men who, aflame with the one supreme message of the Gospel, will carry an earnest, thoroughly thought-out message to the people. Such a man will not lack hearers. The world always listens to such men. The life of Jowett is an inspiration to all of us.—A. A. L., in Christian Observer.

Taking No Chances.

A freckled-faced girl stopped at the post-office and yelled out:

"Anything for the Murphys?"

"No, there is not."

"Anything for Jane Murphy?"

"Nothing."

"Anything for Ann Murphy?"

"No."

"Anything for Tom Murphy?"

"No."

"Anything for John Murphy?"

"No, not a bit."

"Anything for Terry Murphy?"

"No, nor for Pat Murphy, nor Denis Murphy, nor Peter Murphy, nor Paul Murphy, nor for any Murphy, dead, living, unborn, native or foreign, civilized or uncivilized, savage, or barbarous, male or female, black or white, naturalized or otherwise, soldier or citizen. No, there is positively nothing for any of the Murphy's, either individually, jointly, severally, now and for ever, one and inseparable."

The girl looked at the postmaster in astonishment. "Please," she said, "will you see if there is anything for Bridget Murphy."—Tit-Bits.

Deaths

LITTLETON LLOYD SNEAD.

Resolutions.

Pursuant to a joint resolution adopted by the Laymen's Association of South Farnham Parish, and the members of the Vestry of St. John's Episcopal Church, that these two bodies place upon record some testimonial of their love and affection for the late LITTLETON LLOYD SNEAD, of Tappahannock, and their sorrow at his death; therefore be it

Resolved, First, That in the death of Mr. Snead, our Laymen's Association and St. John's Church have lost a most useful and consecrated member, and that we shall sadly miss him;

Second, That his loyalty to and interest in the Sunday School, and his desire at all times to render "personal service" in the cause of the Master, was known and recognized by all who came in contact with him in his daily life;

Third, That we extend our deepest sympathy to the bereaved family, and pray for God's richest blessings upon them;

Fourth, That a copy of these resolutions be placed upon the Minutes of our Association and the Vestry; that a copy be sent to the family of the deceased; also to the Southern Churchman, and the Rappahannock Times for publication.

MISS AMELIA MELLICHAMP.

As we pass through this world it sometimes happens that we come in contact with characters that have peculiar touch with Christ, and it seems out of that touch, they receive the power to be always gracious, loving, self-forgetting and given to serving others. Such characters are benedictions from God to man. They are refining, spiritualizing influences. They are vital forces that lift man toward God. They reveal to the ordinary mortal how God can dwell with us in this life, and how we can walk close with Him here. It is no extravagance of speech to say that such a character was the late AMELIA MELLICHAMP, of Columbia, South Carolina.

Knowing her through a period of over twenty years, I am able to testify to the things that I know as the result of what I have heard and seen. I have never known a man or woman more pure in heart, more true to convictions, and more ready to carry comfort and courage, as well as to render practical service, to those with whom she lived and walked. And when suffering came to be her lot, as was said of another, "her patience and unselfishness also shone out through the long years. She was of the pure in heart who see God daily, and those around her saw God in her".

And again it may be said of her:

"She need no new beauty to go forth,
No lustrous wedding garment to put on.
She wore her crown of deep unburnished gold,
And in her face the rose and white of life.
Her hands were full of priceless gifts she wrought
Out of the common things of every day;
The alabaster box of duties done,
The precious ointment of a perfect love,
With fragrance of devotion and of prayer.

* * * * *

She went out clothed in beauty and in peace
And entered through the door to everlasting life."

Institute and Classes on the Rural Problem.

From January 11 to 14, in the Parish House of Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, Dr. William C. Sturgis, of the Educational Division of the National Council, held an institute and discussion group, open not only to the people of Lexington, but to all in the eastern part of Kentucky.

Miss Edna Beardsley, one of the U. T. O. workers of the Woman's Auxiliary, conducted an interdenominational class on the rural problem.

Dr. Sturgis' classes were in the mornings and evenings, and Miss Beardsley's in the afternoons.

A Conference on the Church's Program.

Miss Edna Beardsley, the U. T. O. worker of the Woman's Auxiliary, who has been loaned to the Diocese of Lexington for six months, held a four-day conference, January 4 to 7, on the Church's Program in the Church of the Ascension, Frankfort, the Rev. J. Howard Gibbons, rector.

In an interesting and instructive manner, Miss Beardsley presented the work of the Church in the home and foreign field.

The Rev. W. S. Blackshear, the presbyter in charge of Trinity Church, Georgetown, at the request of the professor of history in Georgetown College, Georgetown, Ky., a Baptist College, delivered a lecture to his class in English History, covering the reign of Henry the Eighth, through that of Queen Elizabeth, from the Church's angle. This class of six was attended by sixty-five.

Important Laymen's Meeting.

One hundred and fifteen laymen from Burlington, High Point, Leaksville, Winston-Salem and Greensboro, met on January 3 in the last named city and heard two inspiring addresses on the Bishops' Crusade. The laymen's club was presided over at a dinner meeting at the O. Henry Hotel by Mayor E. B. Jeffress, of Greensboro, President of the Club. Bishop Penick made an address on the history and purpose of the Crusade and Bishop Knight, of New Jersey, spoke on Fellowship.

It was decided to hold the next meetings in the diocese in connection with eve of the Diocesan Convention, which meets in that city on May 10 and 11, and to invite laymen from all the parishes in the diocese.

The dates set for the central meetings in the diocses in connection with the Bishops' Crusade are February 6 to 11 in Raleigh and February 13 to 18 in Charlotte. Bishop Ferris of Western New York will be the chief missioner.

Good Work Done at Leaksville and Spray.

The Rev. William J. Gordon, of Leaksville and Spray, one of the Church's most loyal and devoted missionaries, has recently celebrated his sixteenth anniversary at Spray and the following item is taken from a recent issue of the Greensboro News:

The growth of the membership of the Leaksville Church is not significant of its work, but its development is measured by its increase in religious activities and the true spirit of giving. Sixteen years ago the contributions amounted to only $80 a year for outside purposes, while the past year shows a notable increase to $1,200. The Church which was erected in 1844 has been greatly improved, adding much to its value and attractiveness.

But Spray has been the nucleus of Mr. Gordon's labors—a field ripe unto harvest. It is here he moved in December, 1910, and has ever since resided among the people who reverence him so deeply. Although the work was begun here twenty-five years prior to his coming, yet there was very little perceptible growth owing to services being held so irregularly and no resident pastor to lead the people. In 1906, through the efforts of the Rev. N. Lawton Mellichampe, then rector of the Leaksville Episcopal Church, a small structure twenty by thirty feet was built on "Flint Hill" and a mission established known as St. Luke's.

Since Mr. Gordon took charge there have been more than two hundred and twenty-five baptisms, many of them by immersion and one hundred and ninety confirmations. After a few years it was seen that the size of the present church would soon be inadequate for the growing congregation and as early as 1912 the members began to plan for a larger building. The cornerstone of the new St. Luke's Church was laid September 14, 1924. Heroic and sacrificial giving on the part of the membership, together with generous donations from friends in the community and throughout the state, have resulted in the beautiful rock church, valued at $20,000 which was consecrated in November, 1926. It is significant that each member had a part in the undertaking, even the little children piling rock in the fields to be used in the building.

In connection with the work at Leaksville and Spray, St. Andrew's mission has been established at the Galloway farm near Leaksville, a result of cottage prayer meeting services held by St. Luke's Junior Brotherhood of St. Andrew, while on a camping trip. For several years this work was under Mr. Gordon's direct supervision, but the work grew until it was found expedient to secure a resident missionary. Miss Lily Hill, formerly of Pittsboro, N. C., now devotes all her time to this field.

T. F. O.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D. Bishop.

St. John's, Marietta, the Rev. Chas. E. Berghaus, rector, has just closed one of the most successful years in its history. Besides raising in cash and pledges $2,500 for a new parish house, which is to be erected in the spring, it has paid its Field Quota Fund in full, and presented a Christmas offering of $250 and closed the year with a substantial balance in the treasury. Recently the church was presented with a handsome embroidered white silk superfrontal by the women of the Altar Guild and other friends. In preparation for the Bishops' Crusade, cottage prayer meetings are being conducted simultaneously in three different homes in the parish each Wednesday evening.

Christ Church, Lykens, the Rev. E. W. Foulkes, vicar, has been presented with a compensation pipe organ, the gift of Mrs. Katherine E. Long and her daughter, of Omaha, Nebraska, former residents of Lykens. As the church is already equipped with a pipe organ, the gift has been erected in the parish house.

Saul of Tarsus Church, Williamstown, has been presented with a new credence table, the gift of the Ladies' Guild; a green frontal, presented by Mrs. John Bond; and a fair linen cloth, given by Miss Elizabeth Kingston. The Guild has also furnished the vestry room with a new cabinet.

Personal Notes

The Rev. George L. Barnes, rector of St. John's Church, Helena, Ark., has accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Andrew's Church, Meriden, Conn., to take effect February 15.

The Rev. Charles M. Lever, priest in charge of the parishes at Dresden and Madison Township, Ohio, has resigned to accept the appointment as General Missionary for the Eastern section of the Diocese of Lexington, with residence in Pikesville.

The Rev. S. E. Matthews, formerly of the Diocese of East Carolina, has become associated with the Rev. A. C. D. Noe in the missionary work of Harnet and Johnson Counties, Diocese of North Carolina.

The Rev. Lane W. Barton has accepted the call to the rectorship of Trinity Church, Newark, and will begin his work February 1. Mr. Barton has been minister in charge of St. Mark's, Shelby, and Grace Church, Gallion, in the Diocese of Ohio for the past four years.

The Rev. L. O. Forqueran has resigned as rector of Grace Church, Ravenswood, and St. John's, Ripley, in the Diocese of West Virginia, and accepted a call to be rector of Grace Church, Pomeroy, and St. Peter's, Gallipolis, in the Diocese of Southern Ohio, with residence in Pomeroy, Ohio. He entered upon his new work on January 1.

The Rev. N. C. Duncan, for several years rector of St. David's, Cheraw, S. C., has accepted the work of Good Shepherd, Cooleemee, and Ascension Parish, Davie County, Diocese of North Carolina.

The Rev. Lyman Howes, for the past two years rector of St. John's Church, Parsons, Kansas, has accepted the call to St. Luke's Church, Marietta, Ohio, and took charge the first week in January.

The Rev. H. DeC. Mazyck, rector of All Saints' Church, Roanoke Rapids, N. C., has accepted a call to Holy Trinity Church, Townesville, and St. Mark's, Roxboro, N. C. Mr. Mazyck took charge of these missions early in January.

The address of the Rev. William Whittle is changed from Mapleton, Iowa, to Franklin, Louisiana.

The Rev. Wm. Byrd Lee, Jr., formerly of Norfolk, Va., has taken up his work as rector of the Church of the Holy Innocents, and as Student Pastor at the Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Auburn, Alabama.

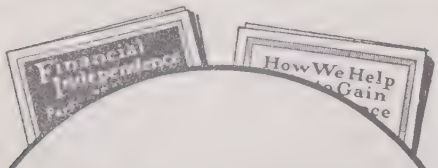
ORINATIONS.

The Rev. Frank Barr was advanced to the Priesthood by Bishop Reese at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Columbus, Ohio, on Tuesday, December 21, St. Thomas' Day. Mr. Barr was presented by the Rev. Sidney E. Sweet, and the preacher was the Rev. Canon O. E. Watson, of Bexley Hall.

Two former rectors of the parish participated in the ordination. The Litany was read by the Rev. F. O. Granniss, who was the first rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, and the Epistle was read by the Rev. W. T. Stimson, now rector of St. John's, Worthington. Archdeacon Reinheimer acted as master of ceremonies and the Rev. Maurice Clarke read the Gospel. The Rev. R. C. Masterton and the Rev. M. C. Sackett were also in the chancel and joined in the laying on of hands.

The Rev. Mr. Barr, who has been deacon in charge of the Good Shepherd since last June, when he graduated from Bexley Hall, now becomes the rector of the parish.

On the Sunday after Christmas, in St. Andrew's Church, Newark, N. J., Bishop Stearly ordained to the Priesthood the Rev. Rowland F. Nye, presented by the rector, the Rev. Charles H. Wells, the Rev. Charles E. McAllister preaching the sermon. Mr. Nye has for the last year been in charge of the services at Vailsburgh. He was a boy in the choir at Woodstock, Vermont, when the Rev. Mr. Wells was the rector there many years ago, and their lives have been brought together with Mr. Nye's ordination for the ministry.



On Sunday, December 5, in St. Clements Church, Buffalo, N. Y., the Rev. G. Paul Musselman, deacon, was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Charles Henry Brent, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Western New York. The ordinand was presented by the Rev. G. Sherman Burrows, D. D., warden of Delancey Divinity School, at which Mr. Musselman was a student. Dr. Burrows also read the Litany. The Rev. Leslie F. Chard, of Gowanda, N. Y., was the preacher. The Rev. John William Mulder, of Avon, N. Y., acted as Bishop's chaplain.

DEATHS.

On returning to the United States from a visit in Europe, the Rev. George Wallace, D. D., died at sea on the steamer President Harding, as the result of a fall, on January 6.

Dr. Wallace was born in England eighty-one years ago, and in his earlier ministry served for eight years as a missionary in the Hawaiian Islands, when the Church of England held jurisdiction through Bishop Willis. In 1889 Dr. Wallace volunteered for service in Japan and was appointed by Bishop McKim as professor in Trinity Divinity and Catechetical School in Tokyo. In addition to his teaching work he cared for the English services at the Cathedral in Tsukiji, and frequently ministered at Japanese stations outside of Tokyo. In 1917 he retired. His service both in the Hawaiian Islands and in Japan was marked by unswerving devotion to duty and by a sweetness of spirit and kindliness of bearing that won the affection of all with whom he came in contact.

The Winds.

Mary May.

Oh, I talk to the winds and the winds talk to me,
As the seasons pass swiftly by,
The east wind or west wind whichever it may be,
In the lowlands or in the high.
When old winter is bringing his cold, chilling blasts,
And I cling to the warm hearth fire,
Why I cry, "Oh, wild winds, it is time you have passed,
Of your roughness we all will tire!"

The bleak winds then reply, "But if you will walk
With us just for a little while,
We'll quicken your thoughts as with us you may talk,
And soon change a sad sigh to a smile"—
"Dear spring winds, please rest me, I am languid today,
And yearn to be quiet and still."
"Child, haste to the orchard," all the spring winds say,
"With wind-blown, white petals the hands fill."

Scented breezes of summer soon tease me to look,
For wild flowers or pine-laden wood;
"Oh, away from the hammock and reading a book.
Learn Nature's sweet secrets as one should."
The cool winds of Autumn lulling flowers to sleep
Bring a tear towards the death of the year,
But say, "Wake and labor, there is no time to weep,
God has work for each child He holds dear."

Different Snow Men.

You do not need a great amount of snow to make a snow man if you begin to work soon after it falls and make use of all you can get a hold of. Soiled snow might be used in the center if you fear you will not have enough with which to finish. When the ball is about the right size, cover it with a layer of clean snow. In fact some grass and leaves on the inside will make the snow man more lasting. Be sure to pack your ball hard as you roll it; this will make it last much longer than a soft, carelessly made ball. When making the body of your snow man, shape it long rather than thick.

It is as easy to mold a bear as a man. One boy cut out a huge bear face from paper and stuck it fast to the snow bear after it was completed. By wetting the paper, it was made to freeze fast to the figure. Here it stuck as long as the snow bear lasted. Chunks of coal or marbles make good eyes, a strip of red flannel makes a good mouth, and other features may be sketched on the snow face with ink or black paint.

A man and boy on a bench is easy to manage. Roll your balls and arrange them on the bench. You can dress them up in old clothes if you life. Any snow figure will last longer and be better shaped if you sprinkle it with cold water after nightfall. Apply the water with a fine spray from a sprinkling can or hose. Pat the surface hard, because hard snow does not melt nearly as fast as the soft snow. By locating your snow figures where they will be shaded from sun most of the day, or by covering them during warm days, you can make them last much longer.

A group of boys made a row of snow figures on a wide lawn that attracted much attention while they lasted. When another snow came, the boys made a new row of snow figures, each choosing quite a different figure to build. The boys had fun all winter with the snow men.

On Valentine's Day they gave each figure a big red heart for a valentine. They cut a portrait of Washington from a picture and stuck it to one of their figures which were molded to look like the dress of those days. Late in February they made the rest of the figures look like soldiers; by using flags, they made quite a brave patriotic display. In March when it began to rain, they gave each one a worn-out, old umbrella. This aroused a great amount of mirth to see the forlorn group literally melting away in the spring rains but bravely trying to protect themselves with their umbrellas.—Elizabeth Jain.

A Lesson In Giving.

The story related in the Gospel of Mark of the widow who cast her mite into the treasury of the temple, has a deep significance for all desirous of gaining the true meaning of the Holy Scriptures. It contains a lesson in giving from which all who read with understanding may greatly profit.

Jesus and His disciples, sitting near the treasury, that is, the collection box of the temple, saw the rich casting much into the box, giving generously to the Church out of their abundance. Presently there came by a poor woman who cast in two mites, which make a farthing—a very small gift, if its monetary value alone be considered. But the spiritually-minded Nazarene saw at once the significance of the widow's gift, and, wishing to utilize the experience by way of illustrating His teachings, called His disciples about Him and said, "Verily I say unto you, That this poor widow hath cast more in, than all they which have cast into the treasury". And He drove home the lesson with the significant statement, "For all they did cast in of their abundance; but she of her want did cast in all that she had, even all her living", that is, all she had to live on.

The lesson which Christ Jesus wished to convey, obviously, was that the size of the gift is determined, not by its monetary value, but by the spirit of sacrifice with which it is accompanied. The rich, although their gifts were large, gave only what they could well afford to give, that which they would not miss; and because of giving, they would not be deprived of any comfort or pleasure purchaseable with money. The poor widow, on the contrary, gave all she had to live on, leaving herself nothing with which to meet her immediate needs. What an example of perfect trust in God, in the omnipotence of good! All may find in the incident a beautiful lesson in the art of right thinking, and an example of that complete faith in God which never doubts God's availability to meet all human needs, and which fears not to face the world without money.

Many who, like the widow, have cast their all into the treasury of God's service with confidence born of understanding, have afterwards found ample supply to meet all right human needs. And, moreover, from the experience they have gained much in the understanding of true substance, have proved in some degree the infinite presence of good, have strengthened their faith in God's omnipotence, have proved something of the truth about spiritual man.

What wonderful possibilities for spiritual growth does one find in the story of the widow's mite! How rich does she seem in her profound faith in God and in her understanding of substance—that they are unlimited in quantity and unfailingly bestowed by the infinite Father upon His beloved! Surely all may gain an invaluable lesson from her experience. But, one may inquire, am I likewise to give up all I possess, all my wealth, in order to gain this blessing? Christ Jesus made very clear the difficulty encountered by the rich man in gaining the kingdom of heaven. Who is the rich man? Manifestly, in the thought of the Master the rich man is he who mistakenly believes material riches to be true substance. On the contrary, whoever has learned that substance is Spirit, that there is no other substance which is immutable and indestructible but Spirit, however rich he may be in what is commonly called the world's goods, comes under no condemnation because of the extent of his possessions. Such a one, looking to Spirit as the source of all supply, gives generously of his riches, knowing that thereby he not only does not impoverish himself but gains true substance in proportion as his spiritual sense is enhanced.—Exchange.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

An office may be an altar.

Since God is your partner, make your plans large.

He who gives forgiveness gives himself. And it is not easy.—Harry Emerson Fosdick.

If you can trust God for eternity, you ought to be able to leave this moment with Him.

The sublimest faith and heroism of prophets, apostles and martyrs are daily revealed in the works and ways of the dim multitude.—Selected.

How safe to loose our hold on all
Earth's props, and let our tiredness fall
Upon the love which soothes and calms,
And holds in "everlasting Arms".
—Anon.

A Calcutta daily paper reports that Dr. Ghandi was to lecture for an hour each week in the National College at Ahmedabad, which he founded when he launched the non-cooperation movement, and on his asking the students to choose the subject, they asked him to take the New Testament.

I have so many joys. In yielding homage one.
Such glorious creatures God hath made beneath the sun!
For some of these, and their white faith, and deeds sublime.
'Twas given me to meet as on toward God we climb.
—Edith M. Thomas.

Death is the most individualizing of all things. Each one dies by himself, even when a plague or the rout of an army slays its hundred thousands. And yet the words of Jesus Christ tell us that this awful loneliness is only in appearance. He shows the other side of death as a grander fellowship—Selected.

Of all people Christians ought to be the happiest and the cheeriest. It makes a great difference to those about us if our religion keeps us sunny-eyed and cheerful-hearted. Every Christian ought to seek to be a source of comfort and help to others; in fact, God expects His people to be "encouragers". The Christian has the assurance that God is his Father, that His love is unchanging and that His redeeming grace is able to keep him to the end.

Is thy path lonely? Fear it not, for He
Who marks the sparrow's fall is guarding thee;
And not a star shines o'er the head by night,
But He hath known that it will reach thy sight;

And not a joy can beautify thy lot,
But tells thee still thou art unforgot;
Nay, not a grief can darken or surprise,
Swell in thy heart, or dim with tears thine eyes,
But it is sent in mercy and in love,
To bid thy helplessness seek strength above.
—Selected.

THE DRIFT OF THE TIDE

SHEPHERDING THE FLOCK OF CHRIST is a large occupation with many trials and difficulties attached thereto. Not to slight the little congregations, and to be impartial to the large ones often confront a Bishop with perplexing problems. When it was announced that the Rt. Rev. William Cabell Brown, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Virginia would preach a week's mission in the Colored Church of St. Philip's, one is impressed with the fact that here is a Bishop with the true shepherding spirit ready to recognize and support faithful work done in his Diocese. It should be a source of inspiration to all those interested in the progress of the Church among Colored people, and no doubt its effect will reach far beyond the congregation of St. Philip's.

RAILROAD RELIGION is not known to many of our clergy, but to those who have had experience with it there is none better. What is it? Well, it is the practice of cooperation by great corporations. Practically all the big railroads throughout the country will issue a "charity ticket" (which costs half the regular fare), in worthy cases properly investigated, by some charitable or Church organization. A few of the carrier companies will issue a "charity pass". This kind of assistance from such companies is most valuable for sending persons to hospitals, or other institutions. Of course, the railroads cannot afford to be imposed upon, and it is necessary that proper information, showing due cause for the request, should always accompany a letter asking for this kind of consideration. This is only one of the many ways in which Christianity now permeates modern business life. Another instance of it that has recently come under our notice is that the Yellow Cab Company, in one of our large cities, gives its service entirely free to the inmates of the Crippled Children's Hospital. It is a good thing for churches to perform Christian acts of kindness, but it is a good deal better thing so to Christianize industry that it will do these things as a part of its business life.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES are observing Lent and their Commission on Evangelism, and Life Service have issued a booklet containing a short Scripture passage, a prayer, and a hymn for each day of Lent. Many city daily papers will run this devotional program for every day, so that it will be read in thousands of homes, and in itself it constitutes a brief religious service with the elements of prayer, praise and instruction from the Bible. The cooperation of the daily press in carrying such material is one of the many indications of the drift of the tide toward spiritual things. Some bewail the lack of attendance at Church, but if the devotional service is going into the home, through daily papers, that is Christianizing every day life in a way that is more universal than large crowds at Church. Samples of this pocket service book can be obtained by any clergyman by writing to the Commission of Evangelism and Life Service, 105 East Twenty-Second Street, New York City.

A THOUSAND GUESTS AT A BIRTHDAY PARTY is an unusual way of demonstrating the power of preaching, yet this party, with its exceptionally large attendance was the direct result of the eloquent preaching of Miss Maude Royden. Through her eloquence she has assembled around her a group, mostly of young woman, teachers and workers of various kinds, earning their own living, who collect and give large sums of money to various worthy objects, such as the "Save the Children Fund", and unemployed miners' families. Besides all this they keep up the rent of the Eccleston Guild House, at three hundred pounds a year, and are expending two thousand pounds in having it made more suitable for Miss Royden's services. On her fiftieth birthday, the occasion referred to above, she was presented with a purse of one thousand pounds. These things give food for meditation to those who bewail the waning of the power of the pulpit.

THE PRACTICE OF REAL CHRISTIANITY is difficult enough in a Church chancel with vestments and the proper setting to impress us with our responsibilities. How much more difficult it must be in the face of an insulting mob hurling stones and other missiles with a pistol at one's side and a loaded rifle in one's hands, yet a genuine Christianity was practiced by the British Marines at Hankow, under these circumstances, when they failed to fire a shot, or inflict a wound upon Chinese rioters under the greatest strain. An eye-witness says: "The self-possession of the English fighting men under the trying circumstances was 'perfectly wonderful'." It is this kind of discipline and self-restraint that has made the British official and the British Government respected throughout the world. The failure to return "evil for evil" under such circumstances is indeed a fine example of Christianity in practice.

DR. HENRY SLOAN COFFIN used vigorous language in denouncing his Presbyterian brethren at the meeting of the New York Presbytery, for not living up to the pact entered into by them and the Methodist and Episcopal clergymen not to marry divorced people. In response to a question concerning his opinion of the divorces obtained by Americans in Paris, Dr. Coffin said, "I think they are a disgrace. Some day I hope the United States Government will fail to recognize such divorces granted to an American". Ministers throughout the country should assume the attitude of the New York clergyman, and enter into agreements to observe strictly the rules of their churches, or to live up to a higher standard even, with regard to divorced persons.

A CIRCULATION OF SEVENTEEN MILLION FIVE HUNDRED THOUSAND represents the combined subscribers of all the religious periodicals in the United States. Since this is almost one sixth of the entire population, these figures are decidedly encouraging. Although the religious press undoubtedly has a great obstacle to overcome in the financial problem, nevertheless, the number of persons being reached by various Church papers indicates that the demand for religious reading is very much larger than is generally supposed, and that the influence of these periodicals must be very considerable. There is no doubt that religion, in one form or another, has a very much larger place in the daily lives of our people than it used to in former years.

THE POWER OF CONTACT WITH CHRIST

The late afternoon sun was casting oblique shadows across the little plains, and steep declivities of Samaria, as a small group of tired pedestrians made their way toward Jerusalem. Those were not friendly greetings or glances that were received as they passed shepherds and camel drivers or entered the hamlets. Their faces were set as though they were going toward Jerusalem, and that fact in itself was enough to create bitter prejudice in a people who had not forgotten the long rivalry that had existed between the Judean capital and their own city by the sacred Mount where they felt that God was to be found.

The lengthening shadows impressed upon the travelers the necessity for finding some place where a night's lodging might be obtained.

Two of the younger members forged ahead, as they approached the next village to try to secure shelter for the night.

Soon, however, these messengers, two brothers, John and James, returned with flushed faces and angry voices. The villagers will not accommodate any pilgrims going up to the hated Jerusalem. The two enraged young men come to the Leader of their party, exclaiming "Lord, wilt Thou that we command fire to come down from heaven and consume them, even as Elias did?" But He turned and rebuked them, and said, "Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of, for the Son of Man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them"; and they went to another village, (Luke 9:51-57).

Upon another occasion these two ambitious brothers approached the Master with the rquest that they should be allowed to sit upon His right and left hand in the Kingdom to be established.

Was it any wonder then that they had been given by Him the surname, Boarneges, or Sons of Thunder, so tempestuous was their nature in youth.

Now the scene changes. We leap forward a half century or more in time, and are no longer in Palestine with its sacred scenes and narrow minded inhabitants. The great pagan city of Ephesus lies before us, in which was the beautiful statue of Diana, supposed to have been dropped from heaven by Jupiter, the city in which Paul stayed three years, and gave lectures on Christianity. It might be called the first Christian theological seminary. He was so successful and made so many converts that he seriously menaced the business of making and selling the copper images of Diana, which had been so popular that their manufacture was a thriving industry. It is a long time after the departure and death of St. Paul, that we see an old man walking through these streets. He has a benign face and the children love to follow him, for he is known as the "Apostle of Love". His constant phrase to the eager, squabbling youngsters around him is "Little children, love one another".

In his old age he has written a book containing his recollections of the words and deeds of his Master, that Master who had wrought such a transformation in him, changing his whole disposition, so that when he came to put down his memories and to write also three short letters for the Churches, we find in them the word "love" used a greater number of times than in all the rest of the New Testament combined.

That is the kind of change that contact with Jesus will make in men's lives, today as it did in that of St. John, the evangelist of old. It gives them a new outlook on life. The contemplation of the love and service that He exemplified in His every-day life so fills us with devotion to God, and His children that we cannot help wanting to serve in a thousand ways. It uplifts and ennobles us, gives us a wide vision, and extends our horizon of life, so that it includes something more than what we see and hear, and feel through the senses with which this body is endowed.

It was the knowledge of this transforming power within Himself that enables Jesus to say with perfect confidence to His disciples, "If ye love me ye will keep my commandments".

It is the inspiration of this mighty power, this contact with Jesus which changed St. John from "The Son of Thunder" to "The Beloved Disciple", that is moving our Church today, and has seent forth the Crusaders into the land to carry the message of renewed spiritual life through coming again into His blessed presence.

There can be no doubt of the result, if we will but throw ourselves into this enterprise with heart and soul, and remember that the Holy Spirit works through the touch of one life upon another, so if one is inspired or uplifted by a service, see to it that the same experience is shared with a friend, by bringing that friend to one of the services, and so let the awakening of our Church, the renewal of contact with Christ reach from top to bottom and spread like the fire of the Holy Spirit of old.

THE UNFOLDING OF TRUTH

Nothing is more interesting in the Bible than the development of new truths, as revealed through its Inspired Word.

The revelation of One God came to Abraham, but it was by no means universal, for several centuries afterwards, in fact we find Isaiah, long years afterward, delivering one of his most sarcastic and witty utterances against idolatry.

So also the great message of the Fatherhood of God that our Saviour brought took a considerable time to spread to the degree of general acceptance.

In St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, which is generally accepted to be among the earliest Books of the New Testament, the writer feels it necessary to make quite a lengthy argument to prove that we have passed from the condition of servants to the relationship of children of God.

On the other hand, in the first Epistle of St. John, written perhaps thirty or forty years later, that Apostle at once assumes our sonship to God as a perfectly natural matter of common knowledge. In the second verse of the third chapter of his first Epistle he makes the statement without any previous discussion or argument, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be".

It is a good illustration of the manner in which, by God's loving revelation, we move from truth to truth on an ever ascending scale, and in continuously widening planes. Thus, St. John at once assumes what St. Paul felt it necessary to prove by argument, and having attained that position he immediately looks forward to greater things that might come.

So also, in the scientific world, if we think of each new discovery as merely an increasing of the gifts of God we look forward with eager anticipation to new developments.

THIS WEEK'S PREACHER

The Rev. Elwood Worcester, D. D., was born in Ohio, and after studying at Columbia University, New York, and the General Theological Seminary, he went abroad and took a Ph. D. degree at Leipsig. On his return, after serving a church in Brooklyn, and teaching Philosophy in Lehigh University, he became rector of St. Stephen's Church, Philadelphia, from which he was called to Emmanuel Church, Boston, in 1904. He has here done a notable work in starting what is known as the "Emmanuel Movement". With his associate, Dr. McComb, he opened what might be called religious clinics for the treatment of certain diseases, as a part of his Church work. He always worked in connection with a Doctor, and has aroused quite a new interest in the connection between religion and medicine. From time to time he has written a number of books, among them being, "The Living Word", "Religion and Life" and "The Christian Religion as a Healing Power".

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

NEW ALLIES FOR THE COMING YEAR

By The Reverend Elwood Worcester, D. D.

For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ.—1 Cor. 3:11.

A FEW years ago many persons entertained the curious expectation that our soldiers as the result of their spiritual experiences and their sacrifices in the Great War would return home bringing with them the vision of a new world and a new life. Those who had partaken of these great experiences abroad doubtless had reason for this belief. Nevertheless, it was not realized. No such change was perceptible. He that was righteous was righteous still. Even we who remained at home were conscious of a very wonderful change of heart which passed over this country at that time, which, had it continued, would have affected our whole life. It seemed as if a new and greater spirit had awakened in us all, from the least to the greatest, a spirit of consecration and of unselfish devotion. Men and women seemed to rise above themselves, to cast off their ordinary selfishness and sloth. Suddenly the bonds of class and caste fell off and we realized, perhaps for the first time in our history, that we are one people. The health, the happiness, the moral disposition of the humblest citizen became a matter of serious concern to us, and we wished no one to be embittered or discontented.

I wonder if any appeal could have sustained this disposition. We felt then as the Disciples felt on the way to Jerusalem—that the kingdom of Heaven might immediately appear. But, apparently, such a vast outpouring of devotion can only be engendered automatically, under the threat and stimulus of mighty catastrophies. The reaction of war is not like the reaction of great religious enterprises, a preparation for new effort. War's reaction is lassitude and license. As soon as the immediate object of our effort was attained "a change passed o'er the spirit of our dream". We lost the opportunity of making this generation the greatest in history, and we entered one of the most humiliating periods of our national existence which, apparently, has left us scarcely a friend on earth.

And yet, though the Disciples' expectation of the immediate coming of the Kingdom was deceived and the world continued on its old way, a new age really dawned on the day that Jesus died in utter obscurity and a new spiritual power then entered the world which has changed our higher life forever. However mistaken we were in our former expectation, there is no mistake in our belief that a new era has dawned on the earth. One of the great periods of the world's history has definitely ended and another has begun. So great an overthrow and a destruction can only be followed by a commensurate reconstruction (He taketh away the first that He may establish the second), and we may be sure that the world which is rising will not be built on foundations which proved too frail or too treacherous for the old world. For good or evil, or for good and evil, the power of the past, of clinging, impending and, at the same time of staying, steadying custom, tradition and habit has been broken, and something new is about to take place under the sun. We feel very much as St. Paul felt when he wrote "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid. . . . But let every man take heed what he buildeth thereupon for the day will try it".

After the wars of Napoleon, more than a thundred years ago, there followed a period of mediocrity, frivolity and moral weakness which Balzac has depicted for all succeeding ages in the hundred volumes of his "Human Comedy". Then the great forces of the Nineteenth Century slowly shaped themselves and began to give form to one of the most splendid periods of intellectual and material advance this world has ever known. It may be that the spiritual forces of the New Age will require a longer period of incubation before they break into life and stamp our time with the sign-manuel of its genius, but they will certainly emerge and will produce works in proportion to the new strength of the human race. As nothing radically new except the grotesque phenomenon of Russian Bolshevism made its appearance as the result of war, we can only suppose that the future, as usual, will issue from the past, and that our former achievements will be the tools and instruments by which the new world will be fashioned.

On this beginning of our new year, I shall make a brief inventory of our new, or more recent spiritual and religious assets, as they appear to me, those things of the soul solidly rooted in thought, disposition, knowledge and experience which are alive and able to act.

One really marvelous sentiment which has come to us of late years is our new sense of responsibility for the sorrows and misfortunes of mankind. America, during the past twenty-five years, has become the great Alma Mater of the nations. Wherever there is grief, tragedy, terrible disease, catastrophies of Nature on earth, America is soon present with money, skill and devotion, to save the perishing and to comfort the comfortless. No such office has been assumed by any other nation in the history of the world. Today all the churches are asked to endorse and to strengthen this noble service in the relief of the ancient people of Israel and of other sufferers in the Near East, and I appeal to all who love the best that is in America to take part in this work.

Next I make mention of our great faith, our faith in science. I do not know where one would turn to find anything like it, a faith which so many educated men hold with such assurance and with so little doubt. If it has sought, it has also found. Its discoveries in every field, near or distant, material or spiritual, theoretical or practical, pour in so fast that the most industrious student cannot keep pace with them, and no human mind ever again will be able to master their whole domain. In consequence of these findings a new sense of power and of hope has come to the human race which it never possessed before.

This faith, then, is a fact which must be reckoned with by all churches. No weapon raised against science will prosper. What we call "science" is but a cross-section of reality, nor do people pronounce against reason oftener or more emphatically than reason pronounces against them. Our only protection against the crudities and materialism of science lies in more and better science, in a science of spiritual things, just as the reconcilation of age-long antagonism of science and religion lies in making science more religious and religion more scientific. One of the greatest achievements of the future will certainly be to close this gulf, to heal and integrate this dissociation of our noblest faculties.

Over against this is a fact we shall never forget until we lose our memories in senile decay. Science can never be the supreme guide and teacher of mankind, because in itself it is non-ethical. It is just as willing to serve a murderer as it is to serve an honest man. Poison gas is to it as the sweetest perfume. When, at last, science succeeded in invading the sky it was not to pour down peace and good will, but wrath and destruction on the children of men. It does not ask whether things are good or bad, whether they are right or wrong, but only whether they are true or false, fit or unfit. We have evoked a genie which already has forces at his command capable of annihilating all that man has created, and unless the spirit of man is capable of directing this power for good, it will destroy him. In other words, science is our servant, not our master.

Another Spiritual asset which will mean more to the Church in the future than it has meant in the past is our critical knowledge of the Scriptures. In spite of the mythologists, Christianity is an historical religion which has its origin in a great historical personality. More and more it is felt and acknowledge that Jesus is the Author and Finisher of our faith. But if we would know Jesus we must know the Synoptic Gospels. Of these, St. Mark's is undoubtedly the first and the oldest, not merely in the priority of a decade or two, but in its more primitive conceptions, in its graphic realism and in the human traits of its presentation. A very ancient tradition asserts that its contents were dictated to St. Mark by Simon Peter, and much of the Gospel supports this tradition and bears the imprint of an eye-witness.

In the preparation of his Gospel St. Matthew made use of the whole Gospel of Mark and he had also at his disposal the incomparable Logia, or collections of the priceless sayings and connected discourses of Jesus. St. Matthew wrote for the Hebrews and he is very fond of introducing Old Testament quotations and prophecies, sometimes forcibly.

Most scholars believe that St. Luke wrote his Gospel a little later than St. Matthew. Strange to say, in spite of Luke's avowed intention of making use of all that had been written on the Lord's life, he does not appear to have been acquainted with St. Matthew's work. Otherwise his innumerable departures and differences of order and expression would be unthinkable. St. Luke also had access to some other collection of Jesus' sayings and parables, including some of the greatest—Dives and Lazarus, the Good Samaritan, the Prodigal Son, which appear nowhere else.

Today scholars, with few exceptions, are agreed that the Fourth Gospel, which we call St. John's, is not intended to be a mere recital of the events of Jesus' life, but a philosophy of that life, the most profound and touching which has ever been written. It is he who boldly identifies Jesus with the Word, the Logos of the Stoics and Neo-Plantonists. Many of the sayings are so different in their range of thought and vocabulary that it is difficult to believe that the same person spoke as St. John and as the Synoptics represent Jesus as speaking. He does not admit that Jesus was baptized by John the Baptist, or that He instituted the Eucharist at the Last Supper. The Gospel begins with the total suppression of the dark scene of temptation in the wilderness and substitutes for it the bright scene of the marriage in Cana, where Jesus changes the water of the old Jewish purifications into the new wine of the Kingdom of God. Most of its miracles are new and different. Its only allusions to the human birth of Jesus simply designate Him as the son of Joseph—"We have found Him of whom Moses and the prophets did write, Jesus of Nazreth, the Son of Joseph". The demoniacs, who left such an indelible impression on the earlier Gospels, disappear altogether and are never mentioned. Above all, Jesus' expectation of the immediate coming of the Kingdom, which time had disposed of, is allowed to fall, and in place of the speedy return of Jesus, is the heavenly house of many mansions to which Jesus will welcome His own after their death.

I have left myself little time for mentioning other new spiritual assets and allies we have at our command, but there is one I must allude to—our new knowledge of the soul. In the whole history of thought man has made three revolutonary discoveries, revolutionary in the sense of changing forever his estimate of himself and of the universe in which he lives. The first is the discovery of the earth's place in the solar system and its revolution around its central body, begun by Copernicus and finished by Galileo in the Seventeenth Century. The second is the discovery of Evolution in the Nineteenth Century which has changed all our conceptions of Creation of man's past history and his place in Nature. The third is our discovery of the nature and reality of the soul and of the part played by subconscious elements of mind, and our occasional supernormal experiences. We are still too near this last revelation to realize its enormous importance. With it a new phase of human evoluton has begun and, in spite of all our present materialism, the age which has begun will be known as the "Age of the Spirit". As we look back to the animal man of the past, so we may begin to look forward to the Spiritual, the Divine man of the future of whom we have one perfect example in Jesus Christ, divine not merely in His own person, but in His knowledge and employment of spiritual laws and forces. From this point of view the mighty works of Christ regain all their ancient power. It would not be an exaggeration to say that hundreds of thousands of persons are rejoicing in this new lght, in their improved health and in their closer walk with God. The soul and the things of the Spirit which used to seem so vague and far off have become concrete realities. Prayer is no longer a mere duty or a wearisome exercise; it is a joy and a necessity of our lives which winning foot ball teams cannot dispense with. From this point of view the whole person of the Redeemer comes nearer to us. His words and sayings are more intelligible to us, and His great acts are real, credible and congenial to us, because they are supported in so many instances by our own experience.

These are some of the new allies of religion, and there are others, nearly as important, I could mention if I had the time. Personally I give no credit whatever to the saying: "Religion is declining," "Religion is dying out." What we call "religion" is the outward expression of the life of the soul, and not until the soul of man dies and all its great creations are forgotten, will religion cease to be the most important fact in human life. An age which has knowledge of Jesus and the soul is not likely to see the death of religion. Chrstianity is too vast, too vital, too spiritual, too many-sided to depend upon any social custom even on so important a custom as regular church attendance. Behind Christianity stands the august figure of Jesus Christ who never meant more to the world than He means now. Today we think of His coming. Jesus is always coming. To every succeeding generation He comes to every heart which sighs for a better life He comes. As far as our life contains elements of real hope and value, it springs from Him. The ideals of justice and the rights of man on which all democracy rests sprang from the blood shed on Calvary. The ideals of love which kindle our hearts were spoken by His lips. Be our sentiments in regard to religion what they may, at the bottom of his heart every good man among us is a Christian because the principles by which he leads his life are Christ's and without Christ he would not have them. Nineteen centuries of Christian thought and experience have taught us lesson we can never forget and which no denial or folly of man can take from us. Conceptions of honor, of duty, of respect for the rights of others, of charity twards the unfortunate, of pity for the oppressed, of horror of unjust violence, of hatred, of tyranny and abhorrence of perfidy and crime, have entered into our very blood and have become the established principles of our life. These are part of our Christian heritage and of the unsearchable riches of Christ. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid."

THE CHURCH AND THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S WORK

Edited by the Reverend Karl Morgan Block, D. D.

FEBRUARY WORSHIP PROGRAMS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

Theme for the Month: Discipleship.

THE aim of the worship should be: (1) To magnify the discipleship of Christ; (2) To cause young people to think seriously of their own relationship to Christ; (3) To stir up desire to be a disciple, and to prove one's worth for such an exalted relationship; (4) To awaken appreciation of the universality of believers, and of the duties and privileges pertaining to membership in this great Christian brotherhood.

The special weekly themes chosen are:

The Call to Discipleship,
The Cost of Discipleship,
The Character of the True Disciples,
The Catholicity of Discipleship.

In order to enlist as many young people in the worship program as possible, it is suggested that a different leader have charge of the worship period each Sunday. When possible, have other designated young people read the Scriptures as suggested in the programs, also have a number of singers constitute a choir to lead in the singing of the hymns. Practice in hymn singing before the use of the hymns in worship, is recommended, as it facilitates ease and accuracy of rendition, and relieves the attention from preoccupation with the mechanics of the hymn, giving full freedom for heartfelt expression. In true worship we must feel as well as understand. Have a copy of Hoffman's—"Christ and the Rich Young Ruler", or Zimmerman's—"Christ and the Fishermen", prominently displayed before the group during this month. If possible, have some one interpret the meaning of the picture as the artist expressed it. Help on this may be had in "The Gospel in Art", by A. E. Bailey, Pilgrim Press, Boston.

It is a great benefit if every member of the group can have a copy of the worship program. If possible, have the programs mimeographed and distributed by the ushers.

First Sunday: The Call to Discipleship.

Call to Worship:

I was glad when they said unto me, Come, let us go into the house of the Lord. I will hear what God the Lord will speak; For He will speak peace unto His people and to His Saints.

Music:

The piano plays softly through one stanza of—"Jesus Calls Us O'er the Tumult". At the close of the stanza, the Scripture lesson will be read by four persons, two boys and two girls, each selection alternating with a stanza of the above hymn to be sung by all.

First Boy: Matt. 4:18-22. The Call of the Four. All sing the first stanza of the above hymn.

Second Boy: Mark 10:17-22. The Rich Young Ruler. All sing the second stanza.

First Girl: Matt. 9:9-13. The Call of Matthew. All sing the third stanza.

Second Girl: Matt. 8:18-22. I Will Follow Thee. All sing the fourth stanza.

Prayer (by several young men of one class):

1. For willingness to listen to the call.

2. For understanding to interpret our life call as disciples of Jesus.

3. For readiness to follow Christ in every life situation, at home, at school, at work, at play.

Hymn: "Who Is on the Lord's Side?" Let a girl sing the stanzas as a solo, all responding in the refrain:

By Thy call of mercy,
By Thy grace divine,
We are on the Lord's side,
Saviour, we are Thine.

Poem (to be read or recited by a girl):

I said, let me walk in the field.
  He said, Nay, walk in the town.
I said, there are no flowers there.
  He said, no flowers, but a crown.

I said, but the air is thick,
  And fogs are veiling the sun.
He said, yet souls are sick,
  And souls in the dark, undone.

I said, but the skies are black,
  And there's nothing but noise and din.
He wept as He sent me back,
  There is more, He said, There is sin.

I said, I shall miss the light,
  And friends will miss me, they say.
He said, choose thou tonight,
  If I am to miss you or they.

I pleaded for time to be given.
  He said, is it hard to decide?
It will not seem hard in heaven
  To have followed the steps of your Guide.

I cast one look on the field,
  Then set my face to the town.
My child, He said, do you yield?
  Will you leave the flowers for a crown?

Then into His hand went mine.
  And into my heart came He.
And I walk by a light divine
  The path I had feared to see.

—George MacDonald.

Worship With the Offering:

Let one member of each class bring the class offering to the front and remain standing during the following prayer:

O God our Father, and Jesus Christ our Master, we bring these gifts as an acknowledgment of Thy mastery over our lives. As we bring our money, so help us to bring our lives unto loving obedience to Thy Holy Will and Purpose for each one of us. Amen.

Hymn: "O Master, Let Me Walk With Thee."

Second Sunday: The Cost of Discipleship.

Call to Worship:

What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits toward me? I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord: I will pay my vows unto the Lord, yea, in the presence of all His people, In the courts of the Lord's House, in the midst of Thee, O Jerusalem.

Hymn: "Thou Didst Leave Thy Throne."

Scripture:

Each selection to be read in unison by different classes or by the boys and girls alternating in the reading. Matt. 10:24-25, 32-39. Disciple not above His Master. Luke 14:25-33. Exacting requirements of discipleship. 1 John 3:13-18. Love, the price of discipleship. Mark 10:23-31. The peril of riches.

Hymn:

"My Jesus I Love Thee" (to be sung very softly, one stanza only, followed by a few moments of silent meditation, followed by the Morning Prayer).

Prayer (by one of the teachers):

Pray for understanding and appreciation of the seriousness of life choices, for strength to make right choices, for help to obey Christ cheerfully and implicitly, and for greater love of God and Christ, that will make discipleship life's greatest joy.

Hymn: "Believe Not Those Who Say."

Poem (to be recited or read by a girl):

He Leadeth Me.

In pastures green? No not always, sometimes He
Who knoweth best, in kindness leadeth me
Through weary ways, where heavy shadows be.

Out of the sunshine soft and warm and bright,
Out of the sunshine, into darkest night.
I oft would faint with sorrow and affright,

Only for this, I know He holds my hand.
So whether in the green or desert land,
I trust, although I may not understand.

And by still waters? No, not always so.
Sometimes the heavy tempests o'er me blow,
And o'er my soul the winds and billows go.

But when the storm beats fiercest, and I cry
Aloud for help, behold, He standeth by,
And whispers to my soul, Lo, it is I.

Above the tempest's roar I hear Him say,
Beyond the darkness lies the perfect day;
In every path of thine, I lead the way.

So, whether on the hilltops bright and fair,
I dwell, or in the sunless valleys where
The shadows lie, what matters, He is there.

And more than this. Where'er the pathways lead
He lends no helpless broken reed
But His own hand, sufficient for my need.

So where He leads me I may safely go,
And in the blest hereafter I shall know
Why, in His kindness, He hath led me so.

Offering and Prayer:

(For grace and strength to face the cost of discipleship, to give the full measure of our devotion, to bring our gifts of money, talent or service not grudgingly, but in the spirit of Him who used to say, "It is more blessed to give than to receive".)

Hymn: "O Jesus, I Have Promised."

Have the pupils read silently the third stanza instead of singing it, and let the piano play the melody softly and then all sing the last stanza before going to the class period.

The above was taken from the January issue of The International Journal of Religious Education—the article written by William A. Weber.

The programs for the last two Sundays will follow for the next issue.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE COMMUNITY

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

FOURTH ANNUAL SOCIAL SERVICE SUNDAY.

The third Sunday after Epiphany, January 23, is the Sunday on which the clergy and the people of the Church are asked to remember in their prayers the work of Social Service.

The Department of Christian Social Service suggests that on that day all social workers in any parish make their Communion together, and that a breakfast be served afterwards, where they can meet one another and meet the rector. It suggests further that the implications of the social Gospel be touched upon in the sermon, and draws attention to the prayers for social service, and the lessons set aside in the new Prayer Book.

The Sunday comes in the midst of the Bishops' Crusade, and can be made a useful part of that Crusade. As Bishop Brent and others say in a public statement:

"We would venture to express the hope that Crusaders and parish priests alike may try to lead men to find Him in the service of humanity, as well as in the inner experience of their souls. Indeed, we believe that the Christian experience is not complete until, with Christ, we have so identified ourselves with humanity that its joys, its sorrows and its needs become as our own, and in trying to meet these needs we find ourselves face to face with Christ and God. . . . This sense of the oneness of the individual with all members of the great human family was nobly expressed by a present-day leader when he said: 'Years ago I recognized my kinship with all living beings, and I made up my mind that I was not one bit better than the meanest of the earth. I said then, and I say now, that while there is a lower class I am in it; while there is a criminal element I am of it; while there is a soul in prison I am not free'. . . . . Since, in a successful Bishops' Crusade, there must be a conviction of sin, let it therefore be a new conviction, in that it shall involve not only the recognition of responsibility in our personal relations with God, but also the recognition of our individual responsibility for the sins of social injustce, crime, oppression and division."

The Department four years ago first made this request. The response has been nation-wide. Scores of parishes today have groups of workers who carry out this program. It is hoped that this year the Sunday will be widely observed as part of the Bishops' Crusade.

COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING.

Artice III.

By Mary Evelyn Brydon, M. D.

Keeping our Communications Open.

Every road goes from somewhere to somewhere else. There may be dozens of roads all around us which we neither use, nor indeed know are open to us for traffic, but we usually select the one which looks easiest to travel. In order to travel safely along a thoroughfare, it is necessary to know its landmarks so that we may recognize them as we go along; to know the right and wrong turnings; to know its vicissitudes, such as the grades, railroad crossings and the mud holes that tend to hamper speed, and to be familiar with the rules governing traffic that have been made for our safety.

This is also largely true of the various roads we travel in our life journey. As in the case of earthy roads, we know that the Government will keep them in repair, provide sign boards and danger signals; so we may feel sure that as we go through the years, we shall be guided and guarded by the Power that has charge of our lives.

The young and inexperienced mother hitherto shielded by home environment, perhaps for the first time feels the need of help and guidance in her life. Looking upon her first baby the first time he varies from the set routine for a baby, either by a crying spell which seems to her inconsolable or without cause, or a "colic", or a temper trantrum, or a refusal to nurse, she becomes terrified at the prospect of the future thus held out to her—the puzzle as to how to bring up this child in the way he should go. She has noble ideals and glowing visions of bringing up a perfect child, perfect in behavior, character, personality and morality. She soon finds that she has to reckon with a terrifying number of disturbing factors during the progress of child training.

She finds that the child himself is a human being, full to overflowing with likes and dislikes accompanied by a noisy apparatus for manifesting them to her and to the world in general. His physiologic functions have a way of rising out of order and demanding attention. He goes on a hunger strike at the most inopportune times, without regard to social conventions. But this is not all. If she had the child only to deal with, her program could be carried out in quite a normal manner with only such revisions and variations as the child's developing personality might require.

She finds, however, that she is surrounded by advisors and helpers undreamed of in her rosy anticipations. There is her own family, her in-laws, her neighbors, and every chance book or magazine she may pick up to influence her one way or another. The result is that the road which seemed so easy and passable at first, as time goes on becomes increasingly difficult to travel. I am sorry to tell you that the average mother within my observation, when facing such obstacles lies down on her job, withdraws her guiding hand and lets her program develop itself. In spite of all the roads open to her, because of discouragement from opposition to her methods, or poor health, or too many advisors, or harassing economic circumstances, she cannot decide which to follow and finally adopts the worst road of all—the Path of Least Resistance.

Every mother needs help in training her child or children. Let us look for a moment at the various helps that she will need during the years of training. First of all, she needs the indwelling presence of Jesus Christ.

Second, the family physician.
Third, the minister.
Fourth, the city, county or state nurse.
Fifth, the county or state home-making agencies.
Sixth, the school teacher.
Seventh, the wise counsel of the older members of the allied families.

The order is of no importance. But you as a mother will need all of these at some time during your child's early years, some of them all the time and others on various occasions.

The One who will give you greatest and most continuous guidance is our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Last week I reminded you first, that He is in you ready to do His part as Guide, Counselor and Comforter; second, that He is the best teacher in the world; and third, that He can not teach you in any way unless you go to Him ready for His instruction.

I believe that more mistakes in child training are caused by failure to understand these fundamental principles than by anything else. In fact, I think that nothing else matters, that everything else pales into insignificance before the importance of this one factor. Therefore, let us study this carefully.

Let me ask you a few questions: You really and truly believe that He is in you and ready to teach you, do you not? Do you honestly feel that you need His instruction? Do you have a secret notion that you can get on without Him if you have enough human helpers available? If you feel an urgent need of Him in your job of child training, do you go to Him constantly for all sorts of instructions, or do you only call upon Him in times of distress?

These questions must be answered earnestly and thoughtfully. They will show you how important I think is your need for His guidance and His power to help you solve EVERY SINGLE PROBLEM that comes up in your daily life.

If you concede that all of this is true, your next question will be: "How can I keep my road open to Him so He will always hear me, for I often call on Him and I find the way blocked?" Now, that is a splendid question, for it shows that you are willing to learn; that you are in a receptive mood and that His instructions will fall upon fertile ground.

Perhaps you will be startled when I tell you that it isn't your business to keep the road to Him open. Did you ever realize that? All you have to do is to ask Him to guide you, surrender the problem to Him and then—keep moving. You will be told in due time the When and the How, the Where. Those are instructions that He will give you. The dangers that lie along the road are His care; He will safeguard you, for has He not said He would? If you yourself had the job of keeping the road open you would need the knowledge of God Himself; you would need to have His wisdom; and you would need to have His power to accomplish. Therefore, do you not see that the task is one that you are wholly incapable yourself of accomplishing to the slightest degree?

Your Part:
To go to Him.
To give up your way.
To accept His verdict.
To carry on under His guidance.
To thank Him.

His Part:
To listen to your asking.
To direct your footsteps.
To guide your intelligence.
To comfort you in distress.
To safeguard your body, mind and soul.

Why is it that you do not believe Him when He says that He will give all this to you and more?

You ask Him what to do; He tells you what to do.

How are you to understand His messages and decisions?

These are questions for us to study next week. In the meantime read daily your Scripture lesson; ask Him daily for guidance in our study; and daily thank Him for the help He has given you.

Faith and Love, Creche, Kyoto

Some years ago a wealthy American visiting this country, on seeing a group of gaily dressed Japanese children in a mission kindergarten, became so enthusiastic that he remarked he would be willing to give any amount of money to carry on such work as that. That is one way to look at the matter. But Miss Peck and Miss Fujita had another idea. To their minds, the grubby-faced, dirty-nosed children of the poorer districts, whose mothers could not care for them because they were at work all day long, and were too ignorant to care for them even when they had a rare moment of leisure, came nearer to being "the least of these". So some years ago they started a day nursery, which we now call the "Baby House", though its real name is the Shin-ai (Faith and Love) Creche. Miss Peck has retired from the mission field but the work is carried on under the direction of Miss M. R. Paine (now on furlough). Miss Fujita has added a husband to her staff of assistants and is called Mrs. Sonobe.

The work began in a little rented house, but it grew to such proportions that Bishop Tucker bought land and put up a proper building for it. For a time the poor mothers were a little awed by the grand place, but they soon found that the same loving care was present there as before, and now the last possible tier of little pigeon-holes has been put into the bath-room, making forty-eight in all, each containing a wash-cloth, a cake of soap, a tooth brush and tooth powder, the private property of a tiny tot who gets a thorough scrub every other day. There is an average attendance of thirty, with about forty on the roll, which leaves little leeway for further growth, and soon children will have to be refused for lack of room.

In April, 1925, a kindergarten was started for the children of the proper age and though at first there was some fear that it might not fit in well, it has proved its usefulness and fills a long-felt and crying need, crying in a very literal sense sometimes.

The last addition is the dispensary, where Mrs. Sonobe, who is a trained nurse, looks after the simpler ailments of the children, especially the skin and catarrhal troubles so common among them. The mothers also come for treatment sometimes, and before long we hope that there will be a regular physician in attendance. Meanwhile, scales, instruments and other things are being gathered so that all will be ready when the man is found. In addition to this, Mrs. Sonobe acts as a general emergency nurse among the people of the district, and her field of operations is limited only by her strength and the shortness of the day, and by day we mean the twenty-four hour day, for often she has to spend the night with some suffering mother or child.

All this welfare work calls for some one to care for the spiritual side, a "religious work director", and this is where Mr. Sonobe comes in. He runs a Sunday School which now and then, on special occasions, threatens to overwhelm the building, but which he manages to keep down to an average of about seventy as the most efficient figure. Besides this, he has work among the young men of the district, many of whom have grown up out of this school. They meet on a week night, but often they like to drop in and sing with the children on Sunday morning. In the near future some of them will be baptized and thus become, so Mr. Sonobe hopes, material for Sunday-School teachers. They ought to be especially good for this work, for they can understand these children as no one else can.

Another duty that falls to Mr. Sonobe is the meeting and greeting of the almost constant stream of visitors from all over the country, who come to see the creche that has been held up to them as a model by social service workers and which has been the recipient, time and again, of praise and financial assistance from the Imperial Household and from the Government. Mrs. Sonobe is the the only woman member of the mayor's Social Service Committee of thirty-five, but she leaves all the rest of the public representation of the work to her husband. One wonders if he does not sometimes break one of the canons of Japanese etiquette by praising his own wife's work, but he has good reason to be proud of her. And besides, he never fails to make it plain to his visitors that the reason that the place is what it is, is because it is carried on in the spirit and for the sake of Him who said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me".—From The Church in Japan (Condensed).

Lenten Offering Fifty Years Olp

The Diocese in which the Lenten Offering originated is planning a nation-wide celebration of the fiftieth year of that Offering.

During the winter of 1877 Mr. John Marston, who was Superintendent of the Sunday School of St. John's Church, Cynwyd, a suburb of Philadelphia, suggested to the members of his school that they should give their offerings on the Sundays during Lent that year for the missionary work of the Church. The teachers and pupils gladly agreed to his suggestion, and the first Lenten Offering for Missions in that small suburban church in 1877 amounted to $200. Thus during the year 1927 we commemorate the Fiftieth Anniversary of the starting of "The Lenten Offering for Missions".

Other Sunday Schools in the Diocese of Pennsylvania followed the good example set by St. John's, especially that of the Holy Apostles, Philadelphia, of which Mr. George C. Thomas, well known throughout the Church as the treasurer for many years of the old Board of Missions, was superintendent; and next year, that is, in 1878, the Offering amounted to $7,070.50. Ever since that date the Sunday School of the Church of the Holy Apostles has held the first position among the Church Schools in its contributions to the Lenten Offering.

By degrees the plan spread to other dioceses and districts, and in the year 1900 the Lenten Offering reached the sum of just over $97,000. In 1920 it amounted to $250,000, and in 1925 it reached nearly $500,000.

During the last nine years the growth has been larger than in all the preceding years. Since 1917, the increase has been consistent and rapid, as can be seen in the following table:

1918	$196,084
1919	243,751
1920	250,000
1921	288,180
1922	290,000
1923	401,700
1924	452,118
1925	480,000
1926	491,091

Surely it ought to fill us with enthusiasm for this cause to realize that since the inauguration of the Lenten Offering for Missions the children and young people of the Church have contributed through this agency considerably over $6,500,000, nearly half of which has been given during the last ten years.

The Diocese of Pennsylvania has accepted, through its representatives, as its goal for the Lenten Offering of 1927 the sum suggested by the Bishop and the Diocesan Convention of $100,000, which is an increase of thirty-three per cent over its offering for 1926. How magnificent it would be if all the dioceses would seek to increase their Offering by a similar amount, and attain their goal!

However, amid all our rejoicing concerning the Lenten Offering, there is one great drawback—may we not call it an evil?—connected therewith which ought to be corrected; and we know of no better way of celebrating its semi-centennial than by removing this evil. We are informed by those who know that so many of the dioceses, districts, and parishes keep so large a proportion of the Lenten Offering for their own use that only a little more than half of what is contributed reaches the Church Missions House, New York, to be used for the purposes for which it is ostensibly given.

Surely it is wrong to use the missionary boxes, on which is printed that the contributions placed therein "are for the missionary work of the Church under the direction of the National Council", for any other purpose.

The National Semi-Centennial Service is to be held in the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, on Sunday, June 5, at 3 P. M., when the Rt. Rev. John G. Murray, D. D., the Presiding Bishop of the Church, has kindly promised to preside, and all the members of the National Council are asked to attend. It is hoped that a representative from each diocese and district of the American Church at home and abroad will be present. It is expected that there will be stirring missionary singing and pageants.

The National Council is gladly using its influence to make the commemoration of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Lenten Offering a thorough success by its being generally recognized through the Church, and has appointed the following as the committee to prepare for the Jubilee Celebration: The Rev. John W. Suter, Jr., the Rev. G. Warfield Hobbs, Dr. John W. Wood, the Rev. L. N. Caley, D. D., Mr. George W. Jacobs, Mrs. John Loman and the Rev. Frederick E. Seymour.—Rev. L. N. Caley, D. D., in The Spirit of Missions (Condensed).

The Great Commission

LAND NEEDED IN TOKYO.

The Church's Program for the present triennium contains, in the "Advance Work" section, an item of $40,000 for land, buildings and other equipment in the Japanese Diocese of Tokyo. Bishop Motoda desires to use that amount, as soon as it is available, to secure property in the growing Tokyo suburbs. Here the solid, substantial middle-class Japanese live. They are people to whom the Christian message make a most effective appeal.

Writing on December 13, Bishop Motoda tells me:

"Today I found a lot of two hundred and forty-four tsubo (about 8,800 square feet) for sale in Asagaya. I talked with the owner and asked him not to sell to any one else, but to hold it for two or three months for me. This land is fifty yen per tusubo (thirty-six square feet) and including the buying tax would cost about 12,500 yen. At present exchange, $6,200 gold. Asagaya is, as you remember, the first of the suburban churches I want to get started. Could you possibly find some one who would give this amount at once? I am very anxious to secure this land, since if I do not get this piece, there is no other good lot available. Besides, land prices are rising."

It is most important that the Mother Church here in the United States should help this young Japanese Diocese of Tokyo to secure equipment necessary for effective work.

Bishop Motoda is a graduate of our St. Paul's, Tokyo. He came to the United States, took a college course with distinction at Kenyon and was prepared for the ministry at the Philadelphia Divinity School.

I wish it were possible for me to cable him at once: "Buy Asagaya land." Will any one make it possible?

NEW BUILDING FOR ST. MARK'S, NENANA.

Miss Bessie Blacknall writes from St. Mark's Mission, Nenana, Alaska, in The Carolina Churchman:

"We are so excited and delighted over our new house, it is progressing right along. Mr. Nicholson (the builder) finished it, so that we could move in for Christmas.

"The building is all of logs and is going to be very pretty. It will be large enough to house the four women workers and about forty or fifty children. It will have one big room for dining room, as well as living room, a nice big kitchen and pantry, guest room, and chapel. The basement is under the whole house, and that will have the laundry, store-room, children's bath tub, etc.

"When the dormitory is finished and warm weather comes again, the new church will be built, and now we are carried away with gratitude, for Bishop Rowe has just written us that Mr. Letcher of Virginia wants to give a building in memory of his wife, so perhaps we are going to have a new school house to correspond with the other building.

"At last Alaska is going to have a school that the Church may be proud of. Certainly, we have struggled under the worst conditions for a long time, and this poor old house is almost tumbling down now. I don't think it could last until next summer."

TENTHS OF A CENT HELP TO COMPLETE HAITI'S QUOTA.

"Our quota is not a large sum in itself," writes Bishop Carson from Port au Prince, in a note accompanying the final payment on Haiti's quota, "but if you knew the economic condition and the real poverty of the people making the offering, its significance would be felt immediately. It has come in coins of the value of a fifth and even a tenth of a cent, and from all parts of the field. As the people are largely dependent upon their coffee in order to make this offering, and as this crop does not mature until fall, we seem to be slow in making our payments to your office. Our interest, however, is sustained throughout the year in everything that touches the work of the Church. The annual convocation of the District met January 10, and it gave me the greatest pleasure to tell them that again they have paid one hundred per cent of what was pledged a year ago."

A Correction: The first item in The Great Commission in our issue of January 15, was sent us by the Rt. Rev. John McKim, D. D., Missionary Bishop of North Tokyo, and not by the Rev. John Cole McKim, of Koriyama City, Japan.

Additional positive assurances or guarantees		20,500
Total pledged or assured		$1,293,573

Du Bose Men Lead Busy Lives.

The men of the Du Bose School, at Monteagle, Tennessee, are busy all the year round. The Du Bose men spend nine months in residence and three months in non-residence. During the non-resident period they put in practice what they have learned in the nine months' residence. On December 20, 1926, they left the mountain, going here and there to mision work in various Dioceses, where they will remain until March 20, when they will return to the school and resume class work. Reports will be given by those under whom they serve, telling of the character of their work. The non-resident period counts.

L.

The Peninsula School.

The Dioceses of Delaware and Easton, through a board of managers, have started preparations for the Peninsula Summer School of 1927.

Ocean City, Maryland, has again been chosen as the place and the time has been set June 26 to July 2.

This summer school is sponsored by the two Dioceses, and, at a recent meeting of its Board of Managers, the Bishop of Easton, the Rt. Rev. George W. Davenport, D. D., was elected President of the Summer School and the Bishop of Delaware, the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., was elected Chaplain. Other officers chosen were the Rev. Richard W. Trapnell, of Delaware, Vice President; the Rev. Charles L. Atwater, of Easton, Business Manager and Treasurer; the Rev. Henry N. Herndon, of Delaware, Secretary; and the Rev. H. V. Saunders, of Easton, Manager of the Book Sstore.

Information about the School may be obtained by addressing the Secretary, the Rev. Henry N. Herndon, 1108 Adams Street, Wilmington, Del.

TO THE CLERGY AND LAITY OF THE CHURCH.

In response to a request, I am sending this personal word at the opening of the Bishops' Crusade.

The whole Church has responded with fine enthusiasm to the call of the Crusade and while you read this message the Crusade will be in actual operation in every part of the country.

Three hundred bishops, priests, laymen and women will be carrying the message of the Crusade to at least two hundred cities and towns in the eighty-seven Dioceses of the United States.

These Crusaders are going with fine faith and courage and they are carrying a great message.

Are we ready for the message?

Are we satisfied to receive and hold the message for ourselves, or are we so clearing out the channels of our lives that the message may go through to others?

Please remember that the Crusade is not simply an enlistment of three hundred Crusaders, but an enlistment of every man, woman and child in the Church, not simply an enlistment for the Epiphany Season, 1927, but a renewal of our baptismal and confirmation vows that can mean nothing less than an enlistment for life.

God grant that the clergy and laity of our Church may so prepare and make ready the way that the Crusade may in deed and in truth bring a fresh realization of the Power of Christ in you and through you. Men and women need Him. He is ready and anxious to supply the need. Shall He not find a road to those needy ones through the channels of our consecrated and surrendered lives?

THOMAS C. DARST,
Chairman, National Commission on Evangelism.

The Crusade in Lynchburg a Wonderful Success.

The week beginning January 9 will long be remembered by the Episcopalians in Lynchburg as a most unusual period in the religious life of that city —the week of the Bishops' Crusade and the visit of the Rt. Rev. Theodore Irving Reese, D. D., of Southern Ohio, and the Rev. Robert F. Gibson, rector of Christ Church, Charlottesville, Va.

The congregations of the two Lynchburg Churches, St. John's and St. Paul's, cooperated in every way for the success of the movement and their efforts were abundantly rewarded. The attendance at conferences and mass meetings was so large that for the conferences it was necessary to use much larger assembly rooms than had been anticipated and at some of the evening services many persons were turned away on account of lack of room.

Holy Communion was celebrated each morning at 7:30, both in St. John's Church, of which the Rev. Thomas M. Browne is rector, and in St. Paul's, the Rev. Carleton Barnwell, rector. With this exception and the Sunday morning services, all the other services and conferences were held in St. Paul's Church and Parish House.

On Sunday morning Bishop Reese preached at St. John's on "A Religion That Cannot Be Shaken", and the Rev. Mr. Gibson was the preacher at St. Paul's.

At eleven A. M., from Monday to Friday, Bishop Reese conducted a class in Personal Religion; his subjects being: "Prayer," "Providence," "Religion and Health," "The Practice of Immortality."

The Rev. Mr. Gibson led a conference on each week day at four P. M.; the subjects of these being: "The Place of the Bible in Christian Living," "Prayer and the Devotional Life," "Personal Evangelism," "Combatting Worldliness Through Consistent Christian Living." On Friday this hour was given to a conference with the young people.

Bishop Reese preached at the mass meetings held each evening at eight o'clock from Sunday to Friday, inclusive, in St. Paul's Church. One would wish it were possible to give a synopsis of each of his sermons instead of just a list of the subjects: "Does God Mean Anything to You?" "Religion, the Determining Factor in Human Progress," "How Do I Know What Is Right?" "Faith, the Universal Need," "The Christian Way of Life," "Christian Fellowship," "The Church and the Kingdom." Rarely does a series of sermons create upon a community so profound an impression as did these of Bishop Reese.

On Friday evening ninety laymen assembled for supper in the parish house at which Bishop Reese and the Rev. Mr. Gibson were the guests of honor, and the Rev. Mr. Barnwell spoke on behalf of the members of St. Paul's Church and the Rev. Mr. Browne for those of St. John's. Colonel William King, Jr., a layman of St. Paul's, expressed, for the laymen of both parishes, the great profit they have derived from this mission, and the pleasure it has given them to offer their assistance, individually and collectively, toward the success of the undertaking.

Bishop Davenport and Mr. Hobson at Roanoke.

The Bishops' Crusade in Roanoke followed very closely the schedule outlined in the notes of last week. The Rt. Rev. George W. Davenport, D. D., Bishop of Easton, delivered a series of inspiring sermons at the mass meetings held each evening from Sunday to Friday, inclusive. He took as his general subject "The Kingdom of God as a Great Family" and in his addresses discussed the duties, responsibilities and privileges of Christians as members of that family; the identical spiritual obligations resting upon all men, whether members of the Church or not; and the reasons that should persuade those outside the Church to become identified with it and thus be enabled the more faithfully and successfully to fulfill those obligations.

The Rev. Jennings Wise Hobson, rector of Christ Church, Bluefield, W. Va., conducted clergy conferences in the mornings and congregational conferences in the afternoons. On Sunday afternoon Mr. Hobson addressed a mass meeting of young people in Christ Church and on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons similar meetings were addressed respectively by the Rev. Claudius P. Smith of Big Stone Gap, Va., and the Rev. John F. Coleman of Pulaski, Va.

The clergy and congregational conferences and the evening services were held in St. John's Church, the Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, rector. The Rev. G. Otis Mead, rector of Christ Church, has been a patient in the hospital for some time and was unable to take part in the Crusade. A special committee from his parish, however, led by Mr. D. Winfree Reed as Chairman, rendered every possible cooperation, while the choir of Christ Church alternated with that of St. John's in the evening mass meetings. Also the congregation of St. Peter's Church, Roanoke, the Rev. Alfred C. Bussingham, Deacon-in-Charge and the people of St. Paul's Church, Salem, Va., at present without a rector, attended the evening services and gave such assistance as was possible.

From Roanoke Bishop Davenport and the Rev. Mr. Hobson went to Staunton where, on Sunday, the sixteenth, they opened the Crusade in Trinity Church, the Rev. John J. Gravatt, Jr., rector. The congregation of Emmanuel Church, Staunton, and its rector, the Rev. J. Lewis Gibbs, are joining with Trinity in the mission.

The Rev. Edward W. Hughes, minister-in-charge of Christ Church at Pearisburg and assistant to the Rev. H. H. Young, Dean of Associate Missions, is critically ill in the hospital at Pearisburg. He has been devoting every energy and attention to the rebuilding of his church, which was burned last spring, and it is possible that he overestimated his physical strength. He has a host of friends in the Diocese who are trusting that his health may be restored.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishops' Crusade will get under way in the Diocese on January 23, at Wilmington, N. C., and will continue until February 11. In the beginning the movement will take the form of mass meetings to be held in central points as follows: Wilmington, Washington and Elizabeth City. The Crusaders are: the Rt. Rev. Theodore Dubose Bratton, D. D., Bishop of Mississippi; the Rt. Rev. Frederick Foote Johnson, Bishop of Missouri; the Rev. Pembroke W. Reed, Richmond, Va., and the Rev. H. F. Kloman, Cumberland, Maryland.

The Rev. W. O. Cone, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Goldsboro, N. C., finished his thirty-fifth year in the ministry last Advent Ember season. In recognition of this event, the Men's Club of the parish presented him with a purse of gold as a token of their affectionate appreciation.

As a token of their good-will and appreciation, the people of the Diocese of East Carolina presented a pectoral cross to their beloved Bishop, the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., upon the twelfth anniversary of his elevation to the episcopate.

The Rev. Robert Brent Drane, D. D., rector of St. Paul's, Edenton, N. C., who has been quite ill for several weeks in a Norfolk Hospital, is back home again, and is getting stronger every day. He is senior priest in the Diocese of East Carolina, and on last All Saints' Day celebrated his fiftieth anniversary in the ministry.

The Rev. H. D. Cone, rector of St. Paul's, Clinton, N. C., and Miss Tillie L. Spencer were married on December 26, 1926, in the Memorial Church, Baltimore, Maryland, the Rev. Dr. Page Dame officiating. After spending a week at Atlantic City, N. C., Mr. and Mrs. Cone returned to their home in Clinton.

The first service was held in St. Peter's Parish House, Washington, on December 26, 1926, which, when completed, will be one of the finest in this section.

The Bishops' Crusade Opens in Richmond.

The large City Auditorium was filled to capacity Sunday evening, January 16, when the Bishops' Crusade opened with a mass meeting of all the congregations of the Episcopal Churches of Richmond. The Local Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, under the leadership of C. Braxton Valentine, president, was in charge of the ushers and the collection of the offering. More than one hundred and fifty voices, from all the Episcopal choirs of Richmond, led in the singing of hymns, under the direction of Mr. Ernest Cosby, organist and choir director of All Saints' Church, with Mr. R. C. Hyde, of St. Mark's Church, at the piano.

The Rt. Rev. W. Cabell Brown, D. D., presided, assisted by the Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., rector of St. Mark's Church, and Chairman of the Diocesan Commission for the Crusade.

Dr. Larkin M. Glazebrook, of Washington, D. C., the first speaker of the evening, made an earnest plea for repentance and conversion, saying that: "If conversion does not mean falling passionately in love with Christ, it means nothing." A plea that persons be neither optimistic nor pessimistic in their views of the Church of today, was made by Very Rev. C. Wilmot Gateson, D. D., dean of the Pro-Cathedral of the Church of the Nativity, Bethlehem, Pa. "Be not an optimist," he said, "because an optimist is a person who says everything is all right in the world, so why worry and seek to make it better; do not make yourself a pessimist, because a pessimist is one who looks at the world, shakes his head and says all is lost, that the world could not be worse.

"Always see the room for improvement in religion, never feel that you have a hopeless task, but always have faith in Jesus Christ."

The Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop of Delaware, made the principal address of the evening, and in a most forceful speech pointed out that "the purpose of this Crusade is to level up the willingness of the people to follow Christ. Follow the Cross and renew your allegiance with Jesus that you might be saved."

A mass meeting of the young people of the Church was held Sunday afternoon, at St. James' Church, when brief talks were made by Bishop Cook and Dr. Gateson.

The Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., is preaching every night this week through Friday at 8 o'clock in Grace and Holy Trinity Church and the Very Rev. C. Wilmot Gateson, D. D., is the preacher at St. Paul's Church at the same hour and through the same period.

Each of the three "Crusaders" alternate in conducting the various conferences, which are being held daily during the week.

The conference held each morning at St. James' Church immediately following the celebration of the Holy Communion, is especially for the clergy and laity and is for the purpose of planning the follow-up preaching mission to be conducted in every parish in the diocese before the meeting of the Diocesan Council in May.

The daily services at one o'clock in St. Paul's Church are limited to half an hour, and are being held especially for young business men of the downtown district. These meetings are being sponsored by the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

Conferences for women are being held every morning at All Saints' Church, and for business women at one o'clock in St. Paul's Parish House.

Final Plans For The Crusade.

Final arrangements for the Bishops' Crusade in Washington have been completed and are as follows:

Mission Churches are: Church of the Epiphany, St. Mark's Church, St. Margaret's Church, St. John's Church (Georgetown), Emmanuel Church (Anacostia), and St. Luke's Church (Colored).

The Crusade will begin January 23 and continue through January 28.

The Crusaders, leaders of the conferences and preachers for this Diocese are: the Rt. Rev. G. W. Davenport, D. D., Bishop of Easton; Bishop Freeman, Bishop Darst, the Rev. F. G. Budlong, D. D., of Christ Church, Greenwich, Conn., the Rev. Charles E. Knickle, of St. Paul's Church, Watertown, Wis., the Rev. Dr. Robert K. Massie, Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, Ky., the Rev. Dr. F. L. Flinchbaugh, of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., the Rev. Herbert H. Young, of Bluefield, W. Va., the Rev. C. T. Warner, of St. Alban's Church, the Rev. L. B. Franck, of Anacostia, Mr. Leon C. Palmer, and Mrs. Samuel Thorne, of New York, and Miss Sallie C. Deane, of Virginia, for the Woman's Auxiliary.

Twentieth Anniversary of Cathedral Organist.

At the service of Evensong at the Washington Cathedral on the first Sunday after Epiphany, Canon William L. DeVries, D. D., announced to the congregation that the day marked the twentieth anniversary of the official connection of Mr. Edgar Priest with the Cathedral as organist. Canon DeVries paid tribute to the splendid work done continuously through this period of years and said that much of the measure of beauty and devotion of the services of the Cathedral have been due to the efficiency and faithfulness of Mr. Priest's work. Mr. Priest is an Englishman, and held the position of assistant organist at Manchester Cathedral prior to coming to this country in 1901, when he held Church positions in New York. His first organ in Washington was at St. Paul's Church, of which the rector at the time was the Rev. Alfred Harding, D. D., later Bishop of Washington.

Mr. Priest took over officially the work of the Cathedral in 1907 and has given continuous service there since that date. He is a recognized Church organist of high order, and is outstanding for his thoroughness and musicianship in the interpretation of Church music.

Christ Church, Georgetown, participated in the general exchange of ministers conducted by the Washington Federation of Churches on Sunday morning, January 16, and the preacher at Christ Church was the Rev. John Weidley, pastor of the Reformation Lutheran Church, on Capitol Hill. The Rev. J. H. W. Blake, rector emeritus of Christ Church, read the service. The Rev. E. Pinkney Wroth, rector of Christ Church, conducted the service and was the preacher at the Reformation Lutheran Church at the same hour.

The Crusade.

Bishop Freeman, of Washington, preached in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, and in Trinity Church at the noon hour each day, January 10 to 14. He also preached each night in St. James' Church. Bishop Manning, Dr. Frederick C. Morehouse, Editor of The Living Church, and others spoke at a mass meeting, which was well attended. The Crusade was also carried on in most other parts of the Diocese. There were explanations of the purposes of the Crusade, but there were also recitals of evils many and grievous. These evils were recounted, not alone by Bishop Crusade speakers, but by other preachers and speakers in New York Churches on the Sunday of the Crusade's opening, together making such dark picture as has seldom been held up to New York people.

Dr. Milton of North Carolina said the trouble is not intellectual atheism, but practical materialism. Bishop Manning scored Paris divorces, and hoped the time would come when American states will not recognize them.

The Bishops' Crusade.

Tentative plans looking forward to the inauguration of the Bishops' Crusade are being made by the committee in charge for this Diocese.

The opening service, to which all the clergy of the Diocese are expected to be present, will be held on Sunday cese. As outlined, the program is as follows for each day up to and including Friday:

Seven-thirty A. M., Holy Communion in all the churches; Noon, Intercessory service; two-thirty P. M., Conference on one of the other of the purposes of the Crusade, as Bible Reading; Prayer, Worship and Sacraments; Personal Evangelism and Worldliness; eight P. M., Mass meetings.

At sixty-thirty P. M. on Wednesday there will be a dinner for officers and teachers of Church Schools; on Thursday, Laymen's Conference in connection with annual dinner of Church Club, and on Friday for the Young People's Service League.

The Diocesan Council will, with the Auxiliary, hold its meetings in the forenoon, the afternoon and evenings being given up to the program of the Crusade.

Consecration of St. Luke's Church, Spray.

The beautiful new stone church recently erected by the congregation of St. Luke's, Spray, was consecrated by the Rt. Rev. J. B. Cheshire, D. D., on December 28. The preacher of the occasion was the Rev. James P. Burke, head of the Valle Crucis School for Girls, and a former associate of the rector of St. Luke's, the Rev. William J. Gordon. The completion of this church and its freedom from debt is the result of great faith and heroic self-sacrifice on the part of the rector and congregation, which is largely made up of workers in the cotton mills located at Spray.

Church Building Activities.

The projection and erection of parish houses in the Diocese is an indication of the healthy and vigorous life of the Church. The cornerstone of the parish house that is now under course of construction by Emmanuel Church, Sandhills Parish, Southern Pines, was laid on December 11, by the Rt. Rev. E. A. Penick, D. D. This is the first unit of a plant that will consist of church, parish house and rectory and which, when completed, will be one of the handsomest in the Diocese. Work has recently been started on the parish house of St. Saviour's Church, Raleigh, the gift of Mr. Ernest Haywood, a layman of Christ Church, Raleigh. This is the second unit of a handsome plant. Another parish house recently completed is that erected by Christ Church, Cleveland, one of the livest rural parishes in the Diocese. This was designed by the Rev. R. B. Owens, of Charlotte, a son of the parish, and much of the work done by the members of the congregation.

A destructive fire occurred at St. Agnes' Hospital for Negroes, affiliated with St. Augustine's School, Raleigh, on December 16. All of the patients were removed without loss of life, and much of the credit was given by the Raleigh fire chief to the heroic work of the nurses and the students of St. Augustine's.

In preparation for the Bishops' Crusade, three Quiet Days were held in North Carolina on December 29. The clergy of the Convocation of Raleigh met at St. Gabriel's, Selma. Bishop Cheshire celebrated the Holy Communion, and the Quiet Hour was conducted by the Rev. H. G. Lane. The clergy of the Convocation of Charlotte met at Grace Church, Lexington, and their meditations were led by the Rev. S. S. Bost, of St. Philip's, Durham. The Negro clergy met in Raleigh with Bishop Delaney.

UPPER SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, D. D. Bishop.

Meeting of The Woman's Auxiliary.

The Fifth Annual Convention of the Upper South Carolina Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary was held in the Church of Our Saviour, Rock Hill, January 12-13. The reports of the women in charge of the various phases of the work told of a year full of activity and efficient service. The reports of the District Chairmen showed that this plan of handling the work through the five districts is proving most effective.

The convention opened with a Quiet Hour on the night of January 10, conducted by the Rev. A. Rufus Morgan, Executive Secretary of the Diocese.

After the celebration of the Holy Communion on January 11, the President, Mrs. Joseph E. Hart, called the meeting to order. In her address later she gave a distinctly wholesome spiritual emphasis to the work of the Auxiliary. The Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay addressed the Convention, laying special emphasis on the Bishops' Crusade, which opens in the Diocese on January 30.

The Rev. Sumner Guerry, son of the Bishop of South Carolina, spoke of his work in China and brought a message of the splendid work being done by Miss Theodora Young, the latest missionary to go out from the Diocese.

At the Communion service a brass Alms Basin, a gift from China by Miss Alice Gregg, was consecrated by the Rev. T. T. Walsh. It will be used by the Auxiliary in connection with the United Thank Offering. Another missionary note was brought by the Rev. John B. Bentley, who spoke of the Church's work in Alaska. Mrs. J. W. C. Johnson, Secretary of Religious Education in the Diocese of Western North Carolina, spoke on the value of Summer Conferences at Valle Crucis.

Resolutions of regret at the death of Mrs. Ethel Martin were passed. Mrs. Martin was formerly United Thank Offering Custodian for the Auxiliary among the Negro women of the Diocese. She was also at the time of her death at the head of Fairwold School for delinquent Negro Girls, sponsored by the Negro women of the state.

Mrs. Jos. E. Hart, of York, was re-elected President for the coming year, Mrs. J. W. Arrington, Jr., of Greenville, was elected Secretary, and Mrs. Frank Henderson, of Aiken, Treasurer.

Delegates to the meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Province of Sewanee, which is to be held next fall in Columbus, Georgia, were elected as follows: Mrs. Jos. E. Hart, Mrs. K. G. Finlay, Mrs. W. Bedford Moore, Jr., Mrs. S. K. Oliver; alternates: Mrs. E. R. Lucas, Mrs. J. N. LeMaster, Mrs. P. M. Feltham and Mrs. W. H Ruff.

The next meeting of the Convention will be held in January, 1928, in Columbia

To Honor Bishop Finlay.

The new parish house planned for Holy Trinity, Clemson College, is to be erected in honor of the Rt. Rev. K. G. Finlay, according to the decision of the Parish House Committee, which met at Diocesan Headquarters January 12. The committee is composed of laymen from various sections of the two South Carolina Dioceses. Major W. B. Moore, of York, was elected general chairman of the committee, and plans were made to go forward with the work of procuring further funds for the building.

Bishop Finlay began his ministry at Holy Trinity Church and did a type of work with the boys of the college which commanded attention throughout the state. He also built up the work and added considerably to the material equipment.

The parish house, which is now being planned is intended to take care of the various phases of the Church's work among the college students. The whole Church plant is to be unified and renovated. The complete plan will call for the expenditure of about $23,000, of which amount about $7,000 has been secured in cash and pledges.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

The Beginning of The Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade in this Diocese began with a series of services in Christ Church, Macon, continuing from January 9 through January 15. The Rev. Z. B. T. Phillips, D. D., of Epiphany Church, Washington, D. C., and the Rev. James D. Gibson, rector of Trinity Church, Covington, Ky., were the Crusaders, and all the Macon parishes as well as at those in nearby towns joined in these services.

During the week of February 13 a similar meeting will be held for the Atlanta region by the Rt. Rev. Warren L. Rogers, Bishop Coadjutor of Ohio, in St. Luke's Church, Atlanta.

From these central places the Crusade will spread into the other parishes of the Diocese, conducted by both the clergy of the Diocese and selected Crusaders from elsewhere.

The Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., will go to Florida as a Crusader and several of the clergy will go outside the Diocese, among whom are the Rev. W. W. Memminger, the Rev. N. R. High Moor, and the Very Rev. Thomas H. Johnston, D. D., and the Rev. G. W. Gasque.

The Rev. Charles Mercer Hall, of Bridgeport, Conn., conducted a mission at Trinity Church, Columbus, beginning January 16.

The Executive Board of the Diocese met on January 5, and it was a gratifying announcement to the members, made by the Executive Secretary, the Rev. F. H. Harding, that all Diocesan obligations had been met and that the 1926 quota could be paid in full and that sufficient pledges had been received to justify the same expectation for 1927.

Holy Trinity, Decatur, the Rev. Chas. Holding, rector, has purchased a desirable lot in the residential section and has decided to build a modern parish house as the first unit in the building program. It is expected that ground will be broken at an early date and that the completion of this first unit will soon be realized.

A fine spirit of loyalty to the work of the National Church was manifested in the pledges made by the larger parishes of the Diocese for 1927. In spite of the fact that most of them were under heavy parochial obligations for advance work undertaken in the enlargement of their own parochial equipment there was no holding back and quotas assigned were pledged in full.

WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA.

The Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishops' Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade in this Diocese is being directed by a Commission appointed by the Bishop of the Diocese, consisting of the Rev. George Floyd Rogers, rector of Trinity Church, Asheville, Chairman: the Rev. Messrs. J. W. C. Johnson, Rudolph H. Schnorrenberg, Sanders R. Guignard, and S. B. Stroup. This commission, with the approval of Bishop Horner, has perfected the following organizations: A department of sixteen men, with Mr. William L. Balthis of Gastonia as Chairman, and Dr. Hartwell Cocke of Asheville, Vice-Chairman; a department of sixteen women, with Mrs. Fred W. Thomas, President of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese, as Chairman, and Mrs. J. W. C. Johnson of Gastonia as Vice-Chairman; and a department of younger communicants with Mr. Wadsworth Farnum, President of the Diocesan Young People's Service League as Chairman, and Miss Josephine Parker of Asheville as Vice-Chairman. Mr. Ben M. Jones of Asheville has been appointed Diocesan Treasurer for the Bishops' Crusade, and Mr. Frank L. Adolph of Hickory, Assistant Treasurer.

The Crusaders are: the Rt. Rev. W. T. Capers, D. D., Bishop of West Texas; the Rev. Richard W. Trapnell of Wilmington, Delaware; and Mrs. T. W. Bickett of Raleigh, N. C. The places of the Crusade are Trinity Church, Asheville, and the Church of the Ascension, Hickory, January 30 to February 4, and February 6 to February --, respectively.

The clergy in the Diocese are appointing parish committees, consisting of from three to five men and a corresponding number of women and younger people.

It is planned to have a week's presentation of the Crusade in St. Mathias' (Colored) Church, Asheville, and representativees from the five Colored churches in the Diocese will be present.

Old Church Honors General Lee.

A "Robert E. Lee Festival" was held in old Calvary Church, Fletcher, the Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, Jr., rector, Sunday afternoon, January 16, to commemorate the birthday of the great Southern leader. The Rev. Dr. Ashley Chappell, pastor of the Central Methodist Church, Asheville, occupied the pulpit and preached on "Robert E. Lee", and Professor Robert L. Madison, of the Cullowhee (N. C.) Normal School, whose father, Dr. Madison, attended General Lee during his last illness, spoke on his father's relations with Lee in Lexington, Va. Commanders and presidents of the various Confederate organizations in and about Asheville spoke and their chapters were represented by large delegations. The Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, who several years ago inaugurated this "Lee Festival", spoke briefly on General Lee and quoted from Edgar Lee Masters' "Lee; a Dramatic Poem". The old church was adorned with United States, North Carolina and Confederate battle flags and there were exhibited many pictures of Lee, including the rare and valuable portrait of Lee painted during the War Between the States and for which picture Lee himself sat in 1864 and which is now in the possession of Calvary Church. Interest was added to the occasion by the fact that during the War this church was used as barracks by the Confederate troops; that before this Church on the "Dixie Highway" stands the Lee Marker and here the rector has started an "Open Air Westminster Abbey of the South", which is being given nation-wide publicity.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Crusade Begins In Bethlehem Cathedral.

The Bishops' Crusade has started off auspiciously in the Pro-Cathedral of the Nativity, Bethlehem, under the leadership of the Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins and the Rev. Dr. Semmes. The clergy of the Convocation of Reading will be the guests of Nativity and Trinity Parish during such a part of the Crusade as they may wish to attend. St. Stephen's, Wilkes-Barre, has invited the Convocation of Scranton to be the guests of the parish for the week of the Crusade in that city. This gives every clergyman of the Diocese an opportunity to receive the inspiration of the mission as well as learning the best method of conducting a mission.

More than half of the clergy attended the conference on the Bishops' Crusade, which was held in St. Mark's Church, Mauch Chunk, on January 3. Bishop Cook, of Delaware, made a strong appeal to the clergy to acquaint themselves with this great movement and to carry out its objects in every parish and mission possible. On the same day was launched a campaign for the Bishop Ethelbert Talbot Chair of Biblical Learning in the Philadelphia Divinity School. The Diocese hopes to raise $100,000 to honor its Bishop in founding this Chair while he is still with them. For almost three score years the Bishop has been a member of the Board of Trustees and for more than twenty the Chairman of this Board.

The improvements and additions to the Church Home at Jonestown are almost completed. The new building is fire proof and approved by the State. The new boys' dormitory will easily accommodate sixteen new boys, and the committee already has applications for the new space.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop

Bishop and Clergy Confer.

A considerable group of the clergy met with the Bishop in St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral on January 7.

After devotions led by Bishop McCormick, the meeting resolved itself into a sort of Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Bishops' Crusade. Plans proposed at a previous conference had matured, and very considerable progress was shown.

The Bishop is to preach a mission in St. Paul's, Grand Rapids, and it is hoped to make the mission cover the city. Dean Jackson goes to St. Andrew's, Big Rapids, for a mission; the Rev. W. F. Tunks, of Muskegon, to the Good Shepherd, Allegan; the Rev. W. G. Studwell, of Battle Creek, to Holy Trinity, Manistee; Archdeacon Vercoe to Grace Church, Traverse City, and the Rev. Dr. J. E. Wilkinson to Grace Church, Holland. All these missions will be held in the week, January 23-30.

Altogether the conference was one of the most helpful and encouraging in the history of the Diocese.

Convention plans have also been changed. Usually the evening of the opening day of the Convention has been given over to a banquet with speakers from outside, and has been a big social event. This year the banquet will be omitted, and a great religious meeting in the interest of the Bishops' Crusade will be held in the Pro-Cathedral. Everything is being done to have all the city parishes join with the Convention in this service, and there is prospect of a very enthusiastic meeting.

SPRINGFIELD.

Rt. Rev. John C. White, D. D., Bishop.

The Crusade.

The Diocese of Springfield, under the leadership of its Chairman for the Bishops' Crusade, is actively planning for worth-while meetings over the Diocese. The Rev. R. Y. Barber, of Centralia, Chairman of the Diocesan Commission, is busy planning for the three Crusaders—the Rev. J. D. McLauchlan, D. D., of St. Mark's Church, Seattle; the Rev. Thomas F. Opie, D. D., of Burlington, N. C.; and the Rev. McVeigh Harrison, O. H. C., in strategic places throughout this large Diocese.

Work at Herrin.

The Diocese has just purchased a new piece of property with a bungalow on it, admirably suited for the congregation of St. John's Church, Herrin. With this better located property and with a new determination to make things go better than ever St. John's people are facing the New Year with renewed confidence.

Advent Offering: The boys and girls of the Diocese were challenged this year by the Bishop to make their Advent Offering a worthy one. It is to be devoted towards the cost of a new roof on the very old mission church building at Carlyle, one of the mission stations under the care of the Rev. R. Y. Barber.

The Diocese was saddened during the latter part of December by news of the death of the oldest son of Archdeacon Weller.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., Bishop.

Delaware's Banner Year.

The year just closed has been a banner year for the Diocese of Delaware in the amount raised for missionary purposes and the support of the work of the General Church. The Diocese has exceeded its gift for this purpose over any previous year by several thousand dollars. One reason for this is that the pledge of $15,000 for the deficit of the Church made by Bishop Cook at the General Convention was written into the regular budget and not raised by private subscription or appeal. Everybody worked hard on the increased amount asked, with the result that the quota to the General Church was paid in full; the Diocese maintained its missionary work more generously than ever before; the pledge to the deficit completely met and a safe balance left in the Diocesan Treasury to carry on the Diocesan activities.

ALBANY.

Rt. Rev. R. H. Nelson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. G. A. Oldham, D. D. Coadjutor.

Crusade Services at Saratoga Springs.

Special services in connection with the Bishops' Crusade were held at Bethesda Church, Saratoga Springs, the Rev. I. G. Rouillard, rector, from Sunday, January 9, through and concluding on Wednesday evening, January 12. The services at Bethesda Church were held parallel with services at the Cathedral of All Saints, Albany, and were arranged for the people of Bethesda Parish and all interested locally, as well as for Church people in the vicinity parishes nearer to Saratoga Springs than to Albany.

Participating as leaders in the conferences and services were the Rt. Rev. G. Ashton Oldham, D. D., a member of the National Commission, the Rev. John Henry Hopkins, D. D., rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Chicago, and the Rev. Charles E. Eder, A. M., rector of Grace Church, Mount Airy, Philadelphia.

ARIZONA.

Rt. Rev. Walter Mitchell, D. D., Bishop.

Crusade Meetings.

At the meeting of the Ministerial Union, held January 3, Dean Edwin S. Lane of Trinity Cathedral, told the assembled clergy of Phoenix, the details regarding the nation-wide movement of the Bishops' Crusade, in which Phoenix is to play its part during the week of January 17 to 21.

A special committee was appointed by the Ministerial Union to cooperate with Trinity Cathedral in this movement the committee consisting of Dr. Rule of the Presbyterian Church, Dr. Gray of the Methodist South, and Dr. Cochran of the Free Methodist. As a part of this cooperative movement, special services were held at noon on each of the day of the week of January 17 to 21 under the auspices of the Ministerial Union, at the Y. M. C. A.

Bishop Walter Mitchell is going to Northern Indiana, while Dean William A. Scarlett, formerly Dean of Trinity Cathedral, and now Dean of the Cathedral at St. Louis, is to Crusade in New Mexico.

Arizona will hear the Rt. Rev. Arthur W. Moulton, D. D., Bishop of Utah, and Archdeacon A. W. Noel Porter, of San Francisco, as the leaders of the Phoenix Crusade.

Immediately following the Phoenix meetings, a similar series of gatherings will be conducted in Flagstaff January 23 to 28. Upon the completion of these two series, the clergy of Arizona, who have attended one of the other groups of meetings, will carry their message to all parts of this state.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. H. L. Burleson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. B. Roberts, D. D., Suffragan.

Plan of the Bishops' Crusade.

The Crusade will be held at Calvary Cathedral, Sioux Falls, January 30 to February 4, and at St. Mark's Church, Aberdeen, February 6 to 11. The visiting missioners are: The Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., Bishop of Southwestern Virginia; the Rev. Carleton Barnwell, of Lynchburg, Va.; the Rev. Douglas Matthews, of Billings, Montana.

All the clergy of the White Field and the Crusaders of the Indian Field are invited to the Sioux Falls services. On Wednesday, February 2, a Conference of all the white clergy will be held with the National Crusaders, when matters of District interest will be discussed. Every man in the white field is expected to be present, at least during the Conference. The mission will be a training school for the District missions, which follow the Sioux Falls meetings.

The District's Showing for the Year.

In spite of the fact that 1926 was a year of unusual financial difficulties, records seem to indicate a small gain over 1925, and the apportionment for the General Church will be paid in full.

The Executive Secretary's office has received from three hundred and nine donors, the sum of $4,209.39 for Bishop Burleson's Tenth Anniversary Gift. This fund will be invested at once and the interest on it will be presented to the Bishop on each succeeding anniversary. Eventually it will become a part of the Episcopate Endowment Fund.

Miss Elizabeth Baker, of Sioux Falls, who has specialized in Religious Education and has been a teacher for two years in the Priory School at Honolulu, has been appointed full-time Secretary of the Department of Religious Education. Miss Baker is a graduate of All Saints' School and Mount Holyoke College. She began work on January 1, under the Director of the Department, the Rev. E. F. Siegfriedt. Headquarters of the Department will hereafter be located in Yankton.

Star Quest.

Lilla Vass Shepherd.

Wanderer Soul, fare on!
In quest thy Godliest part:
'Tis but thy timid gaze
Obstructs thee, longing heart!

Somewhere the Star stood still—
There, too, thy natal Goal:
Godward the light of love
Yet leads thee, captive soul!

"Come and See."

The greatest question that confronts thinkers and scholars in the field of religious experience today is the question: Who or what was Jesus Christ? Old as it is, it is comparatively new in the way it is being envisaged today. We know how the New Testament answers it, and we know how the Creeds answer it; but that answer is being challenged by the new knowledge. Two generations ago what earnest people of inquiring minds wanted to do was to get behind the Christ of dogma to the Christ of the Galilean days and discover if possible what He thought about Himself, and what those who knew Him best believed Him to be. Now the field of investigation has broadened. So immense are the contributions of historical and archaelogical research to our knowledge of the beginnings of Christianity that the Christology of the New Testament itself is now the main subject of discussion. The mystery of Jesus' self-consciousness remains as great as ever; we have not sufficient evidence to enable us to penetrate it, nor even the faculty for doing so. But we are on different ground when we come to ask what the men who loved and believed in Him right up to the end of His earthly ministry became convinced of in regard to His person and work.

There is no doubt about what that was. Our Lord's immediate disciples felt in Him the presence of something that exceeded the moral stature of ordinary humanity; they were conscious of the immediacy of something divine and holy, something quite like ordinary human nature and which was able to awaken in them a feeling of awe and reverence that had never before been elicited by anything human. This is not one whit more evident in the epistles than in the gospels, and no more really in the latest than in the earliest. The view of the person of Christ which resulted from this experience did not gradually come into existence as time went on and finally find expression in the creeds; it was there from the first. It was not a formulated doctrine, but a living experience.

The experience is still ours. It is more than merely subjective; it is the dynamic behind most of the idealism of the world, and without it there would be no redemptive energy worth naming in the common life of mankind. No one can ignore it and expect to get at the facts of what happened in Palestine long ago when a young teacher of lowly origin was crucified and a few days afterwards proclaimed as having risen from the dead and become the central hope of our poor sunken race. The men who said this were themselves the best proof of the truth of their testimony; they rose with it and upon it to a moral altitude they had never reached before.

A too rationalizing criticism of the Christian sources is apt to overlook the principle that we cannot rightly judge of the nature of anything merely by scrutinizing its beginnings; we must examine its outcome. A young University man consulted me recently about the foundation of our faith. His difficulty was that of accounting for Christ, or rather of accepting the Christian view of the significance of Christ, having regard to the unimpressive conditions of the Saviour's earthly lot. "Is it reasonable to suppose," he asked, "that a young artisan who spent most of his days in a mountain village in Galilee, who never reached the prime of life, and whose message was delivered in a few months nearly two thousand years ago, should be the world's ideal of what is good or that in Him should have dwelt all the fullness of the Godhead bodily?"

The same question was asked in substance when the marvellous ministry was being initiated: "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" And the answer to it is unchanged. It is: "Come and see."—Rev. J. T. Campbell.

Recollections of a Minister's Daughter.

Chapter Eight.

Anna Swan Reynolds.

Mr. Hall Caines' dscription in The Christian of Gloria Quaile's despair over her dressing in her young girlhood being dependent upon the numerous odd and bulky bundles that came from time to time from no-one knew where, to her at the parsonage, found a hearty response in my own heart. Once I was delegated to pack some mission boxes, and fell into disgrace with the ladies of the Guild because I rejected every thing in the pile of old clothes, and ended by holding up one pair of shoes as the only thing fit to go to a family in the western mountains—and those shoes were not mates!

To go back to the party that, alas! we felt that was not for us! Even the "little curate" fared better than we did, but he could not eat much—it would have been too dangerous in Father's clothes. Bob grew so desperate that he rubbed up against a plate of beautiful chocolate cake and it fortunately fell off the table, and in a moment we four were on "all fours", gathering up the joyful remains from under people's feet. My brother, Tom, who was one of the best-natured of our crowd, flew into a rage, and his big blue eyes were simply swimming in tears, when he saw a boy we all disliked take the last of a big dish of hot—red hot—cucumber pickles.

Well! The guests were entertained by my sister's piano music. My big brother gave a selection from Richard the Third, that made a great impression upon the Senior Warden's hired man.

Every one was welcome! The country belles and village beaux flirted to their heart's content; and made each other jealous.

My father no doubt made a sermon for himself upon love and peace in the human heart.

The vestry all got in a corner, as if they had not planned it before, and "made up" a purse and a well-concocted speech: and the "little curate" made the presentation "to our dear and revered rector and wife"; he spoke of the store-room "filled for the coming winter; of the plenteousness of the harvest and the orchard, and the good-will shown by the generous parishioners". Bob would mutter close to the "little curate's" ear: "There will not be a thing left if they don't stop stuffing right away." Whereupon the eloquent curate nearly met with a ghastly catastrophe, and one gentleman, who overheard Bob's remark, and who had only put a quarter of a dollar in the presentation plate, was so incensed that he certainly had a mind to ask it back, but fortunately the purse was in safekeeping in my father's pocket!

The Donation Party was over at last: the sleigh bells rang out a gay good night across the snow.

The Overcoming Life.

By adaptation plants conquer environment. Rooted to one place, and without free movement, adaptation is their sole hope. In the grip of circumstances none too kindly, they have to make the best of things. Where much cannot be had from nature, they have to conserve the little.

Many have to live in the teeth of the storm, in most exposed places—like the little alphine edelweiss. Others have to solve the problem of living in the midst of drought; and curious are the devices by which they conquer. One of the most singular features of the Campos of Central Brazil are groups of dwarfish-looking shrubs. Actually they are not shrubs, but shoots of buried trees, the upper branches of which lie on the ground like surface roots. Rather than surrender, they have changed their habits, and buried their trunks for protection. They have stooped to conquer drought and death.

Another tree—of the Angola desert—"lays on the sand two great leathery ribbons, its source of light and air and moisture. The closer it clings to the sand the more chance it has of sucking out such humid advantage as is possible for it." It grows, as one writer says, "never in height, but always in breadth".

This device of thickening the leaves is a common one in dry situations. The thrifty cactus knows that secret of storing moisture, as well as the other secret of protecting itself from prowlers who would steal its stores. Its leaves protect themselves by prickles. In some species, the leaves themselves turn into spines, and by its very necessity the plant becomes a mass of threatening.

The earth is full of plant adaptations of one kind or another. Of that necessity often comes beauty and variety.

The dainty fern fingers are just the way of their conquest. Living in the forest glade, the giant trees taking the light as their monopoly, they divide and subdivide their leaves, and spread themselves out to catch every wondering sunbeam. For fern fronds, like all other leaves, are just "traps for catching sunbeams".

Pine trees have needles in the place of ordinary leaves. They had to learn to live in regions of snow, and this was their device, lest by the accumulated weight of snow the trees should be broken.

Some plants have tendrils, that they may climb out into the light, like the hop and the honeysuckle.

Everywhere in nature is there conquest of environment. Through struggle has the conquest come. Through struggle, also, has come their individuality, their "character".

Plant histories are not without inspiration for human hearts—for struggle is the law of life for us as for them. The promise of life is to those who overcome. We also are in some grip of circumstance. Yet, however limited and handicapped, life may be a great and noble calling, and the place of our limitation may become the place of our triumph.—F. C. Hoggarth.

Advice to Candidates.

Fifty years ago the Rt. Rev. R. W. Barnwell Elliott, first missionary bishop of Western Texas, wrote from San Antonio to Dr. Twing, secretary of the Domestic Committee of the Board of Missions, on July 31, 1877:

"It was a sewing-machine, my dear Doctor, which, upon my late visitation to the frontier forts, gave me great searchings of heart.

"With a party of officers and their families, I left San Antonio on my way to Fort McKavett. We had a strong escort from the Tenth Infantry, very valuable always in establishing camp, as well as useful for protection.

"It was the sixth and last day's march that brought us to the last house you meet upon the new military road before reaching the fort, which is twenty-three miles further on. . .

"Here, I thought, is a man to whom nobody has come; he is far off; only outlaws and savages are beyond him. When the door is set open, however, there is a sewing-machine, just such an one as may be seen for sale or use in New York or Chicago.

"The sewing-machine agent has been before us. . . . For the percentages upon the sale of machines, these men in their little wagons scour the country, enduring every hardship and sometimes even death. What activity! How eagerly they hear of and set off to visit distant settlers, how they hang upon the borders and range up and down the Rio Grande. Indians, outlaws, Mexicans do not deter them; they have machines at so much per cent to sell!

"I do not think we need propose to ourselves such examples as Patteson sleeping beneath 'the long wash of Australasian seas', or MacKenzie in his humble grave beside the pestilential Zambesi. Not at all. Let us tell our Candidates for Orders to 'do as well as the sewing-machine men'."

Harmonies.

There are those
Who seek the beauty of wild mustard growing
In a field—and blowing—blowing.

They see the long
Black shadows of beeches etched upon the snow—
Silhouettes in a sunset glow!

Listening,
Hearing the song of falling leaves—a sighing
As of dryads softly crying.

Their souls, attuned,
Discern earth's color, beauty, melody—
Gifts for those who hear and see.

Do You Laugh at Your Children?

Lenora Bailey.

"If you please, Mother, may I please have some jelly on my toast, please," ceremoniously asked little Billy at the breakfast table.

It was an unusually long speech for him, but he was very much in earnest about it. Mary, Billy's cousin, giggled. Billy's big blue eyes opened wide in surprise, then filled with tears.

"Indeed you may, Son, here it is all nice and thick. Don't you think that fine?"

But the little fellow said nothing before he again turned to look across at Mary. She had in the meantime received a message from his mother's eyes and was also serious. So he finished his breakfast contentedly.

"Mary," said his mother after Billy had gone out to play, "you are preparing to be a teacher and I can give you a helpful suggestion. Never laugh at little children. Laugh with them but never at them."

"Why, Aunt Lenora? Will laughing hurt? What Billy said was very funny."

"It was, indeed, and we can have a good laugh about it now that he is not here. We should not do it before him. He was trying to learn to say 'please'. I may have some trouble now to get him to try again."

"We always laughed at William Bailey and Juanita when they did funny things. Mr. and Mrs. Edwards have the best time imaginable laughing at the mistakes of Dot and Eddie."

"I know all that but because of that very laughing, William Bailey is convinced he is slow to learn, which is not true, while by the same method you have made Juanita think she is extra brilliant, which she is not. You have handicapped your brother for years to come and started the little sister on a path that will result in many hard bumps before the conceit is taken out of her. Few people love a conceited child."

"What about the Edwards children, then?"

"You can plainly see the effect there in the way both children love to 'show off' continually. They are never satisfied unless they are the center of an admiring, laughing, applauding group. They make things disagreeable when they are not."

"Well, that is true, but I never thought about it before. Can we always keep from laughing?"

"Yes. It may be a little hard but when you remember how much is at stake you can exercise the proper amount of self-control."

"You think, then, that children are affected in one of two ways by older persons laughing at them. Either they are made very timid—sometimes morbidly shy—or they immediately begin to perform all sorts of ridiculous actions upon the slightest notice."

"Exactly right, Mary. Both are equally harmful. Children need to be watched carefully, but not laughed at. As I said before, laugh with them all you wish. There's a great difference."

Two Kings and Two Caves.

When the homeless Holy Family entered Egypt, the body of the young Pharaoh Tutankhamen had been lodged in the Valley of the Kings for some fourteen centuries. While those hidden royal caves guarded the treasures and mysteries of the haughtiest monarchs of the earth, the King of all kings was an exile, stripped of all, a wanderer in the desert. Wonderful indeed are the treasures of the tombs of the Pharaohs, but men have discovered long ago that the Treasure Cave of the world is not even the Cave of Luxor, but the Cave of Bethlehem. This year, as it so happened, it was at Epiphanytide that the golden coffin of Tutankhamen was removed from his royal tomb—a coffin weighing nearly one thousand pounds of solid gold—yet for some four thousand years it had been forgotten. It was a strange coincidence that this great mass of forgotten gold should be removed from the tomb of one king at that holy season when Christian children all the world over were remembering, as though it happened that day, the bringing in of gold and myrrh to another young King, who also once lived in Egypt. "Whose reign shall know no end."

So we think of two Kings and two Caves. Two Kings that were lost, and two Caves that were found. Those who hid the young Pharaoh determined that no grave-robber should ever find him; but the Holy Child, who hid Himself, knew that He could never be lost. And if we are just ordinary humble folk, and want to make up a story for ourselves out of all this, it means that if we lose our Lord we can find Him only where we lost Him; it also means that we can never lose Him as long as we go on looking for Him. If we are kings or notable, the story means this as well, that the king who tried to save himself was unsaved after all, while the King who seemed to lose everything gained the whole world.—J. A. B.

Nothing that science discloses goes contrary to those profound glimpses into man's destiny and the meaning of human life, that have been given to their fellows by those who have thought most worthily of man because they have lived closest to God, and especially to that estimate that was at once revealed, lived up to, and died for, by Jesus Christ.—Prof. J. Y. Simpson.

For the Young Folks

A Prayer in Verse.

Make me too brave to lie or be unkind,
Make me too understanding too to mind
The little hurts companions give and friends,
The careless hurts that no one quite intends.
Make me too thoughtful to hurt others so.
Help me to know
The inmost hearts of those for whom I care,
Their secret wishes, all the loads they bear,
That I may add my courage to their own.
May I make lonely folks feel less alone
And happier ones a little happier, yet
May I forget
What ought to be forgotten and recall
Unfailing all
That ought to be recalled, each kindly thing,
Forgetting what might sting.
To all upon my way
Day after day
Let me be joy, be hope. Let my life sing!

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

A Day in the Life of Jesus.

M. L. G.

One Sabbath Day Jesus went to the Synagogue in Capernaum, and taught the people His wonderful good news. In the synagogue was a poor man, filled with an evil spirit—sick in soul and body. Jesus commanded that spirit to leave the man; and it left him standing unhurt and cleansed, before all the congregation. Then Jesus went home to Peter's house, and there was Peter's wife's mother, tossing on her bed with "a great fever". He stood over her, this Doctor whose very word was medicine—and remember, children, that your own good doctor, who comes so readily, and works so hard to make you well, is walking in the steps of our Best Friend, and so is himself a good friend to you. He stood over her and took her hand. He spoke the word of healing, and Himself lifted her up, and she arose and went about her work. Perhaps her work was to prepare a meal for them all. She must have worked with eager joy and light step, and with a heart of praise for this young Man who was more than man, yet most human, too.

The news of these cures spread round about Capernaum; and as the day drew toward sunset, when the Sabbath would be over, the narrow street outside Peter's house was filled with people. All the little city was gathered there; the well had brought the sick, and when Jesus came out to them, He must have met a sad and painful sight. The lame, the blind, the leper, those whom evil ways had brought to misery, and those held by the strange unholy spirits, that might cry out against Him, but never failed to know Him—all were there. They pressed and crowded, they groaned and shrieked, they besought Him and demanded of Him; and His mercy was equal to all. Jesus did not heal by magic. It cost him in sympathy and pity, in the knowledge that strength went out of Him into them, more than we know. But before they went away in the darkening night He "laid His hands on every one of them and healed them".

At last all was done. The city lay quiet under the stars. The household slept, tired out with wonderment and joy. But He who had taken their infirmities and borne their sicknesses, rose up and made His way down the dim, crooked streets and into a "solitary place". Perhaps by the Sea of Galilee, perhaps on some hillside. It was not solitary to Him, for there as the night wore on and dawn brightened the East He found the day and strength for that to come, in prayer.

Seven Times Seven.

Linda-May came home, from school in tears. "I'm never goin' to forgive that horrid Tom Grant, never," she exclaimed. "Why, Linda, dear," said mamma, "I wouldn't say that".

"But he's so horrid, mamma, he put some nasty, slimy fishin' worms in an envelope and d'rected it to me, and put it on my desk, and I thought it was a note from Bessie, an'—an' I opened it, an' all the horrid things came crawlin' out all over me, ugh! I never, never will forgive him," she added.

"Linda-May's forgiven Tom lots of times," said Sadie staunchly. "When he put the frog in her desk and when he tied her hair to the chair back, an' other times, too."

"Yes," said Linda-May, "jus' heaps an' heaps of times, but I won't any more!"

"But, Linda," said mamma, "we must forgive, not seven times, but 'seventy times seven'."

Linda-May did not say anything, but she remembered just a few Sundays ago Miss Annie had had that very lesson at Sunday School. Oh, yes, Linda-May remembered, "but I just can't", she said to herself, "those nasty worms".

She did not speak to Tom the next day. Then came Saturday and at Sunday School, although Tom sat very near Linda-May, she did not look at him at all. "I'm not goin' to forgive those worms," she thought.

"Children," said Miss Annie, "we're trying very hard to raise some money to help a poor mission school up in the mountains, and I want my class to see if they cannot make a little in some way; it will be wonderful to feel you have made it yourselves."

The children were very much interested, Linda-May especially.

"I don't know however I'm goin' to make any," she said as they walked home. "Maybe I could rent out Lady Arabella; I could charge two cents an hour."

"Huh!" said Tom Grant, "who'd pay it?"

"Nobody's talkin' to you," said Linda-May.

But the next day Papa-doctor solved the problem.

"Linda-May," said he, "when I went to see Miss Andrews today—you know she's been ailin' a long time—well, she said the only thing she fancied in the way of food was mushrooms. Now in that pasture land of mine I noticed a lot and I know Miss Andrews would pay well for them, but you'd have to get up pretty early to gather them, Linda-May."

"Oh, I don't mind that," cried the little girl, "I'll begin tomorrow."

"And I'll go, too," said Sadie.

Sure enough, the two little girls were up bright and early. Miss Andrews was delighted. "Bring them to me every day," said she, "and when I tire of them I'll find you another customer." After the first day or two Linda-May found it very hard to get out of her warm bed, and Sadie gave up entirely. "I've got fifty cents," said she, "that's enough for one mountain child." But Linda-May did not think so.

Tom Grant's house was close to where the mushrooms grew. His mother was a widow, not well off, and Tom had to get up early and do a good deal to help every morning. He leaned over the fence and spoke to Linda-May; he even offered to help gather the mushrooms; but the little girl took no notice at all.

"All right, Miss Stuck-up," said Tom.

One morning two young men came along and stopped close to Linda-May.

"Oh, it's a little girl," said one of the men. "We want some bait; we are staying over at the hotel and we're going fishing, but little girls don't like to dig bait, do they?"

Linda-May shook her head. Then she thought of Tom. He had not been able to earn anything. She had heard him tell one of the boys he always had to do so much for his mother. But then she hadn't forgiven Tom—she never would.

"If you know any boy," said the young man, "I'd pay him a quarter, and there are some other little jobs I could give him."

Linda-May hesitated. All at once she thought, "not seven times but 'seventy times seven'." Perhaps Tom hadn't meant to be so mean, anyway—she pointed to the little cottage across the road.

"There's an awfully nice boy lives there," said she. "I'll call him."

And at school that day Linda-May found a chocolate mouse on her desk. She looked at Tom.

"I earned a whole dollar," said he, "but I liked you forgiv'n me, Linda-May, best of all."—Presbyterian Advocate.

The Catawampus.

Louis Tucker.

Once upon a time there was a cantankerous Catawampus who lived in the wildwoods of Arkansas, in a hole in the hill under a thicket of dogwood trees on the side of Buena Vista mountain. There is a town up one side of the mountain and a city in sight from the other, and two bridges across the river and a railroad on the bank and seventeen summer houses on the crest, and all the other wild animals were dead and gone long ago, except rabbits; but the Catawampus easily survived, because he lived on rabbits and, besides, he is invisible. Nobody can see him at all. If a dog smelled him it could follow his trail; but when the Catawampus jumps to one side the dog cannot find him.

Because all other wild animals are gone out of the woods there is nothing particular to do there, so the Catawampus comes into houses. He never broke anything, for he is as sure-footed as a wildcat; and he never stole anything because he lives exclusively on rabbits; and nobody ever saw him, because he is invisible; and nobody heard him, because he is perfectly silent. But you can easily tell when he is in the house, all the same, because the screen doors move without any one to move them and, one by one or all together, the children get angry.

The way I found out what he does is through Charlie. Charlie is six years old and very good indeed, except when he is awake; but the Catawampus would come and ride upon his shoulders, sometimes, when he was playing, and leap from child to child. I will not tell you what Charlie did, because, as long as you don't know it, it will not harm you. But it was something very sudden.

I will not tell you what I did either, except that I used a hairbrush; but the Catawampus suddenly left Charlie. So I began to study the subject. I found that Catawampuses have a horror of hairbrushes. They do not mind them on the bureau, but when in a grown person's hand they dislike them; and when the smooth side is slapped suddenly on a child, the Catawampus leaves that child.

I understand that the Catawampus is found in other parts of the country besides Arkansas. So, after Charlie reads this story carefully, I will get it printed; so that other children will learn how to get rid of Catawampuses.

Yourself.

Eugenie du Maurier Meredith.

If brought face to face with yourself,
You might not like yourself at all;
If you could not be friends with yourself,
Your pride would have a sad fall:

So why not be friends with yourself,
By guarding each thought, word and deed?
And so be worthwhile to yourself,
And your Maker, whose love you need.

You can be such friends with yourself,
With man, and the God who made you,
If you will be just with yourself,
And to God and your neighbor be true.

Take God's highest will for yourself;
For sorrow and joy are blended—
There is joy in life for yourself;
There is Heaven when this life is ended.

The House Mouse.

This little creature, tail and all, measures only a scant six inches, but when he takes it into his head to go pattering about the house, between the wainscoting and the plaster, on some winter night when all is still, one might conclude from the noise he makes that he must be as big as an ordinary house cat.

They can literally go all over the house in these hidden runways and never once be seen. In old houses they generally have their nests in snug corners where heavy timbers come together, the thick wood protecting them from the cold and giving them as comfortable quarters as they could wish. They are home-loving little folk and seldom put their feet outdoors unless compelled to go out for water, and then they are always in the greatest kind of hurry to get back where it is warm and cozy. They carry cotton and soft rags and make great big nests for the babies. Very young mice are no larger than big bluebottle flies; they are pink and so transparent that you can almost see right through them. But they grow pretty fast, and it is not long before they are small editions of their little mother and follow her down to the pantry for crumbs scattered about. A mouse's tail looks to be bare of hair, but if you look at it very closely you will see that it is covered with very short, silky hairs, just long enough to keep dampness from gathering. If it were not protected by this velvetlike coat, just imagine what a fix that tail would get into if the butter, the milk, the gravy, and all those kinds of sticky things through which it is dragged should stick to it! But the short hairs keep the tail nice and clean, no matter what its owner drags it over. The house mouse takes a lot of trouble in keeping its fur spick and span, and whenever it has a little spare time it washes its face with its paws just as you have seen a cat do. Now, a rat is different; he may wash his face, but you would never know it, and his hair is always hanging this way and that in the slouchiest manner.

Mice that live in very tall buildings probably never see the ground in the whole course of their lives, as they find food and drink in plenty right on their home floor. They sometimes choose the queerest places for their nests. The pockets of clothing hanging in closets, old coffeepots, empty bottles, and the back part of drawers that are seldom opened are favorite places to raise a family. At one time, a very long time ago, there were no mice anywhere except in Asia. From that distant land they have traveled with man, in oxcarts, on trains and vessels, and wherever he stopped and built a home the mice stopped, too, and went to housekeeping along with him. The first mice came to this country from England in the same ships that brought over our ancestors. They are friendly little folk and would find it hard to make a living if they did not have ready-made houses and pantries stored with good things offered them without rent or taxes.—Selected.

A Story About Little Handel.

I want to tell you about a little boy named George Handel who lived long ago in a country called Saxony. He was about six years old when this story begins, and of course, he liked to do all the things that a person of that size thinks are fun, but most of all, which was funny for such a little boy. he wanted to learn to play on the great pipe organ in the church. His father wouldn't hear to it because he thought music was silly, but his aunt liked to see boys have good times and made up her mind to help him.

There weren't any pianos then, but she gave him something like one, called a spinet. George had to keep it in the attic so his father wouldn't hear him play, and my, he had the grandest times up there.

One night he had a bad dream about his spinet and thought he'd have to get up and see if it was surely all right. It was dreadfully dark in the house, and there were creaking sounds and terrible shadows to scare him. Once he fell over something, and another time he bumped his head against the wall; but at last he found his precious little spinet and began softly touching its keys to hear their tinkly music.

Then, oh dear, there were heavy steps and a light flashed in his eyes. He didn't cry, he just sat still while his scared little backbone shivered and his father's deep thundering voice ordered him to bed. Even then he didn't stop playing for good; he really couldn't do that any more than a little joyful bird could possibly keep from singing.

Because he hoped that George would forget about his music, Mr. Handel decided to take him on a journey. They were going to the city of Weissenfels where the duke lived. Dukes, you know, are something like kings, and of course George was excited at the thought of seeing one. Besides, there were such lots of things on the way to see and ask questions about. Mr. Handel must have thought that his scheme would work; surely after this George wouldn't care about drumming on a stupid old spinet.

But, unluckily, there were court musicians at Weissenfels, and they made friends with the little boy who liked music so much. It was wonderful for George to ask them questions and listen to them play, and, wonder of wonders, they even let him play on a real pipe organ. Better still, they thought he did so well that they called the duke to listen.

At first George was so bashful that he wanted to run away, but when the organ began talking to him he forgot how he was feeling. He forget the big room and the grown-up musicians, yes, even the duke himself. He just let the organ talk on and on while his heart almost stopped to listen. When it was over the duke was speaking.

"Wonderful!" he was saying. "The child must have the best masters to be found in Germany."

And so George had his teachers. You can't disagree with a duke. He learned to play, oh, very well indeed. He even wrote music of his own by and by, some of the very most beautiful in the world. He took Bible stories and made up music for them. These oratorios, as they are called, came to be very famous, and the one that is the greatest of them all is the one that is called "The Messiah".—Christian Observer.

The Holiness of Beauty.

"Oh, Thou, Who gavest me eyes to see
And love this scene so fair,
Give me a heart to find out Thee,
And read Thee everywhere."

This simple, fervent prayer is carved on a pillar of stone erected by some devout soul on a mountain top in the beautiful lake district of Northwest England. Below, like a broken piece of lapis lazuli set among emeralds, lies Windermere, that lovely winding lake so dear to the hearts of English poets and many American visitors. Looking down upon the lovely water with its tiny islets richly green, and the wooded hills that cluster about its shores, looking beyond at a wilderness of huddling hills rolling away, a sea of beauty, lost at last in a purple haze. one well understands the mood of the worshipper who set up the carven stone.—Christian Observer.

It is in our best moments we most feel like praising God. Mere formal expressions of praise, the outcome of heeding a commandment, are of no value to God and of no use to us. When the heart exults the tongue is eager for praise to Him who alone is worthy. God does not demand our praise; He wins it. When His love and goodness are realized the heart breaks forth into singing as a bird in sunshine. Pagan nations are notoriously lacking in joyful songs but the Christian exclaims, "How can I keep from singing".—B. T. Badley.

Deaths

LANE: Entered into life eternal on Sunday morning, November 21, 1926, ELLEN RANDOLPH TABB, beloved wife of the late Dr. Thomas B. Lane, Port Haywood, Mathews County, Va. Mrs. Lane left four children: Mary Randolph Lane and G. E. T. Lane, of Mathews County; Thom B. Lane, of Norfolk, and the Rev. Henry G. Lane, of Raleigh, N. C.

MRS. JOHN THOMAS FOSTER.

Ill two weeks with pneuomnia, at Epiphany, in Trinity Rectory, Van Buren, Ark., entered into the joy of her Lord, CARRIE EAST FOSTER, beloved wife of Rev. John Thomas Foster, rector of the parish. Her body rests among the people she loved, in devotion to the parish duties she shared. Her soul is with Jesus.

MRS. MARY W. deROSSET.

Died January 10, 1927, MRS. MARY W. (GREEN) deROSSET, widow of the late Rev. Frederick Ancrum deRosset, at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Frank S. Clark, Brighton, Mass, aged sixty-eight. Born in Jackson, Miss., February 2, 1859.

Mrs. deRosset is a granddaughter of the late Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green, first Bishop of Mississippi, at whose home, "Kendal", in Sewanee, Tenn., Mrs. deRosset, was reared in her childhood. She leaves a mother, Mrs. Ella P. Green, of Sewanee, Tenn., and five children, and three grandchildren and one brother, Otey Folk Green. The children are Mr. William G. deRosset, Worcester, Mass.; Mrs. Frank S. Clark, Brighton, Mass.; Mr. Armand J. deRosset, Newark, N. J.; Mrs. Ludlow P. Strong, New York City, and Miss Fanny B. deRosset, New York City.

Interment in Sewanee, Tenn.

FREDERICK KINLOCH PAGE.

Whereas, on Wednesday night, December 15, at 8:30 P. M., in this year 1926, at his home, "Millwood", near Cobham, it pleased Almighty God to take from this earth, through sudden heart failure, the soul of our beloved fellow-laborer, FREDERICK KINLOCH PAGE, in the seventieth year of his age. We, the vestry of Grace Church, Walker's Parish, Albemarle County, Va., in special meeting assembled, do hereby resolve to place upon our records this tribute to his memory:

He was a member of our vestry for forty-five years; he served at times as our secretary and treasurer; was our secretary at the time of his death, and for thirteen years has been our senior warden. He was thoroughly imbued with the best traditions of the Episcopal Church; an attendant upon and faithful participator in every service; he seldom missed a vestry meeting, and his counsel was always listened to attentively, and generally followed; he was unfailingly the sympathetic friend of the minister of the parish.

We resolve that in the death of Frederick Kinloch Page we have lost one who diffused among us the spirit of love and peace.

Be it ordered that a copy of these resolutions be sent to his immediate family and to the Southern Churchman for publication.

For the vestry,
E. H. JOSLIN,
Secretary Pro Tem.

Cismont, Va., Jan. 9, 1927.

MRS. KENSEY J. HAMMOND.

Resolutions.

At a meeting of the Ladies' Aid of St. Stephen's Church, Culpeper, Va., held on January 13, 1927, the following resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort has released from illness the frail body of His servant, MRS. CARRIE MACHEN HAMMOND, wife of Rev. Dr. Kensey Johns Hammond, and received into His heavenly home her loyal soul, we, sorrowing in our loss, but rejoicing in her gain, do hereby Resolve. 1. That in the death of Mrs. Hammond our church and society has lost a faithful and devoted member, and each one of us an understanding and sympathetic friend, whose place none other can fill.

2. That we thank God for the example of her beautiful life, which will ever stand as an inspiration to us, and cause us to dedicate ourselves anew to all work of the church.

3. That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon our minutes, be sent to her family, and be published in the Southern Churchman and both town papers.

MRS. W. W. CHELF,
MRS. H. B. LEE,
MRS. BYRD LEAVELL,
Committee.

MISS FRANCES C. COX.

On Sunday, December 26, MISS FRANCES C. COX passed from this earth to dwell with Him who is invisible. No words could better describe her life than these once spoken of our Master, for, truly like Him, she "went about doing good". It was while on an errand of mercy that she met with the accident that caused her death. She had spent a very busy Christmas Day worshipping in God's house and carrying joy to all around her. As evening approached she started out again, in spite of bad weather, and the protests of her family, to take one more message of cheer to a sad and lonely soul. On this journey she was struck by an automobile, and never regaining consciousness in this life, entered early the next morning "into the joy of her Lord". She died as she had lived, in active service. In her going the mountain work has lost one of its best friends and most untiring workers. In spite of her busy life in office, home and church, she always remembered this needy field, and lost no opportunity of interesting others in the work. Her bright, cheerful disposition, her sound judgment and her broad sympathy made for herself a large circle of friends who will miss her greatly, but none more than her friends in the mountains. May God bless this world with others like her!

W. R. MASON.

MRS. ELLEN RANDOLPH TABB LANE.

On the morning of Sunday, November 21, 1926, just as the bells were ringing the hour for service, there entered into her Father's courts, from her home, "Woodstock", Mathews County, Va., in the eighty-second year of her age, the soul of ELLEN RANDOLPH TABB LANE, oldest and last surviving child of the late George Edward Tabb and Mary Harrison Randolph, and wife of the late Dr. Thomas B. Lane (C. S. A.). In the passing of this beautiful life we are forcibly reminded that the dread Archer "loves a shining mark". Born and reared in a home of culture and refinement, where "duty" was ever the watchword, she inherited to an unusual degree the finer traits of life, and brought forth unstintingly the fruits of the Spirit. A zealous Episcopalian, a true Southerner, she was loyal to the teachings of her Church and to the traditions of the old Southland. Her life was one of retirement, but she made her "little corner" blossom for God. It was in her home, with the "children who rise up and call her blessed", that she most shone. The last years of her life were years of great physical weakness, but she accepted the sorrows of this mortal life as from a Father's hand, forgetting in her thought for others the cross she bore and the rod that pressed so sorely upon her patience, her courtesy, her never-failing faith, were the wonder of all who were privileged to be with her. She met the King of Terrors with calmness, her last words being, "Underneath are the everlasting arms", and in the fulness of a certain hope she fell asleep in those arms.

She leaves to mourn their loss one daughter, Miss Mary Randolph Lane, and three sons, G. E. T. Lane, of Mathews County; Thomas B. Lane, Jr., of Norfolk, and Henry Gardiner Lane, at present rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Raleigh, N. C.

On Monday, November 22, with the long rays of the setting sun falling caressingly upon her flower-covered casket (Rev. Giles B. Cooke and Rev. William B. Lee, Sr., former pastors, officiating), amid a crowd of sorrowing friends and neighbors, who loved her and whom she loved, to the strains of "Hark! hark! my soul, angelic songs are swelling", she was laid to rest, almost under the shadow of the church she loved so well, to await the summons, "Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world".

"Rest comes at length, though life be long and dreary,
The day must dawn, and darksome night be past;
Faith's journeys end in welcome to the weary,
And heaven, the heart's true home, will come at last."

Personal Notes

The Rev. Sidney E. Matthews has resigned his parish in Hyde County, Diocese of East Carolina, and has taken charge of work at Erwin and other points in the Diocese of North Carolina.

The Rev. Roland J. Moncure, formerly minister in charge of Holy Communion Mission, Plaquemine, La., entered upon his work as rector of St. Paul's Church, Salem, Va., on January 1.

The Rev. Lewis B. Whittemore, rector of Trinity Church, Detroit, Mich., since December, 1923, has accepted a call to become rector of Grace Church, Grand Rapids, Michigan, left vacant by the resignation of the Rev. G. P. T. Sargent, who has become Dean of the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Long Island. Mr. Whittemore is a member of the Department of Religious Education of the National Council, and Chairman of that Department for the Province of the Mid-West. He is also Chairman of the Commission on Week-Day Church Schools of the Diocese of Michigan. The change became effective January 15.

The Rev. H. G. England, of the Diocese of Harrisburg, formerly minister-in-charge of the Lumberton Field, recently accepted a call to Emmuanuel Church, Farmville, N. C., and St. Barnabas' Church, Snow Hill, N. C.

The Rev. Ben R. Roller, of Keyser, W. Va., has accepted a call to take charge of Emmanuel Mission, and to assist the Rev. John S. Douglas, rector of St. Andrew's Church, both of Louisville, Ky. His address is 4536 South Sixth Street, Louisville, Ky.

The Rev. Francis B. Creamer, formerly minister-in-charge of St. John's Church, Huntingdon, Pennsylvania, has been appointed assistant-minister at Christ Church, Detroit, Michigan, and has entered upon his new duties.

The address of the Rev. George E. Zachary is changed from Griffin, Georgia, to the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, Baltimore, Md.

The Rev. S. Ezra Neikirk, editor of the Bethlehem Churchman, has kindly consented to take charge of St. Peter's Church, Tunkhannock, Pa., until Trinity Church, West Pittston, elects a new rector.

The Rev. T. F. Wright, formerly locum tenens at St. John's, Bedford, Ontario, and assistant at All Saints', Windsor, Ontario, has been appointed to assist the Rev. H. J. Pearson at the City Mission, Detroit. His new work began January 1.

The address of the Rev. Reuben Meredith is changed from Alta Vista, Va., to Oxford, N. C., where he has taken charge of St. Stephen's Church.

The address of the Rev. A. M. Forsythe is changed from Macon, Ga., to 923 Gaines Street, Little Rock, Ark.

ORDINATIONS.

On Tuesday, January 4, in St. Clement's Church, St. Paul, the Bishop of Minnesota ordained Mr. Walter B. Keitter to the diaconate. The candidate was presented by the Rev. A. G. Pinkham, and the sermon was preached by Bishop McElwain.

In the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, on Thursday, December 16, Bishop Manning ordained to the diaconate Francis Slade Donzall, presented by the Rev. Thomas McCandless, and advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Asa Stanley Goodrich, and the Rev. Samuel William Briscoe, presented by the Rev. Walter F. Hoffman. The Rev. Milo Hudson Gates, D. D., preached the sermon and united with the Dean, the presentor, and the presenters in the laying on of hands.

DEATHS.

The Rev. Lewis Cass Birch non-parochial priest of Dallas, Texas, died January 1, at the Elks' National Home, Bedford, Va., after an illness of ten days from chronic bronchitis. The remains were taken to Dallas for interment.

The Rev. Alfred William Treen, until recently curate at Old Trinity Church, New York, died of heart disease while on a visit to the Bahama Islands on New Year's Day, according to word received in New York.

Funeral services were conducted in Christ Church Cathedral, Nassau, by the Dean, assisted by the Rev. Canon George, rector of St. Agnes'. There were also present the Rev. F. J. Blofeld, of St. Mary's, the Rev. R. W. Ferrier, of St. Matthew's, the Rev. P. L. Hesketh, of St. Anne's, and the Rev. Arthur Senior, curate of St. Agnes'.

The Rev. Richard Whitehouse, missionary of Western Montana, and rector of St. Paul's Church, Hamilton, Mont., died December 28, 1926, at his home.

The Rev. Brian C. Roberts, rector of Holy Trinity Church, Marlborough, Mass., passed away on the evening of Friday, December 17, after a long illness.

The Rev. William I. Magill, non-parochial priest of the Diocese of Connecticut, died in Port Chester, New York, December 1, 1926.

THE PARABLES OF SAFED THE SAGE.

The Parable of the Collarless Dog.

The little sister of the daughter of the daughter of Keturah came unto me, and she brought with her a Forlorn Looking Pup.

And she said, Grandpa, this little Dog is lost, and he can not find his way Home.

And I said, Why dost thou think that he is lost?

And she said, He has no Collar and no Brass Plate with the name of the People who own him, or the street where they live, and how can he know his way home?

Now that was the first time it had occurred to me that the Information graven on the Brass Plate on the Collar of a Dog was intended for the Perusal of the Dog. But I very soon got her Idea.

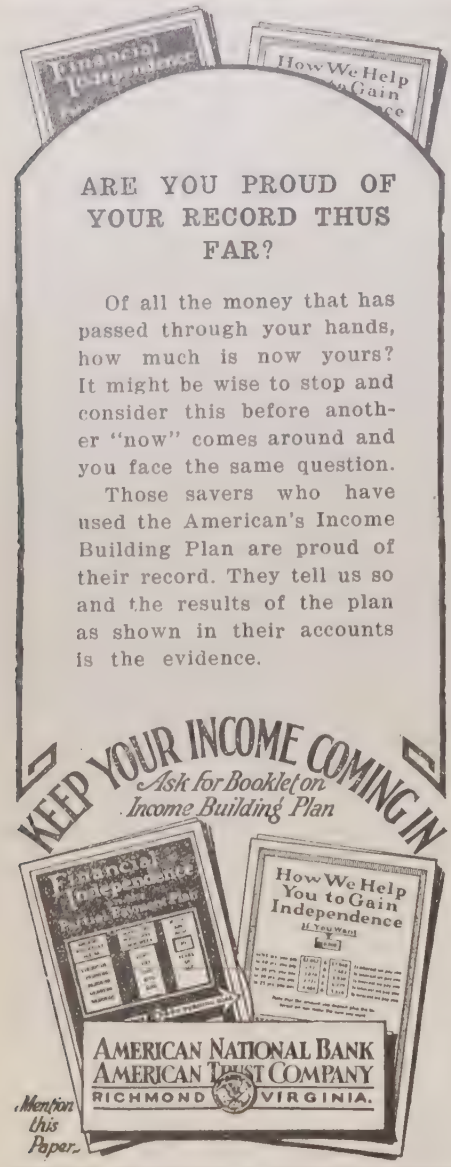
And she said, We must not let him wander away and get lost. We must find where his Home is. For the poor Little Dog can not know. He has no Collar with a Brass Plate to tell him where to go.

And I said, I will put on my Hat, and walk abroad with thee, and the Little Dog shall go with us, and we will see if we can find his Home. So we walked abroad, and she was fearful lest we should lose the Dog and I was fearful lest we should not. But it came to pass in time that we found a Small Boy that was hunting for his Dog, and he and the Dog knew each other, and we left them together and came away.

And the little sister of the daughter of the daughter of Keturah felt that she had enabled her grandfather to do a Good Deed, and he agreed with her.

And I considered how many folk there be who are like that Little Dog, for they wander about Aimlessly, and with no indication whose they are or where they are going. And that is unfortunate. For this is a lonely world for those who know not Whose they are nor Whom they serve. And I should like to find such-like men and women, and say unto them, Why wander ye homeless and nameless? Verily, it should not be thus. For there is a Father God, in whom the Whole Family in Heaven and on Earth is named, and His is the Name ye should bear, and His the Home ye should seek.—Exchange.

The Practice of Prayer.



1 Thessalonians 5:17—"Pray without ceasing."

Prayer is not intended to change God's heart. He is the same yesterday and today and forever. God is Love in the first age and in the last. Prayer teaches us to accept God's promises. With our imperfect sight we trust in the unchanging love of the everlasting Father.

Prayer is the pleading of Faith—the ultimate demand that religion makes upon us. To Jesus it was a motive, a plan, and an instrument of victory, and Paul learning from his Master made it his constant practice. The same spirit permeates Luke 18:1, Matthew 9:38, and Romans 15:3. Paul writes in this manner continually as in Ephesians 6:18, Philippians 4:6, and 1 Thessalonians 5:17.

The Church has recognized the urgency of prayer. Spurgeon said, "Prayer pulls the ropes below and the great bell rings above in the ears of God". Landor said, "Solitude is the audience chamber of God". St. Ambrose said, "Prayer is the wing wherewith the soul flies to heaven and meditation the eye wherewith we see God". Novalis wrote that prayer is to religion what thinking is to philosophy. To pray freely is to make religion. St. Augustine said, "He that loveth much prayeth much". Martin Luther expressed the truth in his forcible manner: "The Church converteth the whole world by blood and prayer." Think of the hymns of the Church written in praise of prayer. It is "the soul's sincere desire" and "the Christian's vital breath". One can account for the Apostle Paul's earnestness by thinking of such words from the pens of the world's religious leaders. Such earnestness we all need.—Exchange.

The Dear Old Apple Tree.

It braved the winter's bitter blasts,
And burst in bloom in May;
And mingled perfumed petal leaves
With fragrant new-mown hay.

Through summer heat it swelled its buds
With juices rich and fine,
Distilled from soil and showers and dew,
And mixed with spicy wine.

Its fruit grew golden in the sun,
And, dipped in crimson dyes,
Caught tints from rainbows, flowery fields,
And painted butterflies.

It loads the table with a wealth
Of sugared savory food;
Then melts to sweetness in the mouth,
And turns to rosy blood.

At winter eve, around the hearth,
And in the fireside glow,
Its cheeks burn with the bloom of June,
And summer perfumes blow.

The pine and palm wave their tall plumes
With secret pride and glee;
But we love best, with fullest joy,
The dear old apple tree.

Girls In Palestine.

The English High School for Girls, at Haifa, Palestine, is attended by Moslems and Jews and Bahai, together with Armenian, English and Greek Orthodox Christians. The school believes that all forms of education should rest on the solid foundation of religion. Scripture is given first place in the school curriculum. The rule is that all must assemble in the early morning to ask God's blessing on the work of the day. Those who are not Christians are not forced to repeat words which they do not believe, but they must at least adopt a reverent attitude and pray silently if they do not wish to join in the Christian prayers. They must also listen to and take part in the Scripture lessons which are given daily.

No member of the staff and no pupil is ever allowed to speak disparagingly of the faith of another. "We neither coerce nor persuade our pupils to change their faith," writes the principal, "but feel it is enough to teach the tenets of the Church of England and leave the rest to God."

Parents expect a great deal from this school. "Have I not already paid fifty piastres (ten shillings) for Hannah's education," said an irate Arabic father one morning, "and have I not told you that all this money was not spent only that my daughter may be clever in history and geography, but that she should learn first of all to be a good girl? How can you defend yourself, for Hannah has already been two weeks in your school and yet she is still a little she-Satan at home."

"We cannot show others the best path if we walk in a lower one ourselves."

Christ In India.

An English clergyman from Bombay tells of the Hindu University of Berares inviting a Christian lecturer to address its members on the subject of "Christ", and of a Hindu National Congress obviously permeated with the Spirit of Christ "where ten years ago the mention of His Name in either case would have led to hissing". A bishop visiting Calcutta, looking at first in vain for any evidence of missionary work in the midst of the great mass of heathenism in that city, was told nevertheless that "Christ has no rival in Calcutta".

Let but one little spark divine,
Leap from Thy heart, O God, to mine,
And kindle there a flame so white,
That they who know may see the light.

A lambent flame of purity,
Which glows, and burns, a fire divine,
Within this frail abode of Thine.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Yet sure the babe is in the cradle blest,
Since God Himself a Baby deigned to be.
—Coleridge.

One of our highest privileges of manhood is the privilege of not touching what may harm us.—H. Clay Trumbull.

As one learns the art of conversing with God he will find himself quite willing to hear what his servants have to say.

The quality of the service is the measure of the result. It is not length of service, but intensity, sincerity, enthusiasm that tells.—R. J. Campbell.

Nobody goes to Heaven by sleeping. No man becomes a vigorous Christian by any other course than "giving all diligence".—Alexander Maclaren.

Temptation is the tempter looking through the keyhole into the room where you are living; sin is your drawing back the bolt and making it possible for him to enter.—J. Wilbur Chapman.

The more we know of the world, the more doubtfully we ask, "Can such a world be saved?" And the more we know of Christian nations, the more we incredulously ask, "Can these be the Saviour's?" But the more we know of Christ's Cross for ourselves, the less we can believe that any soul is outside its destined range.—P. T. Forsyth.

Nay, never falter, no great deed is done
By falterers who ask for certainty.
No good is certain but the steadfast mind,
The undivided will to seek the good;
'Tis that compels the elements and wings
A human music from the indifferent air.
The greatest gift a hero leaves his race
Is to have been a hero.
—George Elliott.

It does not make much difference where we are: the main thing is what we are and what we are doing with what we have. Philip was suddenly transferred from a city revival to Gaza, "which is desert", but in that desert he won the most splendid convert of his ministry. We are just as close to the burning core of the globe and as near the stars in the humblest place as in the greatest city. "Act well thy part: there all the honor lies."

Children are the salvation of the race. They purify, they elevate, they stir, they instruct, they console, they reconcile, they gladden us. They are the ozone of human life, inspiring us with hope, rousing us to wholesome sacrifice. If, in the faults which they inherit, they show us the worst of ourselves, and so move us to a salutary repentance, they also stimulate our finer qualities; they cheat us of weary care; they preach to us, not so much by their lips, as by their innocence; their questions set us to thinking, and to better purposes than the syllogisms of philosophers; their helplessness makes us tender; their loveliness surprises us into pure joy.—Bishop of Rochester.

EDITORIALS

Vol. 92. RICHMOND, VA., JANUARY 29, 1927. No. 5.

CHRISTIAN PROGRESS

A CONGREGATION OF A THOUSAND EPISCOPALIANS greeted the Crusaders in the City Auditorium of Richmond, Va., on Sunday, January 16, at eight o'clock in the evening.

A startled traffic "cop" is reported to have said the next day, "Why, the Episcopalians swarmed around the Auditorium just like Baptists". Nor was this just a mere surface enthusiasm that brought them out simply for one big service, but throughout the week, both day and night meetings were so largely attended that two of the biggest churches were filled each night with earnest congregations, receiving attentively the inspiring messages of Bishop Cook (of Delaware), Dean Gateson (of Bethlehem) and Dr. Glazebrooke (of Washington).

The religious press of the country is giving editorial attention to this effort of our Church, and, whether we like it or not, we are on trial before the country to see if the power of Episcopalians will respond to the call of our leaders. There are wonderful possibilities in this movement, and it rests with the laity of the Church whether they will be realized, or result only in wasted energy.

ARBITRATION OF THE MEXICAN DISPUTE is the Christian, as well as the sensible solution of that existing problem. There was a time, perhaps, when the foreign policy of the Government was no affair of the Church, but that time has passed, and Christianity has awakened to the fact, that if we are to be true followers of the Prince of Peace, we must exert every effort to preserve peace. The time to do this is before, and not after hostilities begin. An indifferent public may allow themselves to be negotiated into a situation where war may seem almost the only honorable way out. Whereas vigorous pressure, brought to bear upon officials at the proper time, would have avoided such a calamity.

If we keep before the public the idea that war is an unthinkable solution of an international dispute, we can outlaw war in this generation. We are absolutely convinced that the power of Christianity is strong enough to do this. Read the letter from our correspondent in Petersburg on this subject.

THE DEFEAT OF THE LAUSANNE TREATY is another evidence of the growing power of the Church. The opposition to this agreement came almost entirely from the Churches, headed by a large group of our own Bishops, and, although Bishop Brent withdrew his objections to it for reasons, which he has stated very clearly, and very convincingly, nevertheless, it is admitted that it was the antagonism of the Churches to this document, which did not offer proper protection to Christian residents in Turkey that caused the Senate to turn it down.

A WOMAN HEADS THE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICAN COLEGES for the first time in its history. The Association consists of three hundred and eighty leading Colleges in the country, and they elected a woman to be its president. Miss Lucia Briggs, President of Milwaukee-Downer, was given that honor at the meeting held in Chicago on January 13, 14 and 15. The President of one of the Church Colleges, Dr. Bernard I. Bell, of St. Stephen's College, was for the third successive year elected a member of the Directing Committee of Six which controls the activities of the Association, and, also for the third time its treasurer. The Episcopal Church Colleges represented at the Chicago Convention were: Kenyon College, by President Pierce; St. Stephen's College, by President Bell; University of the South, by Dean Baker.

THE PUBLIC APPETITE FOR RELIGIOUS READING seems to be growing steadily. A large New York publishing firm has just announced the establishment of a special department with Mr. Walter S. Lewis as its head. Mr. Lewis, for the past ten years, has been manager of the book department of the Presbyterian Board of Publication. Practically all of the leading current magazines now feature articles of a religious character in their cover advertisements. This is one of the strongest evidences that this style of literature is in demand from the public. It is the object of such magazines to try to give their readers what they think they want, and we may rest assured attention would not be given to uplifting articles unless the publishers were certain that their readers wanted them. One of the many signs of Christian progress is the eagerness among the general public to read such literature.

OUR CLERGY IN THIS WEEK'S ISSUE

THE REV. CHARLES FRANKLIN BLAISDELL, D. D., was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, and did his college work in the University of that city. He took his theological training at the General Theological Seminary in New York. In the course of his ministry he has covered a wide area, having served churches in New York, California, Missouri and Arkansas. He was called to Calvary Church, Memphis, Tenn., from St. John's Church, Helena, Arkansas, in 1920. Shortly afterward, in 1922, his excellent work was recognized by the University of the South, which conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Of attractive personality, his excellent preaching and organizing ability have made him a leading figure in the Church and the South.

THE RT. REVEREND EDWARD LAMBE PARSONS, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of California, was born in New York City, doing his college work at Yale. He studied in theology at the Union Theological Seminary, New York, and the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass. After serving as assistant at Grace Church, in New York, he accepted a call to St. Matthew's Church, San Mateo, California. He continued his ministry on the Pacific Coast until 1919, when he was elected Bishop Coadjutor of California. He is recognized, like most of the Alumni of the Cambridge Seminary, as a Liberal Churchman, and is a frequent contributor to the Church press, at one time editing The Pacific Churchman. His article in this week's issue is the second of the series: "The Boy and His Church", appearing every two weeks in The Southern Churchman.

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

THE MOTHER OF JESUS

By The Reverend Charles F. Blaisdell, D. D.

And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us. —St. Luke 2:15.

A WOMAN'S biography is written in the lives of her children, while a man's is written in his public words and deeds. He dreams of doing while she thinks of the kind of child she will send into the world. Her glory is seen in her finest child. For the writing of a biography we usually gather the details, such as letters, records and stories, but in writing of such a mother as Mary you must content yourself with a few details, such as the visit of the angel, her song of grateful praise and a brief touch upon the home life, but they are enough to reveal the woman and mother. The virtues of men are but the dreams of good mothers come true. Mary dreamed for her child. She was "not learned save in gracious household ways,

> Not perfect, nay, but full of tender wants
> No angel, but a dearer being, all dipt
> In angel instincts, breathing Paradise
> Interpreter between the gods and men".

"Happy he with such a mother! faith in womankind beats with his blood, and trust in all things high comes easy to him, and though he trip and fall, he shall not blind his soul with clay." A mother's life will be monotonous if she lacks devoutness. Daily household duties may become a tedious grind, yet dipt in angel instincts, her task has all the variety of heaven. An earthly mind calls it monotony, while she calls it romance—even in her weariness.

The world is governed and saved by ideal lives more than by ideas. Living models move us more than abstract principles. God chose for the high embassy of motherhood to Jesus not one from a palatial home abounding in luxury, but one living the simple life of a peasant. Mary was no fighting Amazon amazing with her strength, nor a Venus awakening low admiration by physical charms. Hers was the beauty of soul that inspires. She had moral strength that never sacrificed womanly grace. Her courage was that of a woman silent in suffering and never given to noisy action. God in choosing a woman to be the vehicle of redemption by bearing the Divine Son into the world gave a holy distinction to all womanhood This should make every woman pause and consider. She is the center of the home. Remember that home is more potent and more useful than congress, clubs, societies. When women talk about a broader life let them ask, "What is broader than the home?" Home has in it depth that is worth more than all that imagined breadth which the world offers. In the home the woman is the optimist to the morbid husband, a restraint upon the happy-go-lucky man, the protector of the careless man. Her occupation is as wide as life. As a mother she is not a specialist, but the teacher of everything. She must answer the myriad of undreamed questions springing from the child's mind Do you call this life drudgery and hard work? If you think this life is useless, wasteful, inglorious, then the mothers of the saints and heroes have been strange creatures, for they were pleased with such a lot. A woman may be exhausted by such a task, but never narrowed. "The woman of the world is the same thing to many people, while the mother is everything to a few." Mary was on no committees. She was not thrown up into eminence and rank by the tide of events, but by her inherent womanly strength she had the fitness which made the common privilege of woman so sublime that all women might rejoice to be in her class—the God-fearing mother. She was prepared in one school—the sanctuary of God. She was not learned, but wise; not bold, but courageous through affection and high trust.

We may be prepared for many things in this world, but unless we are prepared for the best, we are little above failures. Our girls are prepared to dance, shoot, dress, act, sing, to grace a drawing-room or a dinner table, but not for the best and greatest thing of all—motherhood. We sharpen her mind, but do not deepen her soul. Thus many an attractive girl with such a poor preparation discovers too late that she is but little better than an expensive luxury or a parasite. Irritable with life through such a shallow training, the time comes when she wants to be freed from what she feels to be the confines of home. She may look for what she calls the independence of equality. Had she been truly prepared for marriage she would have seen that there is neither equal nor unequal. "Each fulfils defect in each, and always thought in thought, purpose in purpose, will in will, they grow. The single, pure, and perfect animal. The two celled, heart beating, with one full stroke—life."

Her marriage is the surrender of a lesser independence for a bondage that enriches, offering a crown to her affection and the freedom of the wide spaces of heaven in which to roam.

There were two beautiful moments in Mary's life. When Jesus was twelve and said in the temple, "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?" and the other when He, from the cross, said "Behold thy mother". She had taught Him that God was a Father and that employment in His service was a privilege that outreaches all earthly ambition. "I must." He had learned a holy compulsion at His mother's knee. It is the compulsion to which true affection surrenders itself and builds up for its soul an assurance that withstands the shocks of our painful pilgrimage.

Some say words have no meaning, but I hold that some words have in them electric power. One such word is "Mother". You can check one who is cynical of the virtues of men by saying to him the word "Mother" and he will pause to make exception. Sometimes we behold the tragedy of the woman who feels neither angel nor God. She is so earthly that her only concern is to win the admiration of others. She carries none on the wings of her soul to gaze even for a moment into the heart of God. A prayerless woman is like a dead star whose glory is a thing of the past. When we think of woman we think of beauty, but no woman can be so beautiful by any adornment of gowns and jewels as "she who has centered upon her the proud eyes of her husband and the affectionate glances of her children".

Mary had a plain hard life, but she understood God—and herself. She had no fretful complaints. Do women know that when they cannot command they can weave a spell, and though they may have no power to throw the world, they may have authority over conscience and heart? It is said that the father's sins are visited upon the children to the third generation. I've no doubt the mother's virtues are likewise entailed. A woman's natural converse is with God and the angels. So only can she consecrate her powers and if she does not consecrate she will desecrate. When she takes daily counsel of God her constancy becomes as the hills, her influence as the shining stars and her ingenuity for helpfulness baffles the halting, doubting mind of men. She never fails. A true woman is old-fashioned—as old-fashioned as life. To her—purity, truth, duty, as long as she paces the heights of heaven, are never out of date. Loyal to her true self and to the whisperings of the angels she becomes the mother and teacher of Saviours, but disloyal, indifferent to angelic ministrations, caring only for the transitory and little for the eternal, the pleasure of the hour and the glamor and glitter of the world more than for a heavenly task, she breeds a race of destroyers.

In us all is a desire for some admiration, but a woman's greatest glory is in being trusted. When the shadows fall and trial darkens, somehow the child and the husky man turn to some woman for support and courage to fight and to die. To reach the glad estate of being so trusted no woman needs astonishing gifts—she needs neither warmth nor station, but only to keep her heart close to God. Women—when you feel that life is monotonous with home duties and pains, and that you tread weary flats, remember this: Your gladdest hours are not when you feel well and strong and you shine by reason of some passing triumph—no, your gladdest hour will be when you see a child doing something fine and turning to you in sweet affection as to say, "You taught me this". You know that child is then about the Father's business and though a sword may pierce your heart and though you see him suffer for the right—the good and true—you are comforted because he is unafraid, unfaltering, even unto sorrow, because in you he trusted and found the better life —in you he found God and heaven.

THE BOY AND HIS CHURCH

WHAT THE BIBLE MEANS

By the Right Reverend Edward L. Parsons, D. D.

THE Bible is an open-air Book. It belongs to the mountains and the seas and the fields. It is generous and big, like these outdoor things. It begins with a great poem about the creation of God's world. It ends with what is really another poem which pictures this old world made over into a new heaven and a new earth, holy and glorious because God is the Light of it, and Christ its King. People who read and study the Bible aright ought to be big and brave and strong and generous people who love freedom and clean and fine things.

Let me try to tell you a little about it to show how and why that is so.

We always speak of the Bible as if it were one Book, but every one knows that it is not. It is a library of sixty-six books or separate writings arranged on two shelves, which we call the Old and the New Testaments. They are of all kinds: Collections of folk stories and traditions, like Genesis, histories like Kings and Chronicles, poetry, sermons, codes of law, wonderful collections of wise sayings, letters and even love songs. In the book of Job we have one of the greatest dramas in the world. Ruth and Esther are what we would call today short stories with a purpose. In the four Gospels we have the account of the Supreme Life of human history. In fact, no school course in literature would bring us to the reading of a greater variety of books.

Naturally we ask why they are all bound up together. The answer is that they tell us about God and the way in which He has made Himself known to men through the Hebrew people and in Jesus Christ. Each book tells a part of that story. Together they give to Christians the knowledge of their faith and of the Christian way of life. The Bible contains the message which the Church has to bring to the world.

It is a message which comes to us partly through the history and tradition of the Hebrews and partly through great men. It is completed in the Life of our Lord. When the history of the Hebrews really begins, in the time of Moses about a dozen centuries before Christ, they were a wandering desert tribe, escaping from Egypt to find their freedom. They did not know much about God. They called Him Jehovah. They believed He lived in the mountains and that in the wilds of Mt. Sinai He had given them the law. He was their God and the best God, but He was not the only God. Other peoples and nations had theirs. All that is very clear if we read the stories in Exodus and Numbers and the book of Judges. The Old Testament tells us how God, like a great teacher, took this people and gradually brought them to know that He is one God, the only God and righteous and holy. It would be easier for us if the books of the Bible were arranged in the order in which they were written, or something like that. We need some help to understand the right order. In general what we can do is to read the historical books and then as we read the others fit them in along the way at the dates given us in the helps found in the back of so many Bibles, or in the books written for just that purpose. We can then follow the story of these people and see how through all this time God was teaching them. The old traditions which we have in Genesis helped them to understand that God was the source of men's life, and was guiding their work. Their experience as a people with their enemies He used, to make them see that a nation must be righteous and faithful if it is to live. He guided the priest and kings to build up the law. He sent prophets or preachers, like Elijah and Elisha and later their wonderful successors, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah and the rest whose sermons we read in the books called by their names. He inspired poets who wrote the Psalms and wise men who gathered the popular proverbs together and added to them. God was always teaching, teaching, until by the time of our Lord there was no Jewish boy who did not know about the One Righteous God and His purpose for men.

Then came our Lord and through Him men learned that God is more than a righteous God. He is our Heavenly Father, who cares for each one of us individually. The Gospels tell us that story; the Book of the Acts tells us how the Church began its work of teaching men about Christ and bringing Him into their lives to save them from sin and strengthen them to do good. The letters which follow tell us what the early disciples thought of Christ and the Christian life; and the Book of the Revelation at the end is a great vision, painted in oriental magnificence, of the conflict of good and evil and of the world made over under Christ's rule.

That gives some idea of what the Bible has within its covers for the world in general. But it has also much to help each one of us personally. It has a remarkable way of speaking to all kinds of people, old and young, men and women, boys and girls, rich and poor, learned and ignorant. Teachers, preachers, doctors, lawyers, bankers, mechanics, laborers have found in it the things they have needed. It reaches, for example, close to the things which bulk large in our lives when we are boys. It is full of heroes and the stories of brave deeds. Joseph sold into slavery by his brothers is taken to Egypt and becomes the chief ruler under Pharaoh. Gideon and his three hundred rout the armies of Midian. David, young and ruddy, goes single-handed to meet the giant of the Philistines and slays him. Each one finds his strength and courage in God. It is for God and Christ that the heroes of the New Testament give their lives, not in warfare, but in what we today call missionary work. "We ought to obey God, rather than men," says St. Peter to his judges, when arrested and ordered to stop speaking. St. Paul's story is full of the highest and finest courage. In a little church I know, some one has put up a bronze tablet which reads, "A tribute to Saul of Tarsus, St. Paul, the Knightliest and most splendid merely human character in history". I like that, and when I read of his journeys and his hardships and persecutions and feel the power of his courage, I come to think that it is probably true. That "merely human character" leads us to the chief of all heroes, our Lord Jesus Christ Himself. For 1,900 years weak men have found strength through Him to live and die with unflinching courage. Thus you will find in the Bible the inspiration and courage that come from those who have nobly lived and died.

You will find, too, a multitude of great sayings and noble passages which are good to learn and store one's memory with. "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." Could anything help us to value self-control more than that. "I have fought a good fight," said St. Paul; and only the other day I read an article by a school boy of eighteen, in which he said that a right-minded boy wanted to feel that he was "fighting a good fight". That boy could certainly fight better because these words had sunk into his heart. "Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall be called the children of God." Every boy who intends to help in the great war against war wants those words of our Lord as his summons to duty. And so I might go on filling page after page with quotations, but it is far better for each of us to make his own list, choosing those which help him most.

Or, again, the Bible brings us always face to face with that which takes so large a place in youth, the ideal. We sometimes think we are satisfied with things as they are, either the world or ourselves. But we are not. If we are any good at all, we do want a better world. The Bible helps us to see it. All through the Old Testament men are looking forward. They are seeking something better. They are looking for God's Kingdom and God's King. They are seeking greater freedom, bigger outlooks, lives built upon truths as eternal as "the mountains round about Jerusalem". Some people read the Old Testament and look backward. But the men who live in it, or who wrote it, never did. If we find their spirit we must always be forward-looking men. In the New Testament the whole world of the best is ever before our eyes. All through His teaching Christ speaks of the Kingdom. All the early Christians are looking for the Kingdom. The last book in the Bible pictures the new heaven and the new earth. No one can understand the Gospels and not feel that he wants to be a crusader to go out and transform the world, so that war and suffering and poverty and hatred and vice and greed may be done away.

Finally, above all these ideals, towers the great figure of the Christ, the Perfect Man. He is the goal of our life. His courage, faith, love and purity get hold of us as we read and study and we are never satisfied unless we are moving on towards that ideal.

Thus I have tried to tell you some of the things which the Bible may mean to us. There are many others. We can find them for ourselves and like them better because we do. But one thing we must always remember, and that I speak of in conclusion. The Bible cannot really mean anything to us unless we read and study it ourselves.

We can find plenty of books to guide us to choose the best way to read it. We can get help from the clergy and teachers; but nothing will come of the help unless we ourselves do the work. If we do we shall find these high and helpful things. We shall find ourselves growing stronger and cleaner, more ready to serve others, greater lovers of freedom and all the beautiful things in God's world, more satisfied that we have found the best things in life.

We shall then discover the most important part of what the Church means when it calls the Bible the Sacred Scriptures and says it is inspired. It becomes really sacred to us because it helps us to find God and Jesus Christ. It is inspired because it brings to us power and strength and vision; that is, as has often been said, it is inspired because it inspires us.

THE DANGERS OF IGNORANCE

By C. L. Marsilliot

WE had, lo, these many years, labored under the impression that we knew at least something of the doctrinal position of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America and possessed a passable familiarity with its Prayer Book. Nay, we went so far as to believe that we had gained some acquaintance with the progress of the so-called "Catholic"—or Romeward—Movement in the Church, in its devious and various manifestations and ramifications. But alas! every day, from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same, come revelations which shake our confidence in our attainments, humble our pride and suggest the efficacy of sackcloth and ashes.

There has just come to our attention the following notice, issued in November, of a service to be held in Saint Clement's Church, Philadelphia, which, judging from the notice, our readers will be surprised to learn is a parish in communion with the Protestant Episcopal Church. The notice reads:

The Living Rosary of Our Lady and Saint Dominic.

Tuesday, November 16—7:30 A. M. Black Mass for departed Rosarians. In the Crypt Chapel of Saint Clement's Church, Philadelphia. (Enter by door into the garden.)

Wednesday, December 8—8:00 P. M. Devotional Service at the Convent of Saint Mary the Virgin, 6137 Germantown Avenue, Philadelphia. (Bring Veils.) The offering at this service will be added to the fund for the Statue of Our Lady. About $20 has been subscribed to this fund, and an equal amount still remains to be raised. Contributions may be sent to the undersigned.

VIRGINIA YERGER,
Secretary General.

That "The Living Rosary of Our Lady and Saint Dominic" is probably an efficient agency in the introduction into the Church of Roman doctrines and practices we readily admit, and as a source of valuable information it is by no means to be ignored.

While our "Catholic" friends in the Church daily inculcate prayers for the intercession of the Virgin Mary, we confess, in great humility, our ignorance that this Church teaches invocation of Saint Dominic. We have searched the Prayer Book from cover to cover and fail to find any mention of him in its pages, but we freely acknowledge our error in accepting that volume as final authority on the subject, even notwithstanding the Constitution of the Church. History informs us that the first assignment of this great Saint was to preach to the Albigenses and Waldenses, among the pioneer Protestants against the abuses and corruption then existing in the Roman Church, which fact doubtless constituted a strong recommendation for his selection as the patron Saint of "The Living Rosary of Our Lady"; and neither his signal failure in that mission nor the omission of this Church to canonize him in consequence formed any bar to the conferring of this great honor upon him.

From this notice we have learned several things of which we are heartily ashamed to admit we were woefully ignorant, and even yet, as to some of the matters therein mentioned, we are still in a fog.

In the first place, we are told that there was to be a "Black Mass". Now, wherein "Black Mass" differs from blue, white, green or yellow Mass, the notice does not inform us. Nevertheless, "The Living Rosary" seems to have made a discovery which appears to have escaped the attention of the entire Roman Communion in all of the centuries of its existence, ignorance of which on our part may possibly be excusable, inasmuch as even so ponderous a work as the Catholic Encyclopedia makes no mention of a "Black Mass", so far as we have been able to find. If "The Living Rosary of Our Lady" will bring this important discovery to the attention of the authors of that compilation, in order that it may be sent out in the next edition, this society will have performed a great service, and the information will doubtless be gratefully received.

Just why this service was to be held in the crypt of the Chapel of Saint Clement's Church, to be reached by entrance through the door into the garden, instead of in the Church proper, we sadly acknowledge that we are unable to offer any enlightenment.

And then we observe that another devotional service was to be held at the Convent of Saint Mary the Virgin. Here again we must admit our abysmal lack of knowledge as to what place a convention occupies in the economy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America. We thought the Convention, with all of its abuses and superstitutions, had long since gone the way of many other medieval spiritual excrescences, but ia appears that as to this also we were grievously mistaken. The best general definition of a Convent which we have been able to obtain is that it is an institution in which persons seclude themselves wholly from the world for the purpose of devotion. We had been under the impression that nowhere in the Scriptures did Christ tell His people to withdraw from contact with the world, but that His command was, "Go ye therefore and teach all nations", but it now seems that we were in error even as to this.

But, perhaps, the most striking feature of this announcement is the admonition to those who propose to attend to "Bring Veils". Far be it from mere man to attempt to discuss articles of female attire, but, to our unenlightened minds, this requirement gives rise to serious reflections. It is to be inferred that there are some regulations concerning these veils, but, if the color, style and material of these habiliments changes as often as we are advised the manner of other ladies' wear is altered, it occurs to us that this regulation might become highly expensive. What would be the consequences, spiritual and temporal, of appearing at such a ceremony without such equipment, or with a veil not of the required architectural design and specifications, is something to cause even the most careless to pause and consider. There would be one redeeming feature, however, to such a failure or omission—it would afford a superb opportunity to bring into play the so-called "Sacrament of Penance", which "Catholics" inform us is soon to become a part of the practice of this Church.

Finally, it is to be noted that the offering at this latter service is to be devoted to supplying a deficiency of $20 in a fund for the purchase of a statue of the Virgin Mary. Thus, for the first time, do we learn that this Church enjoins upon its people contributions to provide images of "Our Lady", but, as this is intended as a frank and full confession of our ignorance, we might as well make a clean breast of it while we are at it. Of course, none but the least informed would deny for a moment that a statute of the Virgin is an indispensable essential to the teaching and preaching of the Gospel, one to be considered in preference to provision for domestic and foreign missions, the Clergy Pension Fund, or any of the other activities of the Church. The December bulletin of the National Council states that contributions of nearly a million dollars were required in that month if the Church is to continue its "Pay as we go" plan, but this pales into insignificance beside the necessity of statutes of the Virgin, neglect of which we would in no wise even suggest, regardless of whatever deficiencies may occur in other requirements.

Verily ignorance is a deplorable state.

AN AMERICAN CATHEDRAL

Final Plans Accepted

A DESIGN for the great Central Tower of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, submitted by the architect, Dr. Ralph Adams Cram, which is declared by competent critics to have no precedent in the history of architecture, has now been presented by the architects and approved by the Trustees of the Cathedral.

The adoption of this design marks one of the most important steps in the history and evolution of the plans for this world-famed edifice and completes the design for the entire building.

This important and dominant central feature has been the greatest of all the problems confronting the architects, because of the unparalleled width of the crossing above which the tower was to rise, and the problem was felt and said by many to be an insuperable one. When it is remembered that the area of this crossing is nearly 16,000 feet, as against about 5,000 feet or less for the majestic octagon of Ely Cathedral, and that its diameter exceeds by eighteen feet that of the rotunda of St. Paul's in London, we gain some conception of the difficulty of the problem.

In the opinion of the architects of the Cathedral, and in the unanimous judgment of the Trustees, and of the professional advisors who have been consulted, the solution now reached is one which is wholly satisfactory and convincing, and which, although it is unlike any other design in the world, is yet entirely harmonious and true to the Gothic principle and ideal.

The architects have accomplished the extraordinary and wholly original feat of hanging a massive tower sixty feet square directly above a central space one hundred and twenty feet square without spoiling the effect of the vast interior space by pillars or supports of any kind. In the past the only way in which this has been accomplished has been by the use of an "un-Gothic" dome, but the plan now adopted for the New York Cathedral combines the effect of vast interior height and spaciousness given by a dome with the superb exterior effect of the Gothic tower. The grandeur of the interior effect is difficult to describe adequately. The height from the pavement to the apex of the central tower will be no less than two hundred and thirty-five feet. The exterior height of the tower from the ground will be more than four hundred feet.

While the accompanying architects' drawing can give only an inadequate idea, it suggests the majesty and strength of this central feature and the way in which it relates itself to the noble towers of the west front and to all the different parts of the great building and binds them together in a splendid unity.

It will be a matter of great interest, and of just pride that America has produced this solution of a problem with which in other ages the architects of other great Cathedrals have wrestled.

The original plan of the Cathedral was Romanesque without and Byzantine within. When it was determined some fifteen years ago that the plans should be developed along Gothic lines the difficulties which confronted the architects were enormous. The choir had been constructed and also the great piers and arches of a central crossing with an exterior one hundred and twenty feet square. To preserve as far as possible this original construction and add harmoniously a nave and transepts Gothic both in style and construction was a work of immense difficulty. But this was successfully accomplished.

There still remained, however, the problem of the central feature—tower, dome, or spire, whichever it should be. Here was a central area four times that of any Gothic tower in existence, a space much greater in diameter than the famous octagon of Ely, nearly as large as the octagon of the Cathedral of Florence, and exactly the same in area as the central square of Saint Sophia in Constantinople. In all these cases a dome was used. The critical problem in the New York Cathedral was what to do with this vast area, and how to develop it both in its exterior and in its interior after a fashion structurally honest and enduring, and yet harmonious in scale with the remainder of the building.

It was equally out of the question to carry up as a tower this huge central square, after the fashion of the central towers of English and a few French medieval churches. Such a square bulk was proved by many studies to be wholly out of scale with the rest of the building, crushing in effect and clumsy in mass.

The architects seemed to have reached an impasse. They have now submitted a scheme which, as already stated in the opinion of the Bishop, the trustees and their professional advisors, solves the problem both architecturally and structurally after a fashion that, in principle, is wholly satisfactory.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE COMMUNITY

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

THERE IS PLENTY TO ARBITRATE.

In a recent speech President Coolidge is quoted as saying on the subject of World Peace:

"We cannot establish the new principle unless we are willing to make some sacrifices, unless we are willing to put some courage into our convictions. I believe we are strong enough and brave enough to resist another domination of the world by the military spirit through our own independent action."

Taking those words at their full value the Administrative Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches took vigorous action, affirming:

"First, That it inform the President and Congress that it whole-heartedly supports him in his opposition to enlarged naval expenditures for the building of additional cruisers at this time;

"Second, That it commends the policy announced by President Coolidge for broadening the application of the spirit and principle of the limitation of armament formulated at the Washington Conference, and earnestly hopes that Congress will cooperate with the President in every possible way in carrying out this policy."

The President's words in his Trenton speech on December 29, are fine, but in order to make them ring true, both at home and abroad, it will be necessary for the United States to abandon even a show of militarism in its dealings with Mexico.

It has now been stated that the confiscation of property by the Mexican Government is a matter that cannot be arbitrated. Why can't it? The Mexicans did not confiscate the property outright. They made provision for the transfer of a fee simple title to a fifty-year lease, provided foreign holders would take the necessary steps to arrange for this transfer before January 1, 1927. British and Dutch companies, wishing to comply with the law of the country in which they were operating, did take the proper steps to arrange this transfer and made application some months ago to the Mexican Government.

The British usually look after their property interest as carefully as any country in the world. If they recognized the provisions of the Mexican Constitution of 1917, and the validity of laws based thereon, why should not the United States do the same?

Fifty years is a long time in the life of an oil property, and to offer a fifty year lease in substitution for the title outright is by no means "confiscation", and leaves plenty of room for arbitration.

The Christian people of this country should allow nothing to divert their attention from securing a peaceful solution of our differences with Mexico, and, if necessary, Congress ought to be deluged with letters and petitions insisting upon such a solution. The Government can be made to feel the power of public opinion in this matter, and it is a paramount Christian duty to be actively interested in it.

COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING.

By Mary Evelyn Brydon, M. D.

Article IV.—Getting the Message Straight.

Continuing our figure of the road: Every well regulated road has a supervisor who directs the up-keep, places the signals and makes out rules and regulations for the general conduct of drivers on that road. Behind the supervisor there is the commission and behind the commission is the Government. These people all work together to protect the driver, the passenger, the pedestrian, and incidentally, contiguous property. If everybody understood the signals and the rules and obeyed them, there would be no accidents.

But something is wrong somewhere, for we had 19,335 accidents that resulted in death on the roads of the United States in 1925. Did it ever occur to you that you as the parents of these victims may be to blame for the failure of these boys and girls, the young and the old, to understand the laws regulating traffic? Who teaches the child how to keep the laws—any law? At what age do his parents begin to teach him to be law-abiding? Later, we will go into this subject of teaching the child obedience to the law, but just now I want to ask you: Do you understand clearly yourself how to carry out all instructions that are given you for right living, for health, for safety?

This matter of understanding. Even our Lord made complaint, "Why will ye not understand?" After two thousand years He may well ask that question again, for we still do not seem to understand how to live right; how to keep well; how to avoid accidents.

Why does your child so often make mistakes? Is it not perhaps because he does not understand the rules of the matter? Does not understand what it is he is expected to do? If the child does not understand, is it not because you have failed to explain the whys and the wherefores? And back of all that, is it not because the subject is not clear in your own mind? This I believe is the real crux of the matter. You truly want to train your child in the right way. You know there is a right way and wrong way of child training, and to the best of your ability you intend to take the right road. But day by day you make mistakes, the child makes mistakes and every one seems to be constantly taking a wrong turn. You are sure that Christ can direct you and teach you all that you ought to know about this job of yours, but somehow He seems to be away off somewhere high above you, where you cannot reach, and your problems are right here at hand, an ever-present trouble to you.

My message to you today is that if you will follow the instructions I have already given you, viz., to go to our Lord for instructions in your perplexities, you will find this: That for every problem, or perplexity, that comes up to you for a decision no matter how important or how trivial, there always will be given to you one or more cues to your procedure.

I want every Christian mother to understand this.

Study your Bible carefully and you will see that St. Paul tells us this very definitely. Strength will be given when strength is needed. A way of escape will be given when temptation drives hard. A source of help is ever present within to guide and instruct and teach and comfort. And always there will be victory, always will things work out satisfactorily to every one—every one without exception—who lives and trusts God and has faith in Him.

You understand this now, do you not? Yes, you say, but how am I to recognize a suggestion or decision as coming from Him and not from Satan?

There are four ways to test the signals that God may use to guide, influence or direct us in traveling the troublous road of training the child for life:

1. Every right signal will be in accordance with the Bible.
2. This signal will appeal to your common sense.
3. This signal will be given at the opportune moment.
4. This signal will conform to an inner conviction of "rightness".

These four signals may be applied to anything that comes up to you for a decision.

For instance, every Christian parent wants to teach his child to live the Christ-like life. He fails to realize that the Church has a large part to play in this teaching, and decides not to insist on regular church attendance. Applying the four tests we find:

1. This decision is distinctly contrary to the Bible.
2. It is illogical to expect your child to get from playing in the streets or with his toys during church hour, the kind of influence he would have gotten at the church service.
3. So long as you keep your child from church service, so long may you expect every Sunday when the church bells ring to be reminded that your child is not in the right place.
4. The final decision to go or not to go to church will be accompanied in the mother's mind by a feeling of unrest if the decision was negative, and by a feeling of well-being or "rightness" if it was positive.

These signals should all harmonize. God will not tell you one thing in one signal and another in another. You may always test your signals by comparing them with each other.

Not to mind signals means nothing more or less than breaking a law or rule somewhere. We have, therefore, come to the place where we must study about law and that will be our subject next time.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

MINISTERS CAN MAINTAIN PEACE.

Mr. Editor:

It was with a hearty "Amen" that I read your editorial on "Practicing Peace" in the issue of January 15.

It is the firm belief of the writer that it is easily within the power, and the province, of the united Churches of the United States to effectually prevent even so much as a serious threat of war against Mexico on the part of our Government.

Let the ministers of all the Churches preach the unvarnished truth of Jesus; be uncompromisingly loyal to His teaching of human brotherhood and universal love. Let them now, before the event, warn their people against the grievous sin of war; against legalized slaughter of human beings for the preservation of financial interests, or for the protection of persons engaged solely in financial enterprises. Let them plainly state that under no circumstances will they aid or abet in any way the prosecution of such a war, either by prayer for the armed forces of the nation or for their victory, by urging upon the people the duty of supporting such a war by the purchase of government securities, or by the prostitution of true patriotism in the interest of a commercial war. Let them bring forcibly before the minds of their people the untold suffering and sorrow, pain and death we should inflict upon the pitifully ignorant and unenlightened people of Mexico, people really powerless to control the actions of their government; warning our people of the great sin of being in any way party to such useless sacrifice of human lives, those of our own people as well as the Mexicans. Let them publicly signify their opposition to a war against our neighboring country and demand that our Government shall find some solution of its problem other than a resort to force. Let them do these things and the powers that be will pause long and consider well before they brave the censure of the united forces of Christianity in their own country. Another and a peaceable way will be found.

Having thus given fair and previous warning of our opposition, the Churches will be morally free to preach against any such war should it be started. Such action could not be construed as traitorous, treasonable, nor disloyal, as it might be did we remain quiet until after such a war had been legally declared. There are few governments in Christian lands, and surely not our own, that could hope to raise funds or forces sufficient to prosecute a successful war in the face of determined opposition on the part of the Christian Churches in its midst.

Personally, I am unalterably convinced that a war such as you mention would be in direct opposition to the will of God and the teachings of Jesus Christ, and would rejoice to think that all His ministers would join in loyalty to the teachings of Jesus in preference to submission to the mistaken and un-Christian mandate of any man-made government or secular authority, even that of my own country.

CONFIRMATION INSTRUCTIONS: By Charles Patterson Smyth, M. A. Morehouse Publishing Company, Milwaukee, Wis.

The title of this book describes it. It contains twelve addresses on various aspects of preparation for the solemn step of confirmation. Beginning with a chapter on "The Sacrimental Idea", which deals with the reason for confirmation in a very forceful and readable way, the writer continues with lectures on the obligation of Baptisms, divided into three parts, "Renounce", "Believe" and "Obey". He then discusses specific sins against God's laws, divided into two heads. His chapter on Bible reading is somewhat vague, but he offers one thoroughly practical suggestion when he says, "Let me remind you that the secret of all pleasurable reading is to use your imagination, think yourself into the story you are reading. Imagine that you are one of the crowd pressing around the Master the day He went to heal the daughter of Jairus . . . read St. Paul's Epistles and try to get in touch with this man, whose one thought was to serve his Lord and to spread the Gospel . . . . Use your imagination and your Bible reading will take on a new vividness and pleasure every day." This book will be found especially useful to younger clergy, who have not yet worked out their own method of confirmation instruction.

"His will be done," we say with sighs and trembling,
Expecting trial, bitter loss, and tears;
And then how doth He answer us with blessings
In sweet rebuking of our faithless fears!
God's will is peace and plenty, and the power
To be and have the best that He can give—
A mind to serve Him and a heart to love Him,
The faith to die with and the strength to live.

The Great Commission

A WONDERFUL OPPORTUNITY IN MEXICO.

Writing on January 13 Bishop Creighton, of Mexico, says:

"January 12 was the anniversary of my consecration. I celebrated in Christ Church at ten o'clock and then went to San Jose where there was an anniversary service, attended by the congregation at San Jose and San Pedro Martir. It was most beautiful. I wore my vestments, and sat in the chancel, but, of course, took no part in the service. Following the procession, seventy of our children came in, each one carrying a flower. Just before the service began they all knelt at the chancel steps with their flowers; it was a most touching and beautiful sight. Flowers were then placed on the altar, and we had the Service of Holy Communion. Orihuela made a special address devoted to the year's work, full of kindly felicitations, which only Mexicans know how to express. After the service Mrs. Creighton was presented with a bouquet of flowers by the teachers from Sagrado Nombre. The congregation of San Pedro Martir presented me with a bouquet literally two feet across, and fully a foot and a half high. We took it apart and our house is now filled with flowers. In the chancel, during the service were: the Rev. Messrs. Orihuela, Camara, Caballero, Romero, Saucedo, Martinez, Miranda and I. Dean Peacock and Mr. Watson were in the choir. In the afternoon, at four o'clock, Orihuela gave a tea for Mrs. Creighton and me, in his house at Portales. He said this was the first time he ever attempted to entertain. There was a large crowd present; the orchestra from San Pedro Martir was down, and provided excellent music. Refreshments were ample: cocoa, huge quantities of cakes, and "enchilladas". Of course, it was a glorious day.

"Some time before Christmas I met a Captain of the Mexican Army, who had become interested in the commercial department of Sagrado Nombre. I did what I could to cultivate him and his wife, and was delighted when they appeared at our reception on Christmas Day. They have now sent their children to Sagrado Nombre Sunday School; and yesterday each of the children presented me with a beautiful bonquet of lilies. The Captain and his wife were both present at the service, after which I introduced them to Orihuela. They are just the type of Mexicans I want to bring into the Church; they are drifting out of Romanism and are people of too fine a character to be lost.

"Last week Mr. Orihuela received a visit from a man from a village in the State of Puebla, bearing a letter from the people of the town, inviting him to come and hold a service in the Roman Church. Mr. Orihuela explained once more our position, and told this good man that we were not Roman Catholics and could not accept the invitation; and to his surprise the man said he knew all about us, knew who we were and what we stood for, and that the people in the village had decided to become members of our Church; and wanted to turn the Roman Church over to us for our use. Of course, I could not accept this offer, as blood-shed and death would result. Nevertheless, it is indicative of the direction in which the wind is blowing; and I hope we can hold on and reap the harvest when the time is ripe."

ON THE FIRING LINE IN CHINA.

Bishop Graves writing on December 15 says:

"The situation in Shanghai at present is puzzling. On the one hand the foreign governments persistently refuse to accept any responsibility for bettering things in China while at the same time the Southerners are drawing closer all the time and, what is more to be feared, the revolutionary propaganda including anti-Christian program and organized strikes in all industries, although temporarily muzzled by the authorities of Kiangsu Province, is ready to break out again at the slightest opportunity, and nobody doubts that within a few weeks a revolutionary army will be in charge of this province. That is as far as anybody can estimate the chances at present: You would naturally suppose that people's confidence in any permanence of things as they are in Shanghai would be so shaken that no business ventures would be undertaken. The fact is, however, that building operations have never been more active than they are at present in Shanghai and, stranger still, the value of Shanghai Municipal bonds has not in any way fallen. Just how much all this rests on something solid, or whether it is simply a blind confidence that the interests involved in this city are so great that under no circumstances can foreign powers stand by and see them destroyed, one cannot say. At any rate, we all feel very grave concern what the position will be under the Southern conquest. The bolshevised revolutionary methods which accompany this conquest wherever it goes have reached such a pitch that it does not seem as if the Southerners will be able after this to dissolve them and in that case anything may be expected. Meanwhile all we can do is to keep cool in regard to whatever situation may develop."

EVENTS OF THE YEAR IN TOKYO.

Bishop Motoda's address to his Tokyo Diocesan Synod, late in 1926, summarizing events of the year, told of the ordination of two priests and four deacons (all Japanese). During 1926, one hundred and twenty-three had been confirmed, and another confirmation service was to increase the number before the end of the year, making approximately 1,800 communicants in that Diocese. A parish house (in Ikebukuro) had been built, and two concrete churches (Kanda and Asakusa) are under way. Local contributions for all Church purposes totalled 15,010 yen; the sum received from the English and American Missions was 10,622 yen. Local contributions had increased, though not in proportion to the decrease in foreign support. Foreign contributions are to diminish gradually until they cease altogether. The Bishop urges a greater increase in local offerings so that the gradual diminishing of foreign funds may be met by increasing self-support.

Among special services in Tokyo were those attended by the Crown Prince of Sweden, the united service of the Church Schools to present their Lenten offerings, the fiftieth anniversary service of St. Paul's Church, "with a much younger church, Immanuel, celebrating its twenty-fifth birthday only".

Bishop Motoda's report noted a great number of other activities, and progress in the development of the Diocese.

CHURCH WORK AMONG LEPERS.

The work of St. Barnabas' Mission for the Lepers of Kusatsu is one of growing importance. Miss Cornwall-Legh has been the devoted and loving worker there for more than ten years, and is looked up to by them as almost superhuman. She gives herself and everything she has to their service.

There are about two hundred and fifty baptized Christian lepers in Kusatsu, of whom more than one hundred are dependent upon Miss Cornwall-Legh for their entire support. They are housed in seven dormitories, erected and maintained by her and by funds secured by her from friends in Japan and abroad. The Emperor, the Department of Home Affairs and the Prefecture in which Kusatsu is situated make annual grants. There are two kindergartens, one for leper children and another for those who are not infected.

These poor lepers give offerings to every cause that is presented to them, the earthquake sufferers of 1923, Bishop Rowe's Indians, lepers in Panama, work in Jerusalem and Armenia.

At Kusatsu, where there is this leper work which is widely known, there is also a "healthy village", where a little mission, a devoted Japanese deacon and a mere handful of earnest Christians struggle in a field that presents great discouragement. The place is a hot-springs resort, recently made more accessible by railway, and throngs with thousands of invalids. There is a vast work to be done among this floating population. Miss Cornwall-Legh asks Church people to pray for the place and for a woman worker to help in this Upper Village. Our Church is doing the only religious work there at present.

BUILDING ACTIVITIES IN KYOTO.

Kyoto has seen an unusual amount of building. In years past, land has been secured for needed rectories, but building funds have been lacking and rented houses have been necessary. In 1926, by drawing to the limit the Kyoto District Loan Fund, four houses have been built. First, a residence at Tanabe, an extremely isolated spot. A combination church and parish house were completed early in the year at Hikone. A rectory has been added, which brings our resident priest, who formerly had to live at a distance, into much better touch with a large group of students in the government schools.

A third rectory was built at Kanazawa, a growing city and an important student city in Hokurikudo, the stronghold of Japanese Buddhism, which preaches often and maintains Sunday Schools and kindergartens on our model but far surpassing ours in equipment and financial resources. The climate here is the most trying in this Diocese. Our worker has had to live in a rented house, inconvenient as to location and too often inadequate to make him and his family comfortable. To a large extent the ups and downs which have marked the history of the Kanazawa Church must be attributed to frequent changes of workers, due to their physical inability to stand the climate. Now at last we have a rectory, and hope that the Rev. Paul Nagata, who has already done much to build up the Church, will be able to go on for years without undue danger to himself or his family.

A tiny residence has been built for Miss Grace Denton at Obama. The Japanese workers insisted on having a foreign woman worker added to their force, and Miss Denton has been living in most inadequate quarters. The new house is minute but compact.

Church Intelligence

Latest News From China.

The following cable has been received (January 20) from Bishops Roots:

Situation in Wuchang and Hankow tense. Conditions in Ichang and Shasi improving slowly. Following institutions going on fairly well: In Wuchang, Central China University, Boone Middle School, St. Hilda's School, Church General Hospital; in Hankow, St. Lois' School; in Ichang, Huntington School.

Changsha situation serious. Deaconess Stewart has come to Hankow. Other members of the staff remaining in Changsha for the present. The Rev. Walworth Tyng and family may leave Changsha soon. Following women are leaving their stations for a change: Miss M. G. Cabot, Miss Annie Brown, Miss M. R. Ravenall, Dr. Margaret Richey.

(The Bishop gives no information as to where they are going. Our surmise is Shanghai.)

Following are leaving China on anticipated furlough in view of existing conditions: Miss C. M. Bennett, Miss Mabel Sibson, the Rev. S. H. Littell and family, the Rev. John D. Mowrey and family.

Mr. J. Van Wie Berbamini and family are leaving for Japan.

(This will give Mr. Bergamini opportunity to assist in architectural work connected with Japan reconstruction.)

Rev. A. S. Kean and Miss Ruby Levy married January 15.

Our plans for next term still uncertain.

It may be necessary to change arrangements for the General Synod.

(This was to have been held in May in Foochow.)

A cable received from Bishop Huntington on January 22, in answer to our inquiry, tells us that missionaries of all the stations in the Missionary District of Anking are safe.

The Bishops' Crusade in Virginia.

The plans for the Bishops' Crusade in the Diocese, as prepared by the Crusade Committee, of which the Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., is Chairman, provide that the Crusade shall be preached in Richmond in the week beginning January 16, in Charlottesville the following week, and in Alexandria two weeks later.

The Crusaders for Virginia were the Rt. Rev. Philip Cook, D. D., of Delaware, the Very Rev. D. W. Gateson, D. D., of Bethlehem, Penn., and Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrooke, of Washington.

The Crusade in Richmond began with a great mass meeting on Sunday evening, January 16, at the City Auditorium with an attendance of over four thousand people. All of our churches in the city were closed and the music was by the combined choirs.

Every morning during the week was taken up with conferences at various churches, and celebrations of the Holy Communion every day. A conference was held for the clergy at ten-thirty, for women at eleven-fifteen, for business men and another for business women at one o'clock.

The main services were in the evening. Bishop Cook preached at Grace and Holy Trinity. Dean Gateson at St. Paul's, and Dr. Glazebrooke alternating between the two churches. The Rt. Rev. William Cabell Brown, D. D., the Bishop of the Diocese, preached each evening to the Colored congregations at St. Philip's Church. The attendance at all three churches was most encouraging, all of them being practically filled every evening. As an estimate, fully 2,500 persons attended one or more of the Crusade services each day.

The plans of the Crusade provide that the Crusaders shall hold services in Charlottesville and at the University of Virginia during the week beginning January 23. After this the next step will be holding missions in all of the city churches, and in all the towns in the Diocese within the next two months. The Crusade will then after Lent and the drying out of country roads pass to the rural churches of the Diocese, so that a week's mission shall be held, if possible, in every parish in the Diocese before the end of May.

Opening of New Parish House at Varina Church.

Varina Church in Henrico County, which was established as a mission in 1922, has recently erected a parish house which will be used as a place of worship until a church building can be built. In order to secure the most desirable location, the congregation purchased a tract of forty acres, of which ten acres have been set aside for church purposes, and the remainder will be sold. The parish house has been erected at a cost of $8,000.

On Sunday evening, January 9, the opening service was held in the new parish house, being conducted by the Rev. John G. Scott, rector. Addresses were made by the Rev. G. M. Brydon, and by Mr. J. Herbert Mercer, lay-reader, under whose leadership the mission was conducted until the present rector took charge. An address of greeting and good wishes was made by the Rev. L. J. Derby, pastor of the neighboring Laurell Hill Methodist Church. A pleasing feature of the service was the presentation by the vestry of a very handsome gold watch to Mr. William J. Hill, the contractor, who erected the building, and another watch to his son, Mr. Wilfred W. Hill, who took part in the construction, as a token of appreciation of their work.

Great Crusade in Staunton.

During the week beginning January 16 the congregations of the two Staunton Churches—Emmanuel, of which the Rev. J. Lewis Gibbs is rector, and Trinity, the Rev. John J. Gravatt, Jr., rector—cooperated in the conduct of the Bishops' Crusade, which was held in Trinity Church. The Rt. Rev. George W. Davenport, Bishop of Easton, and the Rev. Jennings Wise Hobson, of Bluefield, West Virginia, were the Crusaders and made a deep and lasting impression upon the people of Staunton.

Bishop Davenport was the preacher at the evening mass meetings; the general subjects of his addresses being: first, Repentance; second, Man a Co-Worker With God; third, Evangelism an Essential Characteristic of Christianity; fourth, Following Christ, Though the Way Be Difficult; fifth, The Meaning of Salvation; sixth, Practical Christian Living.

Congregational conferences on various phases of the Christian life were held in the afternoons and were led by the Rev. Mr. Hobson.

On Tuesday evening, January 18, the Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., Bishop of this Diocese, was present and made an address during the service; referring in a touching way to his love for Staunton and its people and his life here for twenty years as rector of Emmanuel Church.

The final service on Friday evening was most inspiring. The music was rendered by the combined choirs of Trinity and Emmanuel, assisted by that of Stuart Hall, the Episcopal School for Young Ladies at Staunton; more than sixty voices. The congregation filled the church to its capacity. The Rev. Mr. Hobson having left in the afternoon to be present at the closing service in his own church at Bluefield, there were in the chancel at Trinity Bishop Davenport and the Rev. Messrs. Gravatt and Gibbs, and the Rev. Theodore H. Evans, of St. John's Church, Waynesboro. Following a stirring sermon by the Bishop, the clergymen knelt at the chancel rail and renewed their ordination vows as a rededication of their lives in the service of the Master. Then the members of the congregation renewed their baptismal vows; responding heartily as the questions in the Service of Baptism were asked by the Bishop. Cards signed by members of the congregation, pledging a rededication of their lives, were collected by the ushers and were presented at the altar by the Bishop, while the choir sang, from the Office of the Holy Communion: "Here we offer and present unto Thee, O Lord, ourselves, our souls and our bodies

Such was the wonderful ending of the three "Central Crusades" in the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia; the other two having been conducted by Bishop Theodore Irving Reese and the Rev. Robert F. Gibson at Lynchburg and by Bishop Davenport and the Rev. Mr. Hobson at Roanoke. These are being followed by missions held by members of the Diocesan clergy in a number of the other towns of the Diocese.

The Church Mission of Help.

Unusual interest was shown in the annual meeting of Church Mission of Help of the Diocese of New York, which was held on January 17. A large gathering, which included prominent representatives of the secular social work agencies of the city, as well as most of the parishes of the Metropolitan District and Westchester County, listened with interest to the reports, which covered not only the work of the year 1926, but gave a history of the development of the Church Mission of Help.

Mrs. L. Frederic Pease, who has been executive secretary of the organization in the New York Diocese since 1916, traced the growth which has followed along the years from 1909, when an appeal was made to the clergy and laity to join in an investigation to determine what the Church is doing, can do and must do on behalf of the wayward girl. From small beginnings an organization has been built up, not in New York alone, but in fifteen Dioceses of the country, and has gained a place of consideration among the national agencies for social work. Mrs. Pease, in her report, made a special point of the way in which the workers of the society, who are trained for their difficult and delicate task, can assist rectors and parish visitors in cases where technical experience is of great value, not only in dealing with the problems of young people, but of families.

The Rev. J. Wilson Sutton, D. D., who was again elected president of the Diocesan Society, voiced the feeling of the trustees and staff, as well as of the members of Church Mission of Help, in expressing their thanks for Mrs. Pease's unusual and able work during the past eleven years and the regret which is felt that, owing to her removal to New Haven, Conn., her resignation as executive secretary must take place this spring.

Mrs. John M. Glenn, who was one of the founders of the society and is now its national president, also spoke of the contribution Mrs. Pease has made to the work both in New York and wherever it has been organized.

In a delightful speech, Mrs. Glenn pointed to new developments which she felt must soon come in the New York work. One of these was the need for a trained man as a staff member to work with the boys and men involved in the problems of girls under care, and another was the need for extension work into all parts of the Diocese. Westchester County is now well organized, and a similar development in the northern and western part of the Diocese must soon follow.

The treasurer's report, presented by Mr. Harry Pelham Robbins, showed that the business organization of the society had kept pace with its growth along other lines. It now operates an annual budget of about $35,000, of which $20,000 is looked for from the Diocese and is credited to the parish budget quotas under the Nation Wide Campaign. The balance is raised mainly by individual memberships and contributions. The income receipts for 1926 were $36,182.82, and disbursements were $34,988.26. An Endowment Fund commenced in 1918 now amounts to over $22,000, and the society also holds very valuable farm property in Delaware County, N. Y., which, with a large house and generous endowment, was the gift of Mrs. James McLean. This was first used as a vacation home during the summer of 1926 and plans are under way for a larger use of the property in the coming year.

Both the president and treasurer asked for more annual members. The growth in the movement depends largely upon the interest and support of those who, as members of the Church Mission of Help, keep in touch with its work, read its publications and attend meetings and services, of which due notice is always given.

Sermons On the Bible.

In Grace Church, New York, at the eleven o'clock morning service, on three Sundays, beginning January 23, the rector, the Rev. Dr. W. Russell Bowie, will preach on The Bible.

His subject for January 23 is How the Bible Grew; January 30, The Bible as the Revelation of Man; February 6, The Bible as the Revelation of God.

Consecration of The Church of the Mediator.

Bishop Manning has consecrated the Church of the Mediator, Bronx, the Rev. John Campbell, Ph. D., rector, for the last thirty years. The occasion was the scene of an outpouring of Church people in the West Bronx. The Mediator is among the older of Bronx parishes, and occupies a difficult field, partly cut into by the Harlem River, the hill of Spuyten Duvil, and many railroad tracks. The church, completed some years ago, is of handsome stone, and has every appointment.

To Promote Church Unity.

Bishop Brent, the Rev. Dr. Brown, of the Presbyterian Foreign Mission Board; Mr. John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and others attended a luncheon held to promote finances to make possible the World Conference on Faith and Order, and reported that $118,000 of the $200,000 asked for, has been subscribed. It was stated that far more money will be needed, and that New York must furnish most of it; for many delegates from poorer communions of Christendom cannot attend unless assisted. The need for Church unity was again emphasized.

New Jersey To Erect Cathedral Bay.

The Diocese of New Jersey has decided to erect one of the Cathedral bays. It does so in part because asked by men who are essentially New Yorkers, but who live in Jersey, and in part out of the sentiment which still follows the fact that once, in the long distant past, New York and New Jersey were one. At one time the land of most of both states was owned by British Duke of York. Of the $150,000 needed for the bay, $33,000 has been subscribed.

The Crusade in Macon.

Christ Church, Macon, was selected for one of the two central Crusades to be held in the Diocese of Atlanta. In accordance with the plans of the National Commission on Evangelism, St. Andrew's Day and the Epiphany were used as times of preparation and during Advent special sermons were preached as the Commission suggested. The Crusade itself started January 9 and continued through January 14, with the Rev. Z. B. T. Phillips, D. D., rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, D. C., and the Rev. James D. Gibson, rector of Trinity Church, Covington, Kentucky, as the Crusaders. Besides the early celebration each day a noon-day service was held, an afternoon conference and an evening service. The total attendance at all these services was 1,989. At the last service the cards of dedication and rededication were signed and their number to date is small. The Crusaders made a deep impression and had the Mission lasted another week its results would have been much greater than they are apparently now.

As a follow-up for the Crusade, an effort is being made to interest the communicants of Macon in the subject of personal evangelism and the hope is that the confirmation classes this coming year will be made much larger as a result of this effort. At Christ Church a question box is being used at the evening services and the sermons at this time are to be in the nature of confirmation instructions in order that a great many who come to these night services and yet have not been confirmed may gain information concerning the Church and her ways. Seventeen copies of Dr. Atwater's book, "The Episcopal Church—Its Message for Men of Today", were sold by the Young People's Service League during the Crusade.

A Committee on Publicity has been added to the vestry committees for 1927 and serving with them there will be an advisory committee consisting solely of newspaper men. Through this new effort the parish is hoping to build a valuable publicity program for the year. Along with this the Woman's Auxiliary is endeavoring to get The Spirit of Missions into each home in the parish and the Young People's Service League is selling The Witness at the Church door each Sunday.

On Sunday, January 16, the new vestry was duly instituted and took the following pledge, standing before the sanctuary rail at the morning service:

"I pledge my allegiance to my Lord and will daily endeavor to walk in His paths. I will pray daily for His strength and blessing and strive constantly to know His will. I will ever strive to increase my faith in Him that, through my life, others may be drawn to acknowledge Him their Saviour and their King.

"To this congregation I pledge my best service in the high office to which

I have been elected. I will administer the affairs of this parish faithfully and to the best of my ability. I will be present at every vestry meeting unless I am prevented from doing so by circumstances over which I have no control. I will be present at the services of the Church and show my interest and render my help in all her activities. It shall always be my purpose to increase the usefulness of my parish that her service may be constantly extended for the salvation of all men everywhere.

"In the Name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost who strengtheneth me. Amen."

New Parish Organized.

The new Parish of St. Elizabeth's, Upper Ridgewood, made out of the western part of the Parish of Ho-Ho-Kus, has been organized and has called as its rector, the Rev. Charles S. Armstrong from Jersey City. The call has been accepted and the rectorship will begin at the end of February.

Building Plans at Summit.

Calvary Church, Summit, the Rev. W. O. Kinsolving, rector, has entered upon a large project of building. This means the enlargement of the present parish house, which was the former church building, so as to meet the needs of the Sunday School and various activities of the parish, and also an extension of the church, which is one of the largest and most beautiful in the Diocese, so as to obtain a suitable choir room, vestry room, etc. The estimates show the need of $135,000. At first the sum seemed so large as to make the undertaking doubtful, but a well planned canvass of the parish made with skill and interest, has brought in subscriptions of $152,000, so that the work will proceed. It will mean the development of the work of one of the most important of the parishes in the Diocese, following an example given within a few years in many places.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

Mission Services.

A Mission of stirring power was conducted at St. Thomas' Church during the week of January 16 by the Rt. Rev. John Richardson, an outstanding preacher from Canada. Services were held several times each day with a great mission service and sermon every evening and large numbers were attracted by the force and spirituality of the Missioner.

Crusade Services.

The Bishops' Crusade in Rockville and vicinity was conducted in Christ Church, Rockville, of which the Rev. M. F. Minnick is rector. Services as arranged consisted of Holy Communion every morning at ten and special services each evening at eight o'clock, with selected preachers. The church remained open all day for prayer and meditation.

Members of the Epiphany Branch of the Girls' Friendly Society attended in a body the first Crusade service at Epiphany Church on Sunday evening, January 23, when Bishop Freeman was the preacher. St. Stephen's Branch attended in a body the service the same hour at St. Margaret's Church, when the Crusade preacher was the Rev. Frederick Flinchbaugh, D. D. The members of the Girls' Friendly Society of St. John's Church, Georgetown, contributed their part to the Crusade by assisting in the choir at all evening Crusade services.

The Rev. J. H. A. Bomberger, whose work at Epiphany Church as assistant rector has been outstanding for its good, served his last Sunday there on January 23. He expects to assume charge of St. Matthew's Parish in Wheeling, West Virginia, on February 1. On Friday evening, January 21, the people of Epiphany tendered him a reception, when all members and friends were given an opportunity to express their appreciation of his services and regret at his going. The new work which Mr. Bomberger takes in Wheeling presents a large field and opportunity for service. Mr. Philip Davis, a student at the Virginia Theological Seminary, will take some of the work which Mr. Bomberger has been doing at Epiphany, especially that of the young people.

The Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes, Canon of Washington Cathedral, has recently returned from the Diocese of West Virginia, where he has been assisting in the work of the Bishops' Crusade.

Raleigh Convocation.

The annual meeting of the Convocation of Raleigh was held in the Church of the Advent, Enfield, on January 18 and 19, with a good attendance of the clergy and with a program full of inspiration and interest. The Ven. Morrison Bethea, Archdeacon of the Convocation, presided. Keen regret was felt over the absence of Bishop Cheshire, who was unable to attend because of illness.

At a service on Tuesday evening, January 18, a sermon that struck a high spiritual note, was preached by the Rev. B. deF. Wagner, of Warrenton. At the concluding service on Wednesday evening an address on the Bishops' Crusade was delivered by the Rev. S. S. Bost, of Durham. This address, of remarkable clarity and spiritual depth, will give great impetus to the movement in the Convocation. The reports of the missionary clergy were heard with interest at the business session. An address by Miss Laura Clark, of Scotland Neck, on the work of the Young People's Service League was a feature on Wednesday afternoon. The Archdeacon was elected treasurer of the Convocation, succeeding Mr. W. L. Wall, whose resignation was reluctantly accepted.

A feature of the Crusade in North Carolina that is expected to prove of great interest are the two dinners for laymen that are to be held in Raleigh and Charlotte during the diocesan conferences. Laymen from all over the Diocese are to be present. The chief speaker will be Mr. O. R. Singleton, of Washington, D. C.

Members of St. Timothy's Parish, Wilson, held a get-together meeting in the parish house on Friday evening, January 14. The rector, the Rev. E. W. Baxter, was master of ceremonies. A visiting clergyman, the Rev. Francis Craighill, of Rocky Mount, made an address on the Bishops' Crusade. W. J. Boykins, the Senior Warden, and Messrs. F. L. Carr and C. E. Moore, of the finance committee, explained the plan to add an up-to-date rectory to the present plant of the parish.

St. Mary's, High Point, is another North Carolina parish that has recently sold its church property for a large sum. A lot ninety-one by fifty feet was sold for $61,444. The parish is now erecting a much larger church at a better site.

Successful Crusade in Charleston.

The bishops and local clergy of Charleston, S. C., are most enthusiastic over the response of the people in the Bishops' Crusade in that center. At the concluding service, on January 14, the Rev. Roderick Jackson, rector of Christ Church, one of the outstanding younger clergy, volunteered for service in Liberia. Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, who was one of the Crusaders, says that the success of the Crusade was largely due to thorough preparation.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. G. McDowell, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Council.

The Annual Council of the Diocese was held at St. Mary's Church, Birmingham (the Rev. O. deW. Randolph, rector), January 18, 19 and 20. All the clergy but three were present, these three being sick. Bishop Beckwith was also unable to be present on account of a bad cold. The lay attendance also was good. The accustomed services were held under the direction of Bishop McDowell, and business was dispatched with general satisfaction and ordered economy, a fine spirit of give and take being exhibited throughout. For the most part the officers of 1926 were returned. The report on the State of the Church was inspiriting. Notable was the notification from Headquarters that Alabama was the one Diocese that had asked to have its apportionment increased.

Very large expenditure on constructive work during the past year was recorded, and provision made for paying off outstanding obligations contracted in a progressive program; and for the forward work of the University of the South.

Naturally, the Bishops' Crusade was to the fore, and plans were formulated to cover the field. Bishop Beckwith had already been asked to devote the week beginning with Sunday, January 23, to a series of preparatory instructions and inspirational addresses, at the Church of the Advent, Birmingham. Kindred arrangements were made for the other centres.

The returns on the Negro educational work, especially in Birmingham, were the best on record, and an extensive program of new and enlarged work announced and provided for on an expansive scale.

Several vacancies in the Diocese, two at best of them involving important institutional objectives have been filled during the past year. Alabama is acknowledged to have a very fine staff of clergy from whatever point of appraisement. It is fair to say that the product of Virginia Seminary was preponderantly in evidence very much to the credit of that institution. The Junior work exhibits most encouraging progress in its departments, especially in its educational aspects.

Sewanee was reported overcrowded, demanding imperative all that was being immediately contemplated and more, the type of youth there being lauded in high terms. Also the DuBose School of the Prophets at Mont Eagle, Tenn., was shown to be going strong. Necrology indicated the loss during the year of several outstanding laymen of proven devotion to the Church, who will long be remembered.

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop.

The Crusade.

Under the direction of the Diocesan Crusade Committee, the Rev. J. S. Douglas, rector of St. Andrew's, Louisville, Chairman, foundations had been well laid for a vigorous presentation of the great evangelistic movement January 9-16. In spite of the bad weather, large and increasing congregations filled the Cathedral each evening, moved to deep interest by the eloquence of the Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop of Kansas, whose messages will not soon be forgotten. Conferences dealing with topics relating to spiritual and practical experiences of Christian life, were held each afternoon, led by the Rev. P. S. Gilman, of Nashville, followed by supper-conferences, for men, Church School workers, and the Y. P. S. L., respectively, conducted by Bishop Wise. At present, the Crusaders, enforced by local aid, are pursuing their work in the larger Church centers within the Diocese, and with the "follow-up" efforts planned, notable results, it is hoped, must ensue.

Advent Offering.

On the second Sunday after Christmas, an attractive service was held in Trinity Mission, one of the oldest in Louisville, when the Advent offerings of the Church Schools were presented, totalling some $400, and applied to the debt on a new parish house recently erected in the mission. The clergy, as well as the schools were well represented, and Bishop Woodcock held the interest of all.

Death of Prominent Layman.

In the recent death of Richard Alexander Robinson, not only the parish of St. Andrew, Louisville, but the Diocese of Kentucky, has lost one of its truest and most faithful soldiers of Christ. Beautiful in spirit, consecrated in life, generous in gifts, he is missed in every department and aim of Church life and fellowship. One of the founders, and ever the friend of the Mission of St. Stephen, now a thriving parish; donor of the building site and chief promoter of the growing Mission of Emmanuel, a vestryman and Senior Warden of his parish, leader of its Men's Bible class, member from its organization of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, long a member of the Diocesan Standing Committee, has he left a record of service rich and full.

Opening of New Church Building.

A new church building at West Frankfort was opened on the Third Sunday after Epiphany. Here the Church has one of its best and most thriving missions in the Southern Illinois Field.

The new building consists of a combination affair, being so arranged that the building can be used for Church services as well as for parish house purposes.

St. Mark's Church has never before had a building of its own, and even without this great help very considerable progress has been made, largely due to the devoted leadership of Archdeacon Weller and of his two assistants —the Rev. Andrew O. Dodge and the Rev. H. R. Ziegler.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D. Bishop

Winter Meeting of the Archdeaconry of Harrisburg.

In an address at the luncheon given in connection with the winter meeting of the Archdeaconry of Harrisburg, at St. Paul's, Harrisburg, on Tuesday, January 11, Bishop Darlington made an earnest plea for the utmost cooperation in the Bishops' Crusade. He emphasized the fact that the object of the Crusade is not to raise money, but to quicken the spiritual life of the Church and to gain new members. He characterized it as one of the greatest movements ever started by the Church in America.

A feature of the Archdeaconry was the Publicity Institute conducted by the Rev. P. A. Dales, acting for the Rev. W. T. Sherwood, Chairman of the Diocesan Department of Publicity. The meeting was addressed by Mr. V. H. Hummel Berghaus, Editor of The Harrisburg Evenings News, whose subject was "Publicity from the Editor's Standpoint". Mr. Berghaus was followed by the Rev. Oscar F. R. Tredor, D. D., rector of St. Stephen's, Harrisburg. The addresses were followed by questions and general discussion which proved profitable and enlightening.

In view of the crisis in Mexico, and the fact that millions of dollars are being spent for propaganda, the object of which is to precipitate a break between the United States and the Mexican Government, a resolution was adopted, urging the Government not to confuse the voice of the propagandists with that of the nation, and expressing the conviction that the problems of Mexico are solely and purely the domestic affairs of the Mexican people.

In the evening there was held a General Missionary Service. Addresses were made by the Rev. C. S. Knickle, of Mount Joy; the Rev. Charles E. Berghaus, of Marietta; Bishop Darlington, and the Rev. P. A. Dales.

In connection with the Archdeaconry there was held "A Day of Study Classes" for the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese. The classes were conducted by Miss Laura F. Boyer, of New York, using as a text-book, "Beyond City Limits".

The day began with a celebration of the Holy Communion, the Rev. P. A. Dales being celebrant, assisted by the Ven. William Dorwart.

Rt. Rev. J. N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop.

The Annual Convention.

Owing to a serious breakdown of the heating plant of St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral, the fifty-third Annual Convention was transferred to Grace Church. This was true also of the Woman's Auxiliary, meeting at the same time.

The Convention was called to order Tuesday afternoon, January 18, and the preliminary organization made. Supper was served by the Cathedral League and at this time the Rev. Lewis B. Whittemore, the new rector of Grace Church, was given a cordial welcome.

At night a great religious service was held in Grace Church. The vested choir of sixty, to which was added the clergy of the Diocese, made an imposing procession. The church was filled; and the music, which was familiar, was sung heartily by choir and congregation.

After several disappointments in securing an outside preacher, Bishop McCormick stepped into the breach. His subject was: Christ the Open Door, and was a most splendid presentation of the Person and Influence of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Wednesday morning the usual memorial Communion Service was held, with most of the members of the two conventions receiving.

At this service the Golden Book of Remembrance was blessed and hallowed. This is a beautifull bound volume containing the names of several hundred persons for whom memorial gifts were made in the recent Jubilee of the Diocese; much interesting matter concerning the Jubilee, and a list of all donors to the Thank Offering.

The Rev. James E. Wilkinson, Ph. D., was re-elected Secretary and the Rev. W. K. Chidester, Assistant. Mr. A. A. Anderson was re-elected Treasurer of the Convention, and Mr. F. A. Gorham, Treasurer of the Association. Mr. Gorham has been the efficient treasurer for more than fifty years.

The Standing Committee remains the same, except that the Rev. L. B. Whittemore takes the place of the Rev. G. P. T. Sargent, removed from the Diocese. The same is true of members of the Executive Council.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod: The Rev. Messrs. W. G. Studwell, C. E. Jackson, J. H. Bishop, L. R. Vercoe; Messrs. W. F. Tunks, L. B Whittemore, W K. Chidester, R. F. Keicher; Messrs. E. W. Hunting, Fred Twamley, C. W. Centner, Wallace Osborne.

The attendance was larger than usual, and much business was transacted, the most important item was the acceptance of the report of the Committee on Canons, with slight changes. This provided for the complete revision of the Canons.

There was much to encourage: the amount pledged to the National Council was paid in full; the pledges for 1927 have an increase over 1926.

The fifty-fourth Annual Convention will meet in St. Thomas' Church, Battle Creek, January 17, 1928.

Collect for Fourth Sunday After

O Lord, Who knowest us to be set in the midst of so many and great dangers, that by reason of the frailty of our nature we cannot always stand upright; Grant to us such strength and protection as may support us in all dangers, and carry us through all temptations; through Jesus Christ Our Lord, Amen.

The Purification of St. Mary the Virgin.
(February 2.)

Almighty and ever-living God, we humbly beseech Thy Majesty, that, as The Only Begotten Son was this day presented in the temple in substance of our flesh, so we may be presented unto Thee with pure and clear hearts, by the same Thy Son, Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

Crusaders.

Josephine T. Flournoy.

In the olden days Crusaders
Battled bravely for the Cross;
Far from home—'mid countless dangers,
Fought and bled and suffered loss.

Faring forward with a purpose,
Neither death nor hell could daunt,
Facing peril and privation,
Meeting with disease and want.

Yet in earnest exaltation
In the ties of brotherhood,
Christian nations marched together
To the place where Christ had stood.

And for many years Crusaders
Died by thousands while they were Fighting to regain possession
Of the Holy Sepulchre.

Yet for all their knightly valor,
Only once do men record
That they won the tomb of Jesus
By the wielding of the sword.

And though some may count it failure,
Yet their noble sacrifice
Made the world they lived in better
By their loyal zeal for Christ.

Since then centuries have folded
Up the years and passed away;
But the call to be Crusaders
Comes to each of us today.

Not, oh, not with man-made weapons,
Nor in polished coats of mail;
But arrayed in God's own armor
Shall His messengers prevail.

May we then, O blessed Jesus,
By our lives and acts make known,
That we, too, are brave Crusaders,
Worthy to be called Thine own.

Help us with Thy gracious Spirit,
As we journey day by day,
Soldiers of the Cross of Jesus,
Marching on in bright array.

The Supreme Reward.

It may seem difficult for some to understand what the Apostle Paul meant when he declared that, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable". During my seminary days at Yale, the late Dr. Newton W. Clark, perhaps the greatest American theologian of the past generation, came to deliver a lecture before the students on the subject, "The Significance of the Doctrine of Immortality". During his lecture, he emphasized the idea that the satisfactions the Christian experienced in this life should be enough to cause every rational person to want to be a Christian—that if there were no future life, the Christian would be supremely happy in the present. At the close of his lecture, Dr. Clark gave opportunity for any one who wished to ask questions. Among the questions asked was this one as a reaction to the declaration of Dr. Clark that the Christian's satisfactions in the present life should be enough even if there were no future life, to cause every rational person to want to be a Christian. "If," said the questioner, "that is true, how do you explain Paul's statement: 'If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable'?" Dr. Clark's reply was, "I don't know what Paul meant".

I related that experience one time in addressing a group of laymen. After the address, a man who had been living the Christian life for only a few months, came to me and said, "I don't see why Dr. Clark gave that answer to the question". And then this clear-minded layman ventured to answer the question that the distinguished theologian would not attempt to answer. And this is what the layman said: "The desire for a future life becomes stronger by reason of fellowship with Christ. And if after years of such fellowship with Christ, it certainly would crush a person's heart to learn that the grave would terminate that fellowship so divine, so inspiring. And then besides," said this layman, "Paul was talking to the early Christians who, because of their faith in Christ, were threatened with every kind of persecution, driven from their homes, chained and imprisoned, beaten with stripes, burned at the stake or thrown to the wild beasts in the arena to entertain the godless mobs. They were threatened with all of this simply because of their faith in Christ. And," continued this layman, "Paul knew that if that was all their faith in Christ meant to them, if they had nothing but persecution in this life and no hopes of a future life with Christ, they were of all men most miserable." And the layman was right.

But nineteen centuries of Christian influence has changed everything relating to the Christian life. And today the Christian faces a different world from what the early Christians faced. He faces no such persecutions as did the early Christian. In fact the present day grants the Christian special favors because of his faith. And even if there were no future life, the Christian of today believes that the reward for Christian living in the here and now is an abundantly worth-while investment. To be conscious that I am trying sincerely to do the will of God, and that I hate what is wrong, and that I love what is right—that consciousness in itself is a reward worth more than anything the world has to offer.

To live in such a way that one's life is a blessing to others, a credit to the church, and an honor to God—a life that makes a person able to look into a clear looking glass squarely, without blinking an eye, and say "there is an honest person"; "there is a person who loves God"; "there is a person who loves all mankind"; "there is a person who in his heart is what he professes to be to the world"; for one to be able to do that conscientiously is worth more than all the rewards the world can give.

If I knew for a certainty that death ended all; that when I shall cease to look out of these windows through which God lets me see the beauties of His world; and when my voice shall be forever stilled, and when this body shall be cold in death; if I knew that the grave would forever keep me its prisoner of dust, and that there was no immortality of the soul; if I knew for a certainty all this, still, still, I would want to live the Christian life. The reward of a clear conscience before God and man is a thousand times worth the investment of faith. In fact a person cannot afford to refuse to live the Christian life. The rewards of the present claim the faith of every rational being.

Right living is its own reward. To be what God wants us to be; to try conscientiously to apply our religion to every relationship of life; to do what God wants us to do; to go where God wants us to go; to say what God wants us to say, and thus to keep fellowship with Christ—that is indeed the life triumphant—the life victorious, and the life that shall be eternal—the supreme reward for Christian living.—R. C. H., in Christian Sun.

Recollections of a Minister's Daughter.

Chapter Nine.

Anna Swan Reynolds.

The day following the Donation Party being Sunday, it was indeed a welcome "day of rest", for the whole family at the rectory were very much worn out with the excitement attendant upon the unusual "pleasure"; and we children were on our very best behavior all day, beginning with the prompt attendance at Sunday School—no small endeavor; the getting ready, dressing of the children and a thousand other things that are the every-day occurrence in a minister's family, if it is made up of the number that composed ours. But today we were on our most amiable attitude toward all the parish who had helped to bring us to this state of bliss, for after the day of Sunday duties our mother had promised us a great treat at supper, and all our good intentions pointed toward that.

She—our beloved mother—loved to indulge us when she could, and as for my father, I often think in looking back to that beautiful time of childhood happiness that I have never known such solicitude and generosity for our pleasure—denying himself everything and anything that we should have every innocent pleasure within his power to give.

We had not fared very well the night before at supper, but we knew better than to utter a complaint, knowing any breach of hospitality, or the least criticism of our guests would mean severe reprimand and punishment; so tonight we saw our Sunday-night supper table graced with a fine, large cake, covered with a white icing, which had been "overlooked" at the party—I strongly suspect it was pushed on to the high pantry shelf by our friend, the little maid, Eliza, with thoughts of us in her kind heart. I find it even now, after long years have passed, hard to write with serenity of the trial that came upon us, and the darkness that fell over us.

Supper was in full progress, and my mother had just taken a knife in her hand to cut the beautiful cake, when our waiting maid, Eliza, came to her side and in a most mysterious half-whisper announced that our neighbor, Mrs. N. had sent little Polly over for "one of the left-over cakes". There was only one!

Just then the door opened and that wretched child, Polly, stood with wide-open, staring eyes, and wider open mouth, gazing over our sumptuous board.

With their usual courtesy our parents received her, and asked what it was she wanted: "Why, why," said Polly, stammering sadly as she was confronted by many amazed and angry eyes, "mother says we have company come unexpectedly to supper, and please would you let her have the big iced cake?" (Accent on the iced.)

My brother Bob, unable to contain himself, shouted at the top of his voice, "No, of course not! We are eating it ourselves! Can't you see?"

But, alas! the suspended cake knife in my mother's hand was quietly laid on the table, and her gentle voice said, "Certainly, dear, you are just in time. I was just going to cut it for our own supper". Even our gentle mother could not suppress the regret in her tones.

My father's dark eyes looked strangely dewy behind his glasses as they rested on one after the other of "the olive branches", who looked as if a tempest had suddenly descended on their heads. My little sister, of course, began to weep copiously. I remember I jumped to my feet and stood before Polly with fire in my glance, and deep anger in my attitude. Alas! my rebellious heart!

Every child, big and little, was up in arms, and as Polly departed with our cake, a wail went up that rings in my ears to this day.

Gently, with many a word of counsel and advice, my beloved father led us for a little while on the difficult pathway of life; and although we found many a stumbling block, our parents had tried to install into their children the spirit of generosity, love and sympathy.

They taught us to be courteous to the elderly; to be "brave men and gentle women" in the true sense; to be tender to little children; to care for and sympathize with the sick; to draw near to "all that call upon us; all who sat within the shadow of death", that we, too, might find peace when the shadow of life's evening drew its curtain about us; but most of all, they taught us always to depend on our Bible and Prayer Book to teach us the true way of life here and hereafter; to grow familiar with and love the beautiful hymns of the Church.

The happiest hours to every one of us and the sweetest memories are of those evenings when we gathered around the piano, and sang from the joys of our hearts.

My father's wise counsel and my mother's sweet sympathy remain with the minister's children one and all; and the hardest trial of their lives, and their deepest grief, and greatest loss was when they left us to enter the Everlasting Rest of Paradise.

Epiphany.

When in that far-off past eternity
The Bright and Morning Star proclaimed the dawn,
Confusion trembled into harmony:
Mankind appeared; the universe was born.

Out in the Orient hails the herald-star,
And beckons where its Maker helpless lies:
By Eastern worshippers it brings from far
To Infant feet the treasures of the wise.

Light of the World, arising on our night,
Shine on, nor let Thy bright effulgence cease,
To them that sit in darkness giving light,
And guiding us into the way of peace!

Till with the Holy Angels manifest
Epiphany Thou shalt in power renew,
And like the lightning shines from East to West
Reveal Thy unveiled Glory to the view!

Two Hymns.

Josephine Corcilius.

Two of our familiar hymns, "Sun of My Soul", and "Lead Kindly Light", were written by the greatest leaders of the "Oxford Movement" in England nearly a century ago—John Keble and John Henry Newman. These hymns express the religious thought of the time, for what the Church sings is her crystallized Faith. So popular became these hymns that the whole Christian world has been singing them for a hundred years.

Very reluctantly Keble published his Christian Year", which is a series of hymns, one for every Sunday and Saints' Day (among them "Sun of My Soul"), saying these hymns were too sacred to him to be made public during his life time, for in them he had "painted his own heart". Hence the appeal of "Sun of My Soul" to human hearts. This is why it has been sung by Protestant and Roman alike, sung without distinction of creed, the round world over in every speech, by every voice raised in Christian worship. No hymnal is complete without this hymn of Keble.

"It was the most soothing, tranquillizing, subduing work of the day," wrote Newman of his "dear John Keble's" Christian Year. "If poems can be found to enliven dejection and to comfort in anxiety, to cool the over-sanguine, to refresh the weary and to awe the worldly, to instill resignation into the impatient and calmness into the fearful and agitated, they are these."

Six years later Newman wrote "Lead Kindly Light", which, as a hymn, surely measures up to his own standard and on which again all Christians can agree. His is not the calm which characterizes Keble's hymn, but his the deep humility that raises not so much as his eyes unto heaven, and every line trembles with the struggle of the pilgrim seeking after truth, longing for deeper faith to take "one step", but that step higher, for "growth is the one evidence of life".

In this hymn Newman also painted his heart and touched the great human heart, the world-pain.

Eagerly the gentle Keble watched and guided the trend of the "Oxford Movement", grieved that the best theologians strayed so far to vindicate the Medieaeval Church and in this darkness he prayed, "It is not night when Thou art near".

As a concession ecclesaistics restored the symbolism and ritual of the ancient Church, but one after another of the best thinkers wavered, hesitated, seceded.

Finally also Newman went over to Rome, and Keble's heart was broken. His own sun illumined soul remained true to the Faith of his Fathers and his Country.

Newman "mid the encircling gloom" had walked the vice media as long as his conscience allowed, praying for "Kindly Light to guide him home".

Earlier in life, when on his travels, he had visited the Eternal City, whither all roads lead, and had written "Rome is the most wonderful place on earth, but, the Roman Catholic religion is polytheistic, degrading and idolatrous".

Had Newman's impressionable mind on that visit been subconsciously but deeply influenced by the surpassing beauty of the great temple, the rich vestments sparkling with rare gems, the majesty of the symbolism, the unquestioning arrogance, the final authority on dogma, the infallibility on all matters of morality and doctrine?

We can never know.

He wandered many long hesitating, years, groping his way "O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent" ere finally "these angel faces smiled".

For Our Sakes Became Poor.

"Though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor." The Wisdom of God and the Power of God has undertaken our deliverance, and in order to accomplish it seeks no alliance with the wisdom, the wealth, the nobility of earth, but intelligently takes the lowest place as that best adapted for carrying out His purposes of love and grace. Have we learned this lesson? Are we willing to learn it? "As the Father hath sent Me into the world, even so send I you". Or, are we going to repeat the oft-made experiment —which always has failed and always must fail—of trying to improve upon God's plan? The poverty and weakness of Apostolic missions necessitated reliance on God alone, and issued in wondrous success; and in modern missions it will invariably be found that in proportion to the non-reliance on wealth, or education, or political power, and in proportion to the self-emptying with which they are carried on, the issues are encouraging. The persecutions of Burmah and Madagascar, and the dangers of labor among the cannibals of the South Sea Islands, have proved no barriers to success, but have been the very conditions of blessing. Can those who at home and abroad are ambitious for the highest success as fishers of men find a wiser or safer example than that of Him who called His first disciples to leave all and follow Him, and who Himself, "Though He was rich, yet for our sakes became poor?"—J. Hudson Taylor.

The Book For Boys.

The Bible is a Book for boys
As any one can prove
It's full of just such stories
As boys are sure to love.

There's Abraham, who left his home
To follow God's command
And Joseph, Moses, David, too,
And Solomon, so grand.

There's Daniel and his Hebrew friends,
Who to their God were true
Through fiery furnace, lion's den,
And all men's hatred, too.

Then Prophets brave who warned of sin
In no uncertain tone
Who faced Kings' wrath but stood their ground,
Trusting in God alone.

The story of our Lord Himself,
Of Peter, John, and Paul—
Oh, the Bible is the Book for boys!
The best, best Book of all.

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

The Boy Jesus.

M. L. G.

When Jesus was a little boy He lived in a town built upon the side of a long hill. When work was done in the carpenter's shop He could, perhaps, climb the hill—an extinct volcano—and look out over the plain of Esdraelon, once the battleground of His nation, but now peaceful, with sheep-pastures, and small villages. Far away to the west, if the air were clear, could be seen Mt. Carmel, and even a glimpse of the blue Mediterranean.

We can picture Him there, watching the sunset, perhaps, the evening wind in His face and in His heart a great growing consciousness of His mission on earth. Some day His Father would call and He would go out from His village home to preach peace, to live love, to give Himself to His own, whatever that giving might cost. We think He could not then have known that His neighbors of Nazareth would take Him to that very hill to cast Him down; that He would find the great Temple to which His boy's heart turned in passionate loyalty, a den of thieves; that His heart must be pierced with denial by one of His friends and betrayed by another; that at last His dying sigh must be breathed out upon a cross. But may He not have pondered some great word which He had learned from the Rabbi who gave the village boys their schooling? Perhaps the saying of Micah about Bethlehem—"Out of thee shall he come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel". It was by this prophecy, as His Mother may have told Him, that those strange visitors from the East were directed to find Him in Bethlehem. Or it may have been the ringing prophecy from the great Isaiah which He would one day read to these neighbors in Nazareth, from the same roll the Rabbi had used in teaching Him —"The spirit of the Lord is upon Me". Read about that morning in the synagogue, or get some one to read it to you.

But Jesus was a real boy, and He would enjoy a quick run down the hillside, and would come in hungry for supper, and ready for a frolic with the little brothers and sisters before bedtime. Think of Him, children, as One who understands you because He has been just your age; and you may want to make your own the petition of the little six-year-old boy who prayed, "Dear Jesus, make me like you were when you were six years old".

The Bubble Pipe.

"I will blow bubbles on the Castle Terrace, where they will show the bright colors of the sunshine!" cried the Princess Elaine to the Royal Footman. "Carry hither the bowl of suds!"

So he obediently took up the heavy blue bowl of soap-suds and followed the Princess out-of-doors to a table which stood near the vine-covered stone wall that edged one side of the terrace. The Princess herself carried the pretty bubble pipe that the Royal Godfather had given to her only that morning. Impatiently she filled the pipe with suds, and blew at the stem with all her might. But only gurgly little bubbles came out and dripped unpleasantly on to the terrace pavement. Again she filled the pipe and blew with all her might, and the same thing happened.

"This bubble pipe isn't any good!" cried Elaine, throwing the pretty toy right over the vine-covered stone wall which edged one side of the terrace. "I'll play something else."

But nothing else suited her, and she stood grumbling about that when she caught sight of a big color-pictured bubble floating up in the sunshine at the other side of the wall. In it she could see a gay reflection of the castle and the gardens and the sky. While she gazed, another bubble, even larger than the first, floated up in the sunshine beyond the vine-covered wall.

"I'll find out where they come from!" cried Elaine, climbing a strong vine-stem to peer over the wall. She saw it was far, far down on the other side to a yard where a girl was blowing the bubbles which rose in the sunny air.

"Fetch me that bubble pipe!" called the Princess imperiously to the Royal Footman. "Mine was not good, and I want to blow bubbles this instant."

A few minutes later the Royal Footman returned to the terrace with a bubble pipe. Elaine grabbed it from him and rushed to her blue bowl of soap-suds. But again when she filled this pipe she got only unpleasant gurgly bubbles that dripped to the pavement. Angrily she threw the pipe over the vine-covered wall, and tried to forget how very much she wanted to blow big color-pictured filmy balls. But before she could forget, another lovely bubble rose in the sunny air beyond the terrace wall.

"That girl must have cheated me by sending a different pipe from what she was using," thought Elaine. "Or perhaps my soap-suds isn't just right to film. I'll find out."

So she climbed a strong vine-stem until she could peer over the wall and call to the girl in the yard far, far down on the other side.

"Bring thy pipe up here!" she cried imperiously.

"Just watch me!" answered the girl, putting the pipe in her apron pocket. "There are steps cut in the stones on this side of the wall."

It didn't take a minute for her to climb those steps and jump down on to the pavement of the Castle Terrace.

"I've always longed to climb up to play with thee, dear Princess!" she cried. "But my father said I must never, never try to climb the steps unless I was asked by thee."

"I saw thy lovely bubbles," said Elaine. "My pipe was not any good, and I want to blow subbles this instant. And it looked just like thine."

"Mayhap they are the very same," answered Rose quietly. "This pipe seemed twice to drop from the sky while I was playing in the yard."

"Oh, I threw it away two times!" gasped the Princess. "Then the trouble must be with my soap-suds."

"It does not seem as if suds in such a lovely bowl could be at fault," said Rose. "Mine was in a cracked cup. Perhaps thou took too much of it into the pipe at once. Take it and try again."

So Elaine dipped the pipe lightly in the suds. "And blow slowly!" whispered Rose..

As the Princess blew, the most beautiful bubble she had ever seen grew and grew until it broke away from the pipe and floated off in the sunny air. It was bright with pictures, and drifted out of sight without bursting.

"Now thou shalt blow one!" cried Elaine, putting the pipe in Rose's brown hand. "Thou hast taught me not to be greedy and impatient; and we will have glad, happy times together!"—Our Little Ones.

The Honest Cheetah.

Louis Tucker.

Once upon a time there was an honest Cheetah, of a frank and open disposition, who did not understand the wickedness of the world. His business was to catch antelopes, and he lived at the court of the Ahkoond of Swat, where he was born and brought up. He was honest by nature and not by training, which is, of course, the very best honesty of all: and he had white teeth and yellow hair and looked something like a coach-hound and something like a leopard.

The Ahkoond of Swat was a man with a dark skin and a freckled character; and he wished to get rid of a good man whom the British Resident would not let him kill. So he made him keeper of the beasts and set him to clean out the cheetah's cage. The good man recognized the cheetah at once as having an honest disposition, and the cheetah recognized him at once as being a good man; and so they got on very nicely together. The reason the beasts need a keeper was that the last one had stolen their mutton-chops, so the honest cheetah had tried to eat him instead. It seemed to the cheetah the only reasonable thing to do, but it made the Ahkoond think that he must be very savage. For three successive and consecutive days the Ahkoond came down at cleaning-time to see the cheetah eat the good man, and went back disappointed; and third time he struck the cheetah through the bars with his cane.

Next day a globe-trotter with magnificent letters of introduction came along, and he was such an important globe-trotter that the Ahkoond felt that he had to be entertained. So he gave an antelope hunt to show off his trained cheetahs. They took the cheetahs, blindfolded, in a cart, to where they could see the antelope, as is the custom. Then they took the bandage off the honest cheetah's eyes and pointed out the antelope to him; for cheetahs usually hunt the first thing they see. But the first thing that caught the honest cheetah's eye was the white turban of the Ahkoond. So he started in to hunt the Ahkoond of Swat; it seemed the only reasonable thing to do, especially since the Ahkoond had struck him with a cane.

The Ahkoond did not understand that he was being hunted. He thought, at first, that the Cheetah was after the antelope. When, at last, he saw what was happening, he spurred his horse to get out of the way; but the horse was afraid and reared and threw him. Then the globe-trotter drew his pistol and fired six times at the cheetah and missed. Things would have gone very hard with the Ahkoond of Swat if the good man, who, as soon as he saw what was the matter, had begun running very hard to catch up, had not come just then and thrown his turban over the cheetah's eyes and blindfolded him. This was a very brave and dangerous thing to do, for the cheetah might have shaken off the bandage and bitten him to death, but he did not. Then the globe-trotter gave the good man an English sovereign, which was the first piece of gold he had ever owned. Then all the courtiers talked in chorus about how brave the good man was, and the Ahkoond of Swat dusted off his turban and got on his horse and listened to them. When they were through he said:

"Give the keeper of the cheetah ten blows of a stick for carelessness. Give the man who saved my life a piece of gold a day as long as he lives; and kill the cheetah, because he is dangerous." and then he rode away.

So they gave the good man ten blows of a stick, because he was the keeper of the cheetah, and a piece of gold because he had saved the Ahkoond's life. They told him that he should have another piece every day, but he did not believe them because, being a good man, he knew truth when he heard it. So he ran away and took the cheetah with him to save its life and they traveled through all India giving exhibitions at local fairs, and were very comfrtable and friendly; and if they have not died they are living that way yet.

The Storm Game.

Dorothy had come over to play with Tilly, Billy, and little Joe and they were having such a good time under the big apple trees in the orchard at a doll's tea party. Billy and Joe had found a smooth piece of board and with four big stones for legs to make a fine table. A handkerchief was the tablecloth and Tilly had arranged the doll dishes.

Dorothy had just been picking some curly green leaves for the lettuce salad when she stopped suddenly.

"Oh, dear!" she said, "was that thunder?"

The children all listened and, yes, pretty soon there it came again—a rumbly, growly noise.

"I'm scared," exclaimed Dorothy, looking about ready to cry.

"Are you afraid of thunderstorms?" asked Tilly. "We used to be afraid too, but now we like them!"

Dorothy was so surprised to think that anybody could like a thunderstorm that she forgot to run home.

"Yes," added Billy, "mother makes it a game now, and no matter what she's doing, she stops and plays the game with us whenever it storms."

Dorothy was so curious about the new game that she waited to hear more, and then a big loud crash of thunder made her jump and big fat raindrops began tumbling down.

The children grabbed up the dolls and the dishes and ran into the house.

"Mother!" they called, "the game! it's time for our game, and Dorothy is going to play it with us today."

Mother was busy sewing, but as soon as she heard a big clap of thunder she said, "Why sure enough!" and folding up her work right away she helped the children push the big lounge up close to the window, and they all sat down.

"We are all like thunderstorms now," explained mother, "because that's our special time to play together. We always sit here and watch for the beautiful lightning and listen to the different kinds of thunder."

"Did you know, Dorothy, that all the lightnings are different?" asked Joe.

Just then mother called out, "Oh, look at that one!" And away over in the sky above the trees was a beautiful jagged line of pinkish light Billy began to count and he got up to sixteen before the thunder came.

"That's part of the game," said Tilly, "we like to watch and see which thunder belongs to which lightning." "Oh, there's a piece like a big fork!" called Joe, and before she knew it, Dorothy was counting too, just as excited, and listening for the hunder.

They watched the big, bumpy clouds roll up, and then the rain came splashing down.

Before she knew it, Dorothy was right over against the window trying to see just one more flash of lightning somewhere—but the storm was over.

And it was too wet to go back into the orchard to play—

"But, anyway," said Dorothy, "I want to go right home and tell mamma how beautiful the lightning really is, and after this I guess she'll play the game with me, too! I hope there will be another storm soon!"—Mary J. Gregory, in The Presbyterian Advance.

The Snow Baby.

Robert and Margaret were going home from the little red schoolhouse, having a great deal of fun jumping into the drifts and trying to write their names with sticks in the soft snow. "Let's play we are pioneers and are making our trail," said Robert.

"Like the story Miss Agnes read to the history class this afternoon," said Margaret.

"What's that bundle lying there in the field?" said Robert, returning out of breath from wading a deep drift. "It looks like fur or something."

Of course, they waded into the field and were astonished to find it was a little baby well wrapped in a fur robe and fast asleep. "A snow baby!" said Margaret, picking up the tiny bundle. 'Maybe it came straight down from heaven with the snowflakes."

They hurried home, breathless with the work of carrying the bundle and the surprise of the whole thing. To think of going home from school on a lonely little road and finding a baby very much like their little baby sister at home! It seemed quite like a fairy story.

Mrs. Dalton was just as much surprised as were the children. "Were there no tracks near the baby?" she asked. "Was nobody in sight? Had there been an accident of any kind?"

The children could only shake their heads to all questions. "Somebody is greatly worried and will be searching for this dear little baby," said Mrs. Dalton. "I will telephone to town and find out if there has been any accident."

"Please don't!" cried Robert and Margaret. "We want to keep it ourselves."

"What if it were our baby?" asked their mother.

Nobody in town had heard anything about an accident at the railroad crossing or about a baby being lost or stolen, so the children began to dance up and down with delight, thinking it would be theirs to keep.

"What is that noise?" asked Mrs. Dalton, in the midst of the joyful hubbub. "It sounds like a dinner bell ringing."

It was not one dinner bell alone, but three or four all jangling at once from the farmhouses in the group across the fields. Presently the telephone jangled, too, and a woman's voice at the other end of the line asked that Mr. Dalton and all the neighbors get out at once and help hunt the Parker baby. The woman was weeping and could hardly make herself understood, but there were broken words about children and sled and freezing cold and—but Mrs. Dalton waited to hear no more.

"We have the baby here, safe and sound," she said. "The children found it in the field by the railroad track."

So the snow baby, still sleeping, was delivered in a short time to the anxious mother. Mrs. Parker was ill and the baby had been staying with its grandmother for a few days, but she grew so homesick to see her baby that she sent Bob and Julia with their little sled to bring the little girl home at least for a few hours. How it happened they never knew, but when they reached the farmhouse the little bundle was not there. It had probably bounced off in the soft snow when they went over a rough place in the field. The wind was drifting the snow and they could not follow their tracks back to the place where they had left the road. Of course, every one feared that the baby would be frozen when they found it, but it had never been wakened by the jolt.

Mrs. Parker sent a message to Robert and Margaret, telling them how very thankful she was for their kindness. "I shall always think that you saved my baby's life," she said. "I shall always call her my snow baby after this."—Hilda Richmond.

A Tryst.

Anne Pierce.

The red rose sighed by the garden gate,
A sad sweet sigh and said I wait.
In my crimson robe—a robe of state—
For my dear one to pass by.

The tall white lily breathed no reply,
Serenely lovely and holding high
A saint-like form without a dye
To sully its snowy purity.

The lowly pansy in its humble bed
Turned up its face and meekly said,
"The dear one will never turn his head
To look at my form so lowly".

But the dear one came on his chubby feet;
He smiled at the rose a smile so sweet,
He tip-toed a kiss the lily to greet,
Then he plucked the pansy gaily.

Stains.

One day Ruth came home from school with three stains on her pretty white dress. When mother saw them, she said:

"You may get them out yourself. I'll tell you how."

So Ruth rubbed the cocoa stain in cold water. That disappeared. Then she poured boiling water through the strawberry stain. The red turned to pink, then faded away. The ink stain was hardest of all. Mother gave her something in a bottle that banished the ugly black. Some drops from another bottle kept the acid from eating the cloth.

It is easy to take stains out of cloth, but do you know how to take stains out of thoughts?

There is a quarrel stain. Your playmate does something that you do not like. Soon there is an ugly, brown stain on your friendship. You can make it disappear by pouring on the water of remembrance. Think of all the fun you have had together and of all the kind things which your playmate has done. Away will go the quarrel stain.

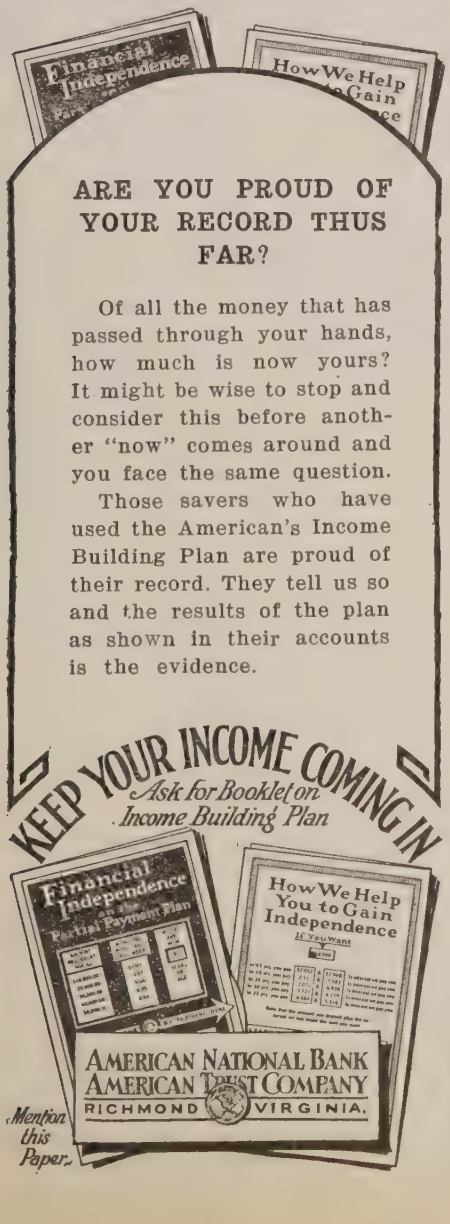
Some stains are very hard to get out if you let them get old. There is the bad word stain. It is hard to get that out if you keep thinking about the words or even repeating them. Take them out at once. Think of last Sabbath's Golden Text or your favorite stories when even words want to say themselves over.

Whenever you make a thought stain, see if you can remove it as quickly as the boiling water faded the strawberry stain.—Dew Drops.

The Value of Rest.

A tired worker recently said to me, "I never sit down during the day; if I did I would go to sleep". And sleep was the thing supremely needed!

Restlessness seems to be an addiction of the age. On every side is the evidence of a purposeless mania to "go somewhere" and "do something", as if a few calm and unhurried hours or a normal quota of sleep were actual crime, to be averted by any means and at all costs! The beach resorts, the city streets, the boulevards and all public places are like maelstroms day and night. Even the veranda voices of the more conservative continue far into the night with insistent regularity. Rest seems a reproach and sleep a sin against time. And so people "go", in their folly wiser than God who appointed at least sixteen waking hours a week apart from worldly distraction, and proved to the testing of science that a third of the average man's day should be spent in sleep. But such is the obstinacy of man (and this is the great hindrance to the possibility and permanence of divine healing) that even when body or mind breaks down under continued abuse, the fevered spirit within rebels against nature's ultimatum and refuses to be reconciled to reasonable obedience!



What, then, about the SOUL, the real, spiritual man within, to whom such treatment, so unlike its divine intent, is accorded by the outward, physical man? No time is allowed for searching out the truth of God. Growth in grace is dwarfed almost before its birth. Is it any wonder that so few people ever attain or even visualize the simplest possibilities of a spiritual life? Time is too precious! The far away future is better suited to such vague and visionary pursuits! And more and more, deeper and deeper, there is moulded into the features and evidenced in the lives of these worldlings (who include a pitiful majority of supposedly Christian people) the ignorance, the folly, the distraction and distortion of a joyless, hopeless, Godless life.

What is sleep really for and what does it actually accomplish? For the body, of course, it is the greatest of all restoratives. And the reason the body rests is because the mind is at rest and does not commend it to conscious action and effort. The unconscious mind does not worry or fear or imagine evil of any sort. In sleep, therefore, the spirit, or inner self, is free from distressing, tempting, corrupting influences and contacts. The insistent will is latent and the surrendered spirit subject only to the unhindered working of its own creative Spirit. Call it the trysting time of ministering angels if you will. It is GOD'S OPPORTUNITY to enter into the soul, to completely infuse human life with His presence, to fill us with the potential goodness of His great love, to do for us, in body, mind and spirit, what our waking hours but partially and imperfectly permit. And so, living and working in harmony with Him, we may gladly and thankfully close the shutters of each well-spent day, calm in the confidence that each morning will bring us God's miracle-gift of new and ready strength,

How supremely essential this daily gift of divine goodness is! Do not begrudge God His opportunity! Do not be impatient or resentful when nature even enforces its rest upon you! Realize, as you seek the daily fellowship of the blessed Christ in faithfulness to His laws, that the sin of disobedience in this matter of rest and sleep is quite as responsible and quite as effective in the progress of life as are those other sins of omission and commission of which you are more readily aware.—Rev. P. S. Gilman, in The Nazarene.

Enduring Treasures.

A Churchman in Minnesota recently sent $25 to the national treasurer for the general work of the Church. A note from the treasurer acknowledging the gift mentioned that these were lean months, which prompted the giver to send by return mail a United States Bond for $100, saying, "I am thankful to be able to send the enclosed Bond. It represents an investment I made in our national cause to help win the war. It has served that purpose so well I am desirous to invest it in the great Kingdom of God, the Church of Christ. You can convert it into more enduring treasures by using the proceeds in furthering the interests of that Kingdom. Please apply on the Church's Program."

Deaths

BARRON: Fell asleep, December 30, 1926, in Washington, D. C., MRS. KATE BARRON, wife of the late James Barron, of Essex County, Virginia, in her seventy-sixth year. Interment at Vawter's Church, Essex County, by the side of her husband.

A MEMORIAL.

The Rector and Vestry of Johns' Parish desire to record their sense of loss in the passing, on December 23, 1926, of EDWARD SAMUEL DUFFEY, Senior Warden and Registrar of Emmanuel Church, Middleburg. Born on July 25, 1841, in the city of Alexandria, Va., and a member of St. Paul's Church from his infancy, he grew up in that city, and at the outbreak of the Civil War enlisted in Parker's and Kemper's Battery and served gallantly from the beginning of the war to its close, when he came to Middleburg, started in business and had lived here continuously since then.

The records of the Church show that Mr. Duffey was elected to the Vestry on April 2, 1866, and from that time to the day of his death continued to be a member of the Vestry in the capacity of Junior Warden, Senior Warden, Treasurer, or Registrar.

His obligations to his Church were his ever allowed to interfere with his attendpleasure, nor condition of weather was tver allowed to interfere with his attendance on the services of the Church.

Quiet and unobtrusive, yet settled in his convictions as a citizen and a Christian, he will be greatly missed by those who have known him and valued his friendship.

It was ordered that this Memorial be spread on the Records of the Parish, a copy sent to his family, a copy to the Southern Churchman, and a copy to the Loudun Times-Mirror.

Emmanuel Church, Middleburg, January 4, 127.

MRS. BEVERLEY D. TUCKER.

Resolutions.

Whereas, God, in His infinite wisdom, has called unto Himself the soul of one of His faithful followers, through Christ; MRS. ANNA MARIA WASHINGTON TUCKER, a devoted and wonderful wife and mother; the wife of our beloved Bishop, the Right Reverend Beverley D. Tucker, and the mother of thirteen children, of whom our beloved Rector, the Reverend Herbert N. Tucker, is one;

Now therefore, Be it resolved by the Vestry of St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church, of Suffolk, Virginia, that our sincere sympathy be, and the same hereby is, extended to the bereaved ones, and further we pray that God, in His own way, will comfort their sorrowing hearts and fill the aching void with His tenderest love and compassion, as He alone can do.

Be it resolved, further, that a copy hereof be sent to the Right Reverend Beverley D. Tucker; a copy to the Reverend Herbert N. Tucker; a copy to the Southern Churchman; and a copy be entered on the records of this Vestry.

Submitted in faith and sincerity,

WILLIAM H. PARKER.

December 4, 1926, marked the passing from Holy Trinity Church, Onancock, Va., of the outstanding presence of WILLIAM H. PARKER. The following record has been adopted for the minutes of the vestry:

With deep sorrow we record the passing of our Junior Warden. An active and interested helper in all that concerned the parish. Always were his business talents used for the upbuilding of the material strength of Holy Trinity and his kindly Christian courtesy to make real the bonds of Church loyalty within the congregation.

No resolution can fully express our appreciation of the things in his life for which we are thankful, nor add to the quiet dignity of his memory. The sense of our loss is very deep. Mr. Parker is survived by his widow, two sons, and four daughters.

H. N. LAWS, Rector.

Attest:
T. S. HOPKINS, Senior Warden.
WARNER AMES.

WARNER WARING SMITH.

In the early morning of Wednesday, the 19th of January, 1927, died WARNER WARING SMITH, son of Charles P. and the late Adelaide W. Smith. In the sudden passing of this noble young man something more than a bare notice should be given those who knew and loved him. Duty was his watchword, and from early childhood he was distinguished for unselfish devotion to his family. They drew closer to each other because life was a struggle in those early days. He was brave and independent, asking help of no one, and by his industry met with success. He was honored and respected by all who knew him. As a member of the Church of the Holy Comforter he had the love and confidence of his rector. For some years he had served on the vestry. His life had been brightened by a happy marriage and this happiness seemed complete when a young infant was given him three days before the fatal accident. We bow our heads in submission, and pray that others may live, as he lived, and seek the same promotion that he attained.

The Woman's Auxiliary.

About one hundred and fifty women were present at the forty-seventh Annual Convention of the Auxiliary, which met in Grace Church, Grand Rapids, January 18 and 19. From beginning to end the gathering was marked by enthusiasm. The Convention was favored by the presence of Mrs. Allen McGreggor, of the National Council, who came in the interest of the Bishops' Crusade; and of Mrs. Robert Burkham, of St. Louis, National Chairman of the Corporate Gift Fund, who spoke on the proposed extension work of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The Convention pledged $1,000 towards the salary of a new archdeacon for the northern part of the Diocese, and their help in continuing the Church Helper, the Diocesan paper.

Officers were elected as follows: Mrs. J. E. Wilkinson, of Grand Haven, President; Vice-President, Mrs. Burritt Hamilton, of Battle Creek; Recording Secretary, Mrs. F. C. Smelter, Battle Creek; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Washington Smith, Grand Haven; Treasurer, Mrs. Nicolas DeKruyter.

The forty-eighth Convention will meet in St. John's Church, Ionia, in May, 1927.

MINNESOTA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. McElwain, D. D., Bishop.
Coadjutor-Elect.

Epiphany-Tide Annual Meeting of the Church Club of the Diocese.

"The Middle West and the Northwest are key spots in America where the Episcopal Church has unusual and wonderful opportunities for growth." This was the assertion of the Rev. Dr. F. W. Clayton, of Tabor College, Tabor, Iowa, when delivering an address on the subject of the Relation Between Religion and Life, at the Epiphany-Tide Annual Meeting of the Church Club of the Diocese of Minnesota, held on January 18 at the Curtis Hotel, Minneapolis.

The Rev. Dr. Clayton emphasized the need of Church Colleges as real missionary enterprises. Only one out of every five persons in the Middle West is definitely connected with organized religion, he said, but the other four, through the carrying on of a definite campaign of Christian education, may become true followers of Christ.

The Rev. Frederick D. Butler, Chairman of the Diocesan Commission on Evangelism, told the members of the Club of the plans for the Bishops' Crusade in Minnesota, and made the plea that each member become a messenger and an evangelist; to pray for the Crusade, to talk about it, and to invite some one to accompany them to the mass meetings. He suggested the slogan, "In the interests of the Bishops' Crusade, let us go forward to victory".

Mr. Hector Baxter, President of the Church Club for the past two years, retired at this meeting. Mr. Baxter, who has been a member of the Club ever since it was organized, gave the members some very interesting reminscences of early days in the Diocese of Minnesota.

The new officers elected were: Mr. G. L. McKewin, of St. Clement's, St. Paul, President; Mr. J. P. Coan, of St. Mark's, Minneapolis, Vice-President; Mr. F. S. Kedney, of St. Mark's, Minneapolis, Secretary, and Mr. J. H. Rees, of St. Paul's, Minneapolis, Treasurer.

In accepting the gavel from Mr. Baxter, the newly-elected President. Mr. McKewin, stated that Bishop Gilbert had once said, "The Church Club is the Bishops' Body-guard" and that during this year of 1927 that motto would be in active use in supporting Bishop McElwain in his work for the glory of God and the advancing of Christ's Kingdom.

Bishop Maxon to Broadcast Crusade Message.

The opening guns of the Bishops' Crusade in Minnesota will be fired when the Rt. Rev. James M. Maxon, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Tennessee, will broadcast the message of the Crusade from the Minneapolis broadcasting station WCCO on Sunday afternoon, January 30. Bishop Maxon and the Rev. John S. Bunting, of St. Louis, will conduct mass meetings each evening, from Sunday, January 30, to Friday, February 4, in the Lyceum Theatre, Minneapolis.

The Rev. Dr. George Craig Stewart and the Ven. Charles E. Coles, of Kansas, will conduct mass meetings at the Municipal Auditorium in St. Paul during the same week.

Following the intensive week in the Twin Cities, the clergy of the Diocese will go forth as Crusaders into seventy or eighty parishes and missions outside of the Twin Cities, and conduct missions of four to six days' duration, for the period from February 6 to March 4.

One of the outstanding features of the Bishops' Crusade in Minnesota is that the Rev. Dr. George Craig Stewart is to address the entire student body of the University of Minnesota for one hour on each of three successive days during the week when he is acting as Crusader in this Diocese.

The Rev. Frederick D. Butler has also secured the consent of President L. D. Coffman, of the University, for Dr. Stewart to be present on the campus every day, when opportunity will be afforded individual students to discuss and advise with him relative to their personal and religious problems.

ORDINATIONS.

On Monday morning, December 27, St. John the Evangelist's Day, in St. Luke's Church, Marianna, Florida, the Rt. Rev. Frank A. Juhan, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Florida, ordained to the diaconate John B. Matthews, a candidate of the Diocese, and for the past eight months in charge of St. Luke's.

Mr. Matthews was presented by the Rev. Louis G. Wood, General Secretary of the Field Department of the National Council; he also preached the ordination sermon on the text, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God". It is of interest to know that it was under the rectorship of the Rev. Mr. Wood, when he was the rector of St. Luke's Church, Charleston, South Carolina, that Mr. Matthews first offered his life for the ministry of the Church, and commenced his studies.

The Litany and the Epistle were read by the Rev. Randolph F. Blackford, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Panama City, and the Bishop of the Diocese read the Gospel.

Mr. R. E. MacGowan was ordained to the diaconate in St. Stephen's Church, Olean, N. Y., on Thursday, December 23, the Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, D. D., Bishop of Western New York, officiating. Other clergymen participating were the Rev. C. D. Broughton, rector of the Church of the Ascension, Buffalo, N. Y., preacher; the Rev. W. E. Van Dyke, rector of St. Luke's Church, Smethport, Pa., master of ceremonies; the Rev. C. C. Bentley, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Olean, presenter; the Rev. S. W. Hale, Belmont, N. Y., who read the litany; the Rev. Edgar Pancoast, rector of St. Mary's Church, Salamanca, N. Y., who read the epistle, and Rev. H. A. Post, rector of Emmanuel Church, Corry, Pa., chaplain to the Bishop.

Mr. MacGowan, who was formerly in the Presbyterian ministry, will assist in the work of St. Stephen's Parish, Olean, with special oversight over the missions at Bolivar and Franklinville.

In the Chapel of the Holy Angels, in the Bishop's House, Concord, N. H., the Rev. Leland G. Chase was ordained to the priesthood on Friday, December 31, 1926, by the Rt. Rev. John T. Dallas, D. D., Bishop of New Hampshire, who celebrated Holy Communion and preached the ordination sermon. Mr. Chase was presented by the Rev. Godfrey M. Brinley, of St. Paul's School. Other priests who assisted were the Rev. W. Stanley Emery, the Rev. T. W. Harris, the Rev. John A. Chapin, the Rev. Anthony R. Parshley, the Rev. Lawrence F. Piper, secretary of the Diocese, and the Rev. Arthur M. Dunstan, Archdeacon of the Diocese. The Rev. Mr. Chase becomes rector of Trinity Church, Claremont, N. H., and is in charge of Union Church, West Claremont, N. H.

DEATHS.

The Rev. George H. Higgins, M. D., one of the best loved ministers in the Church, died at his home in El Paso, Texas, on January 4. Dr. Higgins, who was in his eighty-second year, had lived in El Paso since 1887, when he came to be the first rector of St. Clement's Church. He retired from the active ministry in 1892, but was appointed rector emeritus and often held services.

Funeral services were held in St. Clement's on January 7, the Rev. B. T. Kemerer and the Rev. B. M. G. Williams officiating.

Learning.

I have learned laughter from living
And leaping young mountain streams;
Friendship and courage from oak trees;
And—from the arching sky, dreams.

I have learned love from the whisper
Of winds through the wistful hours;
I have learned hope from refreshing
And friendly mid-afternoon showers.

I have learned patience from rivers;
Poise—from the cliff and the peak;
I have learned, always, to listen
For whispers when beauty speaks.

I have learned wisdom from watching
The beavers and birds and bees;
I have learned music and rhythm
From swaying of wind-swept trees.

I have learned faith through some flowers
That dare to a further height
Even than timberline dareth—
In crimson and Alpine white.

I have learned peace and its beauty
Deep in the heart of the night,
Up where the full moon is sailing
The skies in a silver flight.

I have learned prayer through the subtle,
Soft lights of the afterglow;
I have found God and His dreaming
In the sea where the star-streams flow.

I rendered service to the Lord,
I washed and ironed today;
The altar linen white and smooth,
And folded it away.
And with this humble act of mine
A happy feeling came;
It made the church seem like a home.
To do this in His Name.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Faith is the homing instinct of the soul.

"I would fain be to the living God as a man's hand is to a man."

Not until we expect more of ourselves than we do of others can we really influence them.

"Thy will be done" is the keynote to which every prayer must be tuned.—Fenelon.

God never empties except to fill. He never makes poor except to enrich, He never humbles except to exalt.—Exchange.

Humility is like a star
Which trembles while it shines,
And through its trembling brighter seems to be.
—G. W. Moore.

The New Jerusalem opens its gates on every side—east, north, south, west—that whosoever comes may, if he will, walk straight forward into the city.—William R. Richards.

It is but little we can receive here, some drops of joy that enter into us; but there we shall enter into joy, as vessels put into a sea of happiness.—Robert Leighton.

If we but knew before we judged another
The baffled strivings of a soul sincere,
We might in meekness oft restore a brother,
And fire his courage with a word of cheer!
—H. T. Leferve.

If God be with us, we are in ennobling company, even though we are poor and despised. If God be with us, we have all-sufficient strength, for nothing can be too hard for the Lord. If God be with us, we are always safe, for none can harm those who walk under His shadow. . . . Let us be bravely diligent and joyously hopeful. Our cause must prosper, the truth must win, for the Lord is with those who are with Him.

The Bible is pervaded with the conception of the unseen land being not far away, but being near to us, so that if only an acuter sense of perception were given to us we should understand. As one grows older one gets to think that perhaps we are wrong in imagining the journey of the dying believer to be a long journey, and wrong in thinking of Heaven as very, very far away.—John McMurtrie.

THE TREND OF EVENTS

FORTY THOUSAND JEWS HAVE BEEN BAPTIZED in Hungary, and twelve thousand in Vienna within the past decade, according to a Jewish paper, the Jewish Gazette, which also states that in Ukrania there are many Christian congregations made up entirely of converted Jews. When it is remembered that there are millions of Jews in these countries, the turn towards Christianity is not so impressive; however, among those who have received baptism is Hans Herzl, the son of the founder of the Zionist Movement, who was at one time almost revered as the Messiah of European Jews.

According to the estimate of Dr. Goldhammer, a reliable Austrian statistician, about one-half of these converts have joined the Roman Catholic Church, which strongly predominates in Austria, but in the City of Budapest (capital of Hungary), twenty-five hundred have joined the Presbyterians. These figures are interesting in connection with the threatened trial and ex-communication of Rabbi Stephen Wise, probably the leading Rabbi in this country, for publicly admitting his belief that Jesus was an historical character. There are many interesting drifts in the religious world of today.

CHRISTIANITY TRIUMPHED GLORIOUSLY in the United States Senate when the resolution demanding arbitration with Mexico was adopted without a dissenting voice. That incident should do much to impress our neighbors on this side of the Atlantic with the peaceful intentions of the United States.

The maxim of Christ, "Do unto others as ye would have them do unto you", is as important for nations as it is for individuals, and when practiced will be found to be helpful toward making a better world and bringing His Kingdom on earth.

DOCTORING SICK SOULS is certainly a part of the work of the ministry, and proper equipment to carry on the healing, and the building up of the diseased soul is the object of Theological Seminary training. It is, therefore, exceedingly interesting to note that the Chicago Theological Seminary has added to its faculty the Chaplain of the Worcester (Mass.) State Hospital for the Insane, Mr. Anton T. Boisen, who will give them a three months' course in that institution, on leave of absence from his Chaplaincy. When one looks back to the deeds of the Saviour, and sees how frequently His power was exercised in what we would call "mental cases" today, one appreciates the need for some special knowledge for healing such troubles at the present time. The minister's job by no means stops at the pulpit steps, or the church door. Properly trained clergymen can save many a home from wreckage, and keep boys and girls from starting on the downward course of shame and disgrace, if they have some training to help their Christian faith. The medical profession has learned all it knows about preserving health through combatting disease. In the same way the clergy can learn much about maintaining the normal attitude toward life by a consideration of abnormal cases. There are many persons outside of mental institutions whose outlook on life can be enormously improved by contact with a "parson" who could direct their minds into more wholesome channels. Of course, a great deal of clerical training has to be academic. It is necessary to get the proper historical, theological and ethical background. The practice of the ministry is becoming recognized more and more as essential, and training for practice is taking a larger part in theological courses, and it is a very hopeful sign. No doctor is ever turned loose on the public without hospital experience, and something corresponding to an interneship should be added to the Seminary course.

BLESSED ARE THE PEACEMAKERS for they shall be called the children of God." Thus spake Jesus upon a memorable occasion, and we believe that to be a "peacemaker" is primarily to help to preserve peace. For this reason we quote herewith the words of President Calles, of Mexico, as contained in his New Year's message. He first said that his chief purpose was "the economic betterment of the country and the social and moral uplift of the Mexican people". He further says, "It is not my purpose to interpret the constitutional laws of the country in any manner that would injure legitimate interests established in Mexico, when these laws were enacted". Turning then to the religious question, we quote, "I also wish to avail myself of this opportunity to repeat, ten months after the Catholic hierarchy began its opposition to the Mexican laws, what I stated at the beginning, which has not been modified through the attitude, seditious and rebellious at times, of the clergy, that my administration does not intend, nor has it intended, to oppose the legitimate exercise or development of any religious activity; that matters of faith or creed or dogma are absolutely outside the action and purposes of my government; that I hold the same sincere respect for all expressions of conscience or religious beliefs; that it is a gross untruth framed up by the clerical reaction that the government has endeavored or desired at any time to destroy or combat any religious faith".

The reading of these words in this country is bound to inspire us with a greater respect for this man, who seems to be earnestly trying to rid his nation of undue clerical dominance at home and interference by foreign capitalists from abroad. Surely, he has the right to try to work out the best interests of his country without being bullied by the United States, and we certainly should not render any secret aid to the forces opposing his administration within Mexican territory.

EDUCATION AGAINST EVIL is one of the best means of overcoming it. The education program against alcoholism was what led to the ultimate adoption of the dry amendment, and it is most unfortunate that information along this line has been discontinued. Realizing the effectiveness of this method a call has been issued setting apart the last days of February "As Narcotic Education Week". Few people in this country appreciate the enormous numbers who are now in the grip of this dread disease, for that is what it really is. Data and information on this subject will be sent to educators and ministers before the time referred to, and it is sincerely to be hoped that they will interest themselves in this important matter sufficiently to give it some attention.

LIBERAL EVANGELICALS

Recently our good friend and esteemed contemporary, The Churchman, published a very clever editorial entitled "Definitions". Our brother editor frankly recognized the difficulties of defining the various groups of Episcopalians, nevertheless, he sallied forth with this sentence as a preface, "Since the year is young and whatever courage we possess should be at its flood, we make the plunge".

The first group that he names are the Anglo-Catholics, whom he subdivides into "Liberal" and "Latinizing Catholics". Of the latter, he says, and we believe truly, that their "doctrine, discipline and worship is daily approximating more nearly those of the Church of Rome. To the majority of this rapidly growing body, the single serious point of difference with the Latin Church is the question of Papal Infallibility". We agree entirely with every word of that definition.

The second group considered are the "Liberals". As The Churchman is well-known to represent this party in the Church, its editor naturally gives the bulk of his space, and the most attractive description to this faction.

He concludes thus:

"3. Evangelical—A decreasing group, which, exhibiting a real terror of things 'Romish', impatient of any intermediary, emphasizes personal salvation and the direct and immediate approach to God at all times. It is zealous for what it calls 'old-fashioned' or 'Prayer Book' religion".

It is here that we feel constrained to differ with our contemporary. We might concur in his opinion of the "Evangelicals", if he would treat us (The Southern Churchman unblushingly claims to be Evangelical) as he does Anglo-Catholics, and subdivide us into two sections, "Old-fashioned Evangelicals", and "Liberal Evangelicals". It is perhaps true of the former that they are decreasing, and that they have a genuine terror of things Roman. We do not believe that either of these descriptions applies to the Liberal Evangelicals. They are certainly not decreasing, if one can judge by sure indications. For instance, the Theological Seminary in Virginia is especially representative of this type of Churchmanship. It has today more students enrolled than ever before, and the largest junior class in its history, and its capacity for next year is already engaged with a good many on the waiting list.

Liberal Evangelicals have no "terror of things Romish," though vigorously opposed to them, because they do not believe that there is any danger to the Protestant Episcopal Church, as a whole, from this source, when once it is awakened to a realization of the concerted effort being made in this direction by the Latinizing Catholics.

We do advocate most earnestly the "old-fashioned religion", to the extent that we feel that the Christ of the Damascus Road is the Christ of today, and that if properly preached, and truly lived, He has the same gloriously transforming power that was manifested in Apostolic days, and that has been shown since, when men have opened their hearts to His inflowing love.

We look upon the Prayer Book, not as a rigid rule of services, but at least as a guide to be observed by Bishops and the other clergy, especially at important gatherings of Church people and at Holy Communion services.

We believe the Bible to be the inspired Word of God, revealing Him, and His love for us, in a continuously and ever-widening circle of light, feeling that the bright blaze of modern criticism and discovery will but strike new gleams from the ancient Book, and make it shine with greater lustre.

We firmly believe that there is a great future before this group in our Church, and that its appeal both to the sense and sentiment of men of today will draw them into the ministry and the devoted laity in ever-increasing numbers.

The Southern Churchman tries to represent the Liberal Evangelical party in our Church, and hopes to be able to speak for them from time to time. Perhaps in the past we have been a trifle too lethargic, rather more negative than positive, but a new day is dawning. Great possibilities are opening. A group of vigorous forward-looking Bishops are exerting a great influence. From one Southern Diocese, there are now eleven men in the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, and it is said that next year there will be sixteen. This is the convincing proof of true evangelism.

KNOWING THE CLERGY IN THIS WEEK'S ISSUE

The Rev. John Gass was born in Augusta, Georgia, received his schooling, college and theological training at Sewanee, afterwards getting a degree from the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass. His first parish was at West Point, Mississippi. From there he moved North, after seeing Army service, to the Church of the Ascension, Frankfort, Kentucky. In 1921 he came to Trinity Church, Parkersburg, West Virginia, first as associate rector and then as rector. From there he was called to St. John's Church, Charleston, West Virginia, in 1925. He has won an enviable reputation as a preacher and tactful pastor, and though still young in the ministry, he is considered one of its very able speakers.

The Rev. James Sheerin was born in Scotland, received his college education at St. Stephen's, New York, and Kenyon College, Ohio, afterward taking a degree at Columbia University. He has had large experience in great cities, serving parishes in New York, Boston and Pittsburg. In 1908 he went as a delegate to the Pan-Anglican Congress from the Diocese of Western Massachusetts. An inveterate traveler, both in this country and abroad, he has been a prolific and interesting writer for all of our Church papers of general circulation, representing the Southern Churchman at the General Convention in New Orleans. He has just returned from an extensive tour of the Mediterranean and Europe.

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

THE OTHER SIDE

By The Reverend John Gass.

He saith unto them, Let us go over unto the other side. —St. Mark 4:35.

IT WAS the Master speaking. He was inviting His disciples to accompany Him to the other side of the Lake of Galilee. Those who are familiar with their Bible will recognize these words as an introduction to a very dramatic scene, the Stilling of the Tempest. But on this occasion let us get beyond that incident to the motive which prompted our Lord to invite His disciples to cross from one side of the Lake to the other. We shall find that it leads us to a vital and tremendous truth. For it need hardly be said that Jesus did not invite His disciples to cross the Lake simply for the purpose of quieting a storm. That would be trivial and unworthy of Him. His motive as we might expect was deep and true. Fortunately, it is very apparent in the story. Jesus was tired. He was nearing the end of His resources. He had spent Himself mentally, physically and spiritually. For days He had been ministering to the needs of others. He had preached to multitudes; He had healed the sick of their divers diseases; He had taught His disciples; in every way He had spent Himself in the effort to get His message down into the hearts of people. Now He was exhausted. The hour of need had struck. The time had come when He felt it necessary to flee from the incessant demands on His time and to call a stop to the excessive drafts on His energy. So He asked His disciples to go with Him to the other side. Why? Simply because over there in the quiet of the hills He could recuperate and build up again His inner reserves.

Indeed this particular incident is merely one in many. One can turn the pages of the Gospels at will and find it an almost invariable rule that after days of ceaseless toil, filled as they were with experiences that burned up His mental and spiritual reserves, Jesus went over to the other side. At the height of His popularity when the multitudes were thronging Him on all sides and He spent His days in healing and preaching and teaching, we read that suddenly He took His disciples and cast off in a boat for the other side.

How clearly defined, indeed, are these two sides of life —the active and the receptive—in the experience of the Master! One side of Galilee represented to Him the world with its cry for activity and its call to service. Over in Galilee proper every element of the world faced Him. There He must meet with compassion, callous enemies, scoffing cynics and open unbelief. There diseased bodies, deranged minds, outrageous wrongs, ruinous sins and misconceptions of God called Him to the ceaseless work of social uplift and spiritual redemption. There the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. There, having put His hand to the plow, He dare not turn back. There, having set His face steadfastly toward Jerusalem, He must march courageously on to Calvary. Galilee proper was the active side of His life.

The other side of the Lake of Galilee held out to Him the quiet of the hills, meditation in the desert places, nights of prayer and long hours of unbroken communion with God. There, when weary of body, tired of mind and perplexed in spirit, the Master would withdraw to recharge Himself, to reilluminate His mind and to refortify His spirit. That was the receptive side. No single thing in the life of Jesus brings Him closer to us than just this. How close—how very close—our Saviour is when we see Him worn in mind and spirit going off into the quiet places to seek help and to draw on an available source of inexhaustible energy! Nowhere else does He seem to us quite so human. There are many evidences in the Gospels of the humanity of Jesus. He hungered, He became thirsty, He grew weary, He shed tears, He knew joy and sorrow, at times became righteously indignant and finally died as every son of man must die. He was human in all points like as we. But the truest evidence anywhere of the real humanity of Jesus is when we see Him going over from the active to the receptive side of life. For when Jesus is on His knees we see in the depths of His soul the same sense of dependence, the same conscious need of greater resources to meet life's demands and the same heart hunger for communion with God that characterize us. The very fact that Jesus grew tired spiritually and had to go over to the other side to refresh Himself ties Him to us with a band of common need like no other one thing.

These two sides of life—the active side and the receptive side—are not peculiar to Jesus. Nor are they confined altogether to religion. They are of the very texture of life itself. Wherever we look we find them. We see them in nature. Just now it is winter. Everywhere about us life seems to be dead or at least the forces of nature seem dormant. But what is really going on is this: Nature is over on the receptive side. During spring and summer she is riotous with active life. Then everything is alive, teeming and bursting with life. But when autumn comes nature begins to go over to the other side, so that during the winter months she is on the receptive side replenishing her impoverished soil. Beneath the earth's frozen surface today nature is striking deeper her roots. She is drinking of the water of life and in her chemical laboratories is transmuting decaying substances into nourishing food for new life. Next spring and summer she will burst forth again into a life of abundant activity. As a matter of fact, nature never gets away entirely from the receptive side of life, even when she seems most active. If you have ever examined the surface of a leaf through a powerful microscope you have seen that it is covered with countless tiny mouths with lips like human lips that seize the invisible carbonic acid gas from sunbeam and air and incorporate it into itself. What makes the leaf die in the autumn and fall to the ground is the simple fact that the little mouths have ceased to function and when they stopped receiving the leaf ceased its activity and died.

Turn to the biography of a great man and you will find the same two sides of life. No man, I suppose, led a more active life in his day than did Gladstone. Yet, these words appear in Gladstone's diary: "And now I am writing in the last minutes of the seventh decade of my life. This closing is a great event. The days of our life are three score years and ten. It is hardly possible that I shall complete another decade. Ah! what need have I of what I may term spiritual leisure, to be for a while out of the dust and heat and blast and strain of life." That is characteristic of the great British statesman. As his biographer, John Morley, makes so plain, Gladstone's habit was as was his Master's, to go frequently from the active, turbulent side, away from "the heat and dust and blast and strain", to the receptive side where he might fortify and strengthen himself for the hard duties that fell to him.

Or, again, consider how full art is of these two aspects of life. On one occasion the artist will depict life on its active side—the blacksmith at his forge, or the plowman with his plow, and on another occasion he will paint for us the student with his books or the saint at his vigil.

Thus it is that these two sides of life—the active and the receptive—run through all existence. It takes the one to balance the other; indeed, it takes the one to keep the other going. And just here, perhaps, one lays his hand more surely and certainly upon the weakness and failure of our present-day life than anywhere else. Our age has in large measure forgotten that there are two sides to life. We live today as though the active side were all there is to life. Action! We know what that is. We understand its language. We feel its whip. We know its demands. No one of us has to be told that if he wants to live in this world he has to work. When people talk to us about "toil and labor", "mental anguish" and "sweat of the brow" we all know what is meant. There is no misunderstanding it. As the world reckons things the successful man of today is the man of indefatigable energy and of iron nerves, the efficient and successful organizer who can turn the wheels of industry twenty-four hours each day and make the cash register ring with ever-increasing sales. Even inspiration is defined as perspiration. In any event the language which we most readily understand is "take off your coat", "roll up your sleeves", "get to work". There are at least a few words in the Bible with which every one is familiar: "In toil shalt thou eat all the days of thy life . . . in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread."

In religion the same thing is true. We understand the active side of it. As long as the Christian religion is presented to us as "cups of cold water" or "feeding the hungry" or "clothing the naked" or even "visiting the fatherless and the widows in their affliction" it comes to us in terms of service and activity and is all perfectly clear and easily understandable. It is never necessary to explain at any length those things which are considered essential and necessary in the life of an active parish. Organizations, rummage-sales, every member canvasses! Whenever a clergyman talks to his congregation about the needful things of the parish or community every one understands what he is talking about.

But when we pass to the other side of religion—the quiet side, the prayer side, the meditative side, the receptive side—how little impression the language of that side makes on men and women today! Prayer! How little the average business man or the modern society woman know about prayer! Meditation! How many can one count in this busy age who take the time just to sit and think! To one who sits and thinks there are thousands who take short cuts in syllabuses and outlines. Beauty, Truth and Goodness! Life's noblest Values! When and where does modern traffic stop long enough so the average person even pauses to appreciate, comprehend or feel the values that life offers. The tendency today is to race through life and never stop long enough in any one place to give earnest thought to any one thing. This summer I overheard two women, products of this generation of Americans, discoursing outside the Louvre. Few places in the entire world contain more beautiful things than the Louvre. Certainly no place challenges one to pause and appreciate and consider and listen to the voice of art and sculpture like the Louvre. There is a liberal education there for any one who wants it. There is beauty enough within its walls for any one who is hungry for the beautiful. All this, however, these modern women seem to have missed. Said one: "How long did it take you to go through the Louvre?" "A little over an hour," answered the other. Came the reply: "I could have done it in less time than that if the floors hadn't been so slick." Some people in these busy days go through the world just like that. They rush through and never see its beauty; they never feed on its truth; they never share in its goodness and they never meet its God. They are never quiet long enough to take soul and mind and spirit to the "other side", so as to enter into the deeper meanings of life.

And yet this neglected side—this side of prayer, of communion and of fellowship with God—is the side of our deepest need. A fact of human experience common to us all is this, however great our wisdom, however tenacious our strength of purpose, however enthusiastic our efforts for the right, life tends to devitalize us. Soon or late our batteries run down. One day our labors may be crowned with success, the next we may be buffeted by drudgery and defeat, but in either event our resources are consumed. We have no supply of power within us that is inexhaustible. There comes a time when we are bankrupt and undone, when every one of us is faced by the stark reality that if he is to "carry on" he must find some source of inexhaustible energy upon which he may depend and of which he may avail himself. Let us put this universal experience in plain language; no man is sufficient unto himself, no man has strength enough to meet single-handed the vicissitudes and conflicts of life; the height of all folly is to attempt to live a full and whole life altogether on the active side.

In the light of this, therefore, the insistent message of the Christian religion to this generation is the invitation of the Master, "Let us go over to the other side"—to the receptive side. And surely that takes us to the very heart of Christ's religion. If one were to be bold enough to state the religion of Christ in a single sentence he wouldn't miss it far if he said simply this. To Christ there was a source of inexhaustible energy from which He drew day by day and from which He obtained power to reinforce Himself and strength by which to live. That source was God. If Christ's religious experience, therefore, has any message for us at all, surely it is this, God is available—available for each, available for all. God is sufficient.

The everlasting truth of this is written in the deepest experiences of the race. The moral and religious progress of mankind can be written in six comprehensive words—God is available: God is sufficient. Beautiful church buildings are built upon this truth—God is available; God is sufficient. The ministry is an honorable profession because of this truth—God is available: God is sufficient. Beautiful liturgical services are maintained and sacraments are administered because of this greatest of all truths—God is available; God is sufficient. Churches are built, ministers are supported and services are maintained for just one reason—to assure people of this sublime truth, that at the center of life is a loving power sufficient for all their needs; and to lead them into such vital union with that power that by contact with it they may recharge their own spirits.

Thus, if one were given the privilege of broadcasting a message destined to encircle the world and reach the ears of the 1,600,000,000 children of God on this planet, there could be no message more appropriate to this generation than the invitation of the Master, "Let us go over to the other side". Are there those whom this message will reach to whom life has been so hard and exacting that you are beaten in spirit and broken in body? "Let us go over to the other side", and in communion with an available God build up body and spirit and take up again the battle of life. Are there those to whom temptation has become so persistent that you are worn and spent in the moral warfare? "Let us go over to the other side" and through prayer gird ourselves once again and return doubly strong, ready to resist unto blood. Are there those whose burdens are grievous and whose crosses are heavy? "Let us go over to the other side" and in quiet friendship with the Lord, whose grace is sufficient, learn of Him so that we may return to take up our cross daily and follow Him. Are there young people who want to live on the top of the world? "Let us go to the other side and learn the true art of living through an intimate relationship with Him who came to give us abundant life."

"Let us go to the other side"—the side of prayer, of communion and of meditation. The key that opens the door to the other side is prayer. After all, prayer is a very simple thing. It is simply the art of claiming what is ours, simply the means of re-charging our spiritual batteries. Prayer is tapping the infinite resources of God, merely the art of claiming a little of His available resources for our daily needs.

How admirably Archbishop Trent preached this sermon when he wrote:

"Lord, what a change within us one short hour
Spent in Thy presence will avail to make!
What heavy burdens from our bosoms take!
What parched grounds, refresh as with a shower!
We kneel, and all around us seems to lower;
We rise, and all, the distant and the near,
Stands forth in sunny outline bright and clear;
We kneel, how weak! we rise, how full of power.
Why, therefore, should we do ourselves this wrong,
Or others—that we are not always strong—
That we are sometimes overborne with care—
That we should ever weak or heartless be,
Anxious or troubled—when with us in prayer,
And joy and strength and courage are with Thee."

"It is difficult to see, apart from the return of Christ, and from the final manifestation of the truth and righteousness of God which it implies, what basis of certainty there is for the patient endurance in righteousness which marks the lives of the world's truest men. The struggle of such men may be in itself magnificent, and it may serve temporary ends, but their nobility only makes the inevitable non-achievement more bitter. If life has no purpose as the return of Christ implies, there is indeed a bitter irony in life, a sort of grim jesting on the part of nature in tricking us into a feeling of eternal worth-whileness about our actions."—Rev. Stanley Brown-Serman.

We are beginning to cease to talk about foreign missions, and to realize there is but one mission, as there is one world, and one God and Father of us all; one Church and one great adventure here at home and overseas. There is nothing foreign about God and nothing foreign about His Church.—The Bishop of Winchester.

The supreme test of Christian fellowship is unquestioning loyalty to Jesus Christ. It will be forever true that he who loses his life for the sake of Christ and duty will find it enlarged, enriched, and ennobled a hundred-fold in the light beyond the veil.—Henry Howard.

LOURDES, HEALER OF BODIES

By the Reverend James Sheerin

LEAVING the hotel in Lourdes with the object of having a glimpse of the notable shrines before it is too dark, there are lively signs on the way of something extraordinary going on, though hardly of a religious character. The streets are crowded and the shops are numerous, where windows, outdoor stands and inside counters are covered with a multiplicity of the oddest sorts of goods, for which people are bargaining as in any Oriental market. Besides the usual vast array of crosses and crucifixes, there are innumerable shapes of flasks, from thimble size to wine glass, or quart, which prove to be receptacles in which to carry off a bit of the water from the sacred grotto. Perhaps never in the history of the shrines have there been so many varieties of beads, charms, penny books, etc. Mingled between the shops are shows such as one may see on any busy, popular street. They are cyclorams and cinemas. There are cafes with liquor freely displayed and freely drunk. There are fakirs and peddlers every few feet, selling everything from candles and charms to pictures and eatables.

Then, all of a sudden, one passes out of this bedlam of commercial vulgarity through a gate into a quiet bit of park, and comes to a great wide space of paved roadway, ornamented here and there with sculptures that reveal the devotion of men and women who felt that they had been helped by a pilgrimage to Lourdes. In the midst is a tall Virgin in marble, high on a pedestal, wearing a golden crown, and garlanded with flowers. On the left is a great two-storied church, and a high steeple. Beyond is a swiftly running river of gray water.

While standing in the plaza, singing is heard that grows louder and louder. It is not the singing of a trained choir, but the voluminous strains of a great crowd, not so anxious to keep together as to express as forcibly as possible their belief in what they are singing. Then out of the side streets, from over the river, and from the crowded streets of the town, men, women and children are seen walking in twos, each carrying a lighted candle at the end of a two-foot stick, guarded by a paper shade in the crude shape of a lily. At first there seemed no sense in the words these motley marchers were singing. They seemed as irregular and uneven as the feet of the people, who made no more effort to keep step than they did to keep time in the song. Some sang sweetly and earnestly. Others sang lustily and spasmodically. No two sang together. A group of farmer-like young men, uncouth in dress and rough of features, passed by shouting the words regardless of all sweetness or harmony, but manifestly zealous in meaning. It was from these megaphone voiced peasant singers that the words were, in part, made out. All they sang over and over was "Ave Maria, Ave Maria", and no saint or queen was ever hailed so vociferously, or so heartily as was the Queen of Heaven at this demonstration of these young men of simple minds and rough exteriors.

A closer listening disclosed that some who had books, or leaflets were singing verses descriptive of a little maid, "a timid infant", praying in the cave on the edge of the River Cave, to whom the Virgin had appeared and vouchsafed to send through her a message to the whole Church. At the end of each four lines there was the chorus:

"Ave, Ave, Ave Maria
Ave, Ave, Ave Maria!"

which the throats of thousands roared out to a tune that was the simplest possible combination of notes. Sixty stanzas told the story, but they were repeated over and over, as this tremendous procession met at the heart of the square, in front of the statue of the Virgin, and proceeded down both sides, zig-zagged across between church and image, all the time singing the same words over and over, without lessening of intensity, the thousands of candles increasing their twinkling as the increasing darkness of the night made the human figures grow dim in outline. The standard lights of the parkway about them were turned on; the statue of the Virgin became brilliant with its garlands of small electric lights, and from the high tower of the church a searchlight threw its moon-like beams into the midst. Windows, doorways and arches of the great temple were outlined with a myriad of electric lamps, from foundation to roof.

It was a brilliant scene. At first the procession seemed very medieval, with its childlike, much repeated verse, and its flickering primitive lights. But later came adjuncts that made it suggestive of the illumination of the World's Fair, or the glitter of Luna Park. When finally the procession was stopped, and the thousands of marchers stood in long rows in front of the entrance to the lower church, priests in cassocks, having seucred order, began a more elaborate song in which the people joined, and words of prayers and creeds were said in slow unison. The proceedings then, in their zealous informality, could almost be described as Methodist, not Roman—as Billy Sundayish, not papal. They seemed almost impossible in their simplicity for the Roman Catholic Church as commonly known with its set services, so traditionally accurate and uniform. But they revealed the very human fact, discovered also by old Trinity, New York, in its noon-day services, that the multitude cannot be reached by the exalted ceremonies of public and official services; that an absence of what is called ritual is necessary in order to reach their hearts; that this primitive instinct for the informal is in every great crowd, and that it can be sometimes made most helpful when least organized. Crudity is an offence to the average cultivated clergyman, but by crudity of expression religion has often produced its best results. This is a hard saying for a man of education, who is also a religious man, but there are scholars and Churchmen willing to ponder it in the heart as a secret of spiritual success.

Going quietly to their resting places this vast mob-like congregation is seen next morning assembling at the various departments of healing in the great institution. It is there that it grows upon one that the absence of ritual is not all evangelical simplicity. Everything is stirring and seemingly spontaneous, but everything is ultimately seen as orderly. Pilgrims come to the grotto, with their various purchased charms, walk to the sacred rock on which the sculptural Virgin stands, on the spot she is said to have appeared to the little girl, kneel, or kiss the stone, press their beads or crucifixes, or other objects to be blessed, against the surface of the rock, pass on toward a great jar where their alms are deposited, and go out again to take their places with the throngs kneeling on the ground, or seated on benches, while monk, or priest animatedly addresses them from a pulpit just outside the grotto.

All are very devout and anxious. In a nearby enclosure a thousand or more other pilgrims are seated, or are kneeling, or standing awaiting their turn, as they face the bathing rooms where invalids have gone to wash, with hopes of being made clean in a moment of time. Those outside, led by clever looking priests, sing or pray. Long lines not far off await their turns at a dozen or so faucets where the sacred water of the grotto is running from which they drink, or wash their faces, moving back for others with hope in their eyes. Ushers are on hand everywhere to aid in orderly movement.

Are these sufferers cured? Just as much so as in other healing places. Just as much so as in Emmanuel Church, Boston, or in Trinity Chapel, New York.

In fifty years nearly four thousand are said to be healed at this shrine. The scholarly and dignified Catholic Encyclopedia accepts this figure as a fact. It claims that there have been medical examinations before and after, and that delusion and fraud are improbable, if not impossible. It contends that there are no healing qualities in the waters, that the conditions are not such as are favorable to hypnotic suggestions as the cause of curse, and that the healed are not merely nervous cases getting over imaginary diseases; and that there is, therefore, only one reasonable inference, that the cures "can only be from the direct intervention of God".

A record has been kept since the first healings, when, on the sixteenth appearance of the Virgin in 1858, a blind working man received his sight, a paralyzed child of two was made to walk, and the skin trouble of a woman was made whole by washing her face and eyes in the pool. It is asserted that the cures include many tubercular patients, besides cholera, cancer, spinal disease, deafness and epilepsy. Crutches are hung about the grotto as mute evidence of their owner's recovery from lameness.

More than three thousand Bishops have visited the shrine and lent their approval to its work. Nearly one hundred cardinals have done the same, two of whom became popes. At least ten million people, mostly ardent Churchmen, have made the pilgrimage. The state railway reports that the annual arrivals are now one million in this little Pyrenese town that ordinarily could hardly expect a thousand or so from ordinary causes.

The attempt has been made to describe Lourdes, its crowds and its cures, in as favorable a light as possible. Lest the judgment should too easily accept these conditions and methods as meet and right, attention may be called to the fact that of the million people going to Lourdes from year to year, a large percentage of whom are pathetically in need of physical help, a great majority are never helped, and a considerable part go back to their homes more hopeless, and perhaps more bitter than ever.

The whole history of dependence on miracles as a way of helping people, either physically, or spiritually, should be more carefully looked into by religious leaders. A Christendom that has come to look upon an exceptional wonder, or miraculous event as the preferred method of Church work has tended to push moral service and spiritual development more and more into a background, that is half hidden by superstition and fear.

Lying down on the job and waiting for the ravens to feed one is a method receiving condemnation in the Old Testament. The daily grind of Robert Louis Stevenson, the life-long fight against disease exhibited by Roosevelt, this sort of thing is of infinitely more value to human life than the effort of millions thrown into prayer for a miracle, or worked up into some spectacular display of divine intervention. In the long run the body is helped more by the continuous miracle of good living than it is by heavenly intrusions.

Letters to the Editor

STRAIGHTFORWARD CRITICISM.

Mr. Editor:

In connection with the article beginning on page eight of the issue of January 29, of your paper, it appears to me that it is a great mistake to mar the beauty of Episcopal Church Evangelical Christianity, such as The Southern Churchman is currently supposed to represent, by the publication of articles deliberately jibing at those in the Episcopal Church who manifestly differ from us. It certainly does not convert them to our views, and articles written in such a spirit against what we believe and practice would surely cement us more closely to them. The beauty of our Churchmanship is not made more manifest by such articles, but is, rather, beclouded. I do not know what a "Black Mass" is, but is it worse than black words?

I hope that The Southern Churchman will consider carefully before again deliberately publishing articles which are so different in spirit from that magnified in the New Testament.

"THE TECHNIQUE OF LYING AWAKE."

Mr. Editor:

This was the title of an article published two or three years ago, in one of the oldest, most interesting, and least religious (in the highest sense) of all our monthlies. Curiosity was awakened, and reading instantly was a matter of course, to see what the writer—evidently an accomplished lady and a Christian—meant, in her kind intention to teach those afflicted with insomnia. The tortures endured in sleeplessness are no trifles, as many poor-sleepers know, and many would very much like to know the technique of successfully battling with it. One, as I remember, was to cultivate a cheerful attitude toward this nocturnal enemy—a difficult position to take, but optimism is better than pessimism in dealing with most difficulties. Other advice I do not remember; except the last thing this good lady mentioned—prayer.

Here, one can hardly help thinking of a night experience described in the sixteenth chapter of the Acts of the Apostles:

"At midnight, Paul and Silas prayed, and sang praises to God; and the prisoners heard them." It was a marvelous thing that men treated with absolute injustice, thrust into an inner prison, with their feet in the stocks and their backs bruised and bleeding from the blows of lictors' rods, should be singing praises. The cruel, bloody hand of Rome had been laid upon them (Philippi was a Roman "colony"), but they remembered with loving gratitude that the bleeding, nail-pierced hand, the healing hand, of One above all kings and kingdoms had been laid upon them in wondrous love; and they rejoiced in the privilege of suffering for Him and with Him. These songs in the night were preceded by, and mingled with, prayer.

And should not this remind us when suffering in conscience from some word or act, or neglect of duty even, that each of us, with sorrowful and sincere repentance for our sins, and prayer for forgiveness, may be able to say: "The Lord hath commanded His loving-kindness in the daytime, and in the night His song shall be with me and my prayer to the God of my life?" (Psalm 42:8.)

So, in the day, and even in the night, though "lying awake", we may find rest and joy in Him, who, in loving-kindness, has laid His pierced, healing hand on our poor hearts.

WHY WE GO TO CHURCH.

Mr. Editor:

An inhabitant of a South Sea Island, lately converted from barbarism to Christianity, was thus twitted by an explorer on his newly-found faith: "Why read the Bible and go to Church? Don't you know that these things are no longer considered necessary?" "Oh, yes, they are," came the ready answer, "for had I not learned the truth there, I would be eating you now."

To change cannibals into self-respecting, law-abiding citizens, to clean up the dark spots of the world, to eliminate much of the inferno which the ferocious passions of men make of life, to foster and promote learning, culture and enlightenment, to be the nursing-mother of all that is uplifting and noble in the community—this is the beneficent program which the Churches are tackling with heroic courage. Man has no greater friend on earth. They constitute the moral power house of the community. "The extension of Christ's incarnation," this is the significent description one has applied to the Church's mission on earth. What He was doing while here, the Churches are pledged to accomplish. Men should go there instinctively, gratefully, as the mark of highest manhood. Where else can we get so clear a conscience, the finest tonic the body can have.

Roosevelt used to say that Church-going gave him pep for the rest of the week. Buoyancy and uplift for mind and soul, as well as for body, are found as we company with those who hear the best music, see the best that art can give and are lifted to the heights by the noblest thoughts that have ever stirred the soul of man. Self-interest in the attainment of a liberal education should make us frequent and consistent attendants at Church.

Deep in man's soul is a plant called reverence. It needs watering at least once a week. To join the company of believing men who reverence and worship that Higher "Power that makes for righteousness" is the best way to keep alive in us the spark of the Divine. Worship is man's highest and noblest act. Here he rises to the sublime heights.

But man also looks forward. He hopes and dreams. The golden age is ever ahead of him. His future destiny furnishes for him the highest incentives to right living. This eternal hope in his heart is nourished by religion, the "hope that lives when promises are dead; that paves the way for progress; that visions peace and social justice; hope for time and for eternity; the great hope that casts its anchor behind Jesus Christ". The greatest going concern in all this world is the Church. No right-minded man can blot it out of his life without jeopardizing the fulness and integrity of that life. It is his first duty to himself, his family, his community and to his Creator. Blessed is that man who has the real home-sickness, for he shall come at last to his Father's House.

"'Tis religion that can give Sweetest pleasures while we live;
'Tis religion must supply
Solid comfort when we die."

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

A MAGAZINE FOR THE BLIND.

We have a letter from Mrs. Loaring Clark, Secretary of the Committee for the Literature for the Blind, Department of Missions, Sewanee, Tenn., announcing that the Church is about to issue a monthly magazine, "In Revised Braille for the Blind", and that there will be no charge for the magazine.

The occasion of writing to the Southern Churchman, was to ask permission to reprint some of our material from time to time, which permission we, of course, gladly gave.

We are using this incident now in order to call attention to a situation which is not generally known, namely, that reading matter for the blind goes through the mails entirely free of postage. Furthermore, there is a Bureau in the Congressional Library containing books for the blind, at the service of the blind people all over the country.

We presume that Mrs. Clark will be glad to know of blind persons who can read and would like to receive the magazine that she is preparing for publication.

If any of our readers can help in this good work, either by contributing useful material, or by sending the names and addresses of blind persons to Mrs. Clark, we feel sure that, in doing so, they will be rendering a valuable Christian service.

COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING.

By Mary Evelyn Brydon, M. D.

Article V.—The Law of the Road.

Nobody may ever hope to escape law. The operation of the universe is based on law. If you try to side-step it or ignore it, sooner or later it will catch you in its toils and you must pay the penalty of disobedience. There is no escape.

Nor would we do without law. Let us see where law comes into our daily lives: (1) There are the laws of nature: including gravitation, water flowing down instead of up hill; the earth rotating on its axis; the blowing of the winds; the ebb and flow of the tides, etc., each operating according to a definite law and all contributing to our comfort, convenience and safety. (2) There is the law of growth; a seed, a child, a plant, each under right conditions will grow wonderfully; under wrong conditions either grows feebly, or not at all. (3) There is the law of physics; that water and oil will not mix; the laws of chemistry; that good yeast under right conditions will cause bread to rise; that certain foods taken into the body will cause the body to grow, that other foods tend to retard growth. (4) There is a parliamentary law; every meeting of people from Congress to the little group meetings in your church or local community to be orderly must have laws governing it. Such laws are spoken of as Rules of Order. (5) There is the law of the body; fresh air sustains life, the lack of it kills. The blood system, the nervous system, muscular system, etc., all move in response to physical laws of nature. (6) There is the law of health; to be healthy everybody must have sunshine, recreation, right food, plenty of sleep, a happy environment. Without these things the body soon becomes unhealthy.

There are many other things governed by set laws or rules; rules of etiquette, or manners; there are criminal laws, statute laws; the moral law—the Ten Commandments —and the laws laid down by Christ. Thus you will see that every part of our lives has to do with the keeping of law.

No parent is doing right by a child who fails to teach that child to be law-abiding. I do not wish you to feel, however, for a moment, that, in order to teach a child to be law-abiding, you must sit down, make out a long list of laws and then teach them to him word for word. No, indeed, such is far from my mind. The child must be taught that there are laws all about him which must govern his conduct so that he may live harmoniously with other people. In other words, he may not live to himself alone; such a thing is impossible if he would be happy. It is rather the attitude towards law that you should teach the child. No sensible mother will ever say to a child, "Today I will teach you the Sixth Commandment; now, listen, THOU SHALT NOT KILL. Say it after me, THOU SHALT NOT KILL". What a foolish mother she would be, if she taught a little child anything about killing. The word need never be mentioned unless he comes with a question. For if the child is normal and was suddenly forbidden to kill, doubtless his first response would be to get out and try to do it in order to see what would happen.

Positive teaching is what we want; not negative teaching. I shall say something to you later about the mother who trains negatively; the "DON'T" kind of mother. Can't you hear her? Perhaps you yourself are continually saying Don't, Don't, Don't, all the time. You little know what harm you may do the child you love so tenderly by this negative sort of training.

It is the right attitude towards all law that you want to teach. The RIGHT ATTITUDE. Get this. Not the law itself so much, but the right attitude towards all law. To learn that the only way we may show our ability is through what we do and how we do it; and the only way we may express our attitude towards a thing is by what we say and how we say it. A reprimand may be just as effective if given with a smile on the face and in a quiet voice as with an ugly scowl on the face and in a loud, harsh, discordant voice. Each will express an attitude on your part. Both may mean that you mean business, and no nonsense, or both may mean the reverse. The first should show that you have only the love of the child at heart; but the second may give the child the impression that you are displeased and giving vent to your irritation.

To every situation, you or I or our child shows a definite attitude. The situation will call forth some kind of reaction or response.

To foster in a child the right attitude towards law and order, any law or rule, it is necessary that you set the right example towards all laws in your home as are set for the welfare and happiness of your family and community. In other words, you must yourself be obedient to law.

Your child may have a great desire to drive your automobile. At fourteen or fifteen he may be large and apparently as mature as the boy sixteen who is driving a car. You may feel that your boy is as capable of driving the car as the sixteen-year-old boy. He might never have an accident or be questioned by a traffic officer. But you know that if you allow your boy to drive before he is sixteen that he will be breaking a traffic law. You may not approve of this law, but that is no excuse for letting your child break it. You ought to teach him the right attitude toward the laws that are laid down for the safety of the community and teach him also that he is a part of the whole community and that the laws cannot be broken for his particular convenience.

In the next article I shall discuss the basis of all law—

the Ten Commandments—as a means of enabling you to check up yourself to see if you are a law-abiding person. This you should endeavor to ascertain before you try to teach obedience to your child. If you fail in the test you may look for failure in your results in training obedience to law.

In the coming week, in addition to your regular readings, or in place of them, if you are pressed for time, will you please read the Ten Commandments in Exodus, Chapter 20, Verses 1 to 17; and as you read will you try to study each commandment separately, writing down a teaching of each as one word, one positive word, instead of a negative one? This will take much deep thinking on your part. Try it any way.

BOOK REVIEWS

REALITY: By Burnett Hillmer Sreeter. The Macmillan Company, New York. Pp. 350.

When such a scholar as Dr. Streeter, after more than thirty years of careful study, reaches definite conclusions, and states his findings in plain language, the result is a book that is well worth the study of every one who is seriously interested in religion. Having passed through the deep waters of doubt, and almost sinking in agnosticism this author realizes fully that the mere statements of truths are not sufficient evidence for thinking people of today, especially for the younger generation, and he backs his convictions with evidence and authority. The author begins with "Materialism", and in ten chapters concluding with "Immortality", he discusses almost every approach to religion in general and Christianity in particular. Each chapter is prefaced by a synopsis, enabling the reader to turn easily to the consideration of any phase of a desired subject. Although dealing entirely with the most serious relations of life, the style is not heavy, and the book is easy reading for any one who gives real thought to these matters. In an appendix the writer treats interestingly of "Dream Psychology", "The Mystic Vision" and "The Morality of Instinct".

This volume will be a valuable addition to any library.

SECURING CHRISTIAN LEADERS FOR TOMORROW: By Samuel McCrea Cavert. George H. Doran Company, New York. Pp. 177.

Although this book is written by one man, it is the product of many minds, being made up largely of the findings of conferences held over a period of more than two years by religious workers of practically all Protestant denominations, with the same end in view, namely: the dedication of lives to the Christian ideal. This does not necessarily mean recruiting for the ministry, for, as the author says, "The appeal of Christ is not to leave the ordinary tasks of life and take up what is commonly called religious work. Rather is it to make every business, or trade, or profession a means of helping to fulfil God's idea of creating a righteous and brotherly and truly happy world". The author then illustrates what he means by citing life of Dr. F. G. Bunting, of Toronto, and J. J. Eagan, of Atlanta, Ga., both of whom Christianized professional and business life. The book has only six chapters, the first (from which we have quoted), "The Christian View of Life Work". The next three deal with the presentation of this ideal to "The Child", "The Youth" and the "College Student". Chapter five, "The Right Person in the Right Place", considers the importance of selecting one's life work, and not merely leaving it to luck, or coincidence. The last chapter contains the conclusions reached by the author, which are very definite, and would make excellent material for discussion subjects in young people's meetings. In fact, this book will be found exceedingly useful in that kind of work, and we commend it highly to those who are doing any instruction in schools, or colleges.

THE ACHIEVEMENT OF THE MASTER: By Herbert R. Purinton and Sadie Brackett Costello. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York. Pp. 201.

This little volume is especially valuable at this time, because it does not come from the pen of a preacher, but is the product of workers in public education. According to their own statement, "For the past seven years the authors have tried to bring high school and college students face to face with the historical Jesus. They have used especially the three documents that present the earliest information about Him—the Gospel of Mark, the Sermon on the Mount, and the Letters of Paul. The result has been a new sense of the actual achievements of the Master in both deeds and teachings. The methods suggested at the end of each chapter have proven their value. Having discovered the historical facts the students have been led to realize their spiritual meaning by a study of the best pictures and books, and to apply the principles thus discovered to actual cases in modern social and individual life".

With this end in view the book is divided into short chapters, subdivided into sections, making it either a text book for students, or a book of outlines for lecturers. It would be invaluable to a minister planning to give a course of talks in elementary, or high schools: in fact it would do very well for a course for college students. Almost every chapter contains short illustrative poems, easy to memorize. A sample of the style is found in this paragraph on prayer, "True prayer is most often a private, secret thing, a transaction between the soul and God. It is often intense, the highest energy of which the soul is capable. Words may not be spoken, but the contemplation of lofty thought, the concentration of the mind on high purposes, the communion with the Infinite is a task that calls out the best in man. In solitary struggle we learn by heart what in public we may repeat".

In conclusion, helpful lists are given of "Reference Books for Study", "Books for General Reading", "Lists of Artists and Paintings" and "Index of Names and Subjects". We cannot commend this little volume too highly.

TWO BOOKS ON THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

The Kingdom of God in the Apostolic Writings: By Dr. A. M. M. Macinnes. Doran Company, New York.

The Realm of God: By the Rev. L. E. Bennett, Master of King's College, Queensland. Doran Company, New York.

These two books give further evidence that this greatest of subjects is taking its place in the front of Biblical studies. Readers of the lamented Clutton Brock's little book, What is the Kingdom of Heaven? will recall how he said that Christ "was always talking about it, always trying to explain what He meant by it", and, furthermore, that no Church "has laid that emphasis on the doctrine which Christ Himself laid on it". This seems in the way of being no longer true. Mr. Bennett gives a list of a dozen books on the special subject of the Kingdom, along with many others dealing partially with it.

It seems hardly worth while to consider the books separately. They are both well worth reading. Dr. Macinnes' book is exceedingly interesting and instructive. He brings out, indeed, both books show, the various ideas of the Kingdom: A Temporal Kingdom hoped for by the Jews, the Apocalyptic Kingdom relegated to a future beyond the world, the Kingdom at hand now and forever. Christ's Kingdom of Heaven is "eternal life". In St. John's Gospel the expression "eternal life" is equivalent to the expressions Kingdom of Heaven or Kingdom of God in the other Gospels. It is a great reality which begins here and continues beyond. It is a peculiar reality which has values and ideals and ways quite different from those of the world in which it is at hand. "There seems," writes Mr. Bennett, "to lie in Christ's great conception of the Kingdom of God a world of meaning that has not yet been satisfactorily expressed." He characterizes it as "a new order in the earth". Dr. Macinnes writes: "The question has been asked, What does Jesus mean by the Kingdom of Heaven? Is it present or future? He says it is both, and our endeavor shall be to find out what His meaning was". That is his book.

Of course, no book on this subject can escape facing the great divide which Christ Himself makes between His Kingdom and the Kingdom of the World. And no book that I know of has faced this subject quite satisfactorily. Neither of the present books seems to me to give a satisfactory exposition of what should be the relation of the Kingdom of Heaven to the Kingdom of this World. Christ's great discourses seem to have been directed toward the building up of His Kingdom within the Kingdom of this World. For the spread of His Kingdom He seemed not to depend, if I may use the expression, upon "direct action" on the World, but upon building up His Kingdom, one might almost say, apart from the World. The children of His Kingdom must of course live also under Caesar's kingdom in this life. Both Kingdoms are recognized.

This phase of the subject will be found discussed in Dr. Macinnes' chapter on "The Christian Church and the State" and in Mr. Bennett's chapter on "The Realization of the Kingdom". We commend the reading, not only of these chapters, but of the whole of both books. Surely no honest study and devout meditation on any subject pertaining to what one of the authors ventures to call the "great central thought of Jesus" can be in vain.

Church Mission of Help Institute.

The National Church Mission of Help will hold its seventh annual three-day Institute in Grace Church Parish House, Providence, Rhode Island, on February 10, 11 and 12, 1927. A cordial invitation is extended to all Church workers, interested persons, and representatives from other social agencies. Girls' Friendly Society, Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and Diocesan Social Service Commissions are urged to send delegates.

The sessions include addresses, followed by discussion, on the subjects: The Contribution of Social Work to the Church, by Dean Lathrop; The Understanding and Helping of Young People, by Dr. W. H. Healey, of the Judge Baker Foundation of Boston; The Contribution of the Volunteer to the Work of the Church, by Mrs. Theodore W. Robinson, Chicago Church Mission of Help; The Contribution of the Trained Worker to the Church, by Miss Helen Kempton, New York School of Social Work; The Contribution of Religion in the Training of Social Workers, by Rev. J. D. Hamlin, St. John's Church, Newport. Luncheon addresses will be given by the Rev. W. B. Spofford, of The Witness; the Rev. R. W. Magoun, of the Newport Seamen's Church Institute, and the Rev. W. A. Lawrence, rector of Grace Church, Providence, where the special services of the Institute will be held. Bishop Perry is to be the celebrant at the Corporate Communion.

Missionaries Leaving China.

The following cable was received on January 27, 1927, from Mr. M. P. Walker, Treasurer of the District of Shanghai:

Miss Mabel Sibson, Miss C. M. Bennett, the Rev. J. D. Mowrey and family, leaving Shanghai by S. S. President Cleveland, January 20 (due San Francisco, February 9).

Deaconess Katharine Putnam, Miss H. B. Wilson, leaving Shanghai by S. S. President Madison, January 27 (due in Seattle February 11).

Miss Hazel F. McNair, Miss Annie Brown, Dr. Margaret Richey, leaving Shanghai by S. S. D'Artagnan, January 29 (via Europe).

Miss E. G. Stedman, Miss M. J. Ravenal, Miss M. G. Cabot, Mr. H. E. Shaffer and family, leaving Shanghai by S. S. Empress of Canada, January 29 (due Vancouver, February 13).

The Rev. S. H. Littell and family, leaving Shanghai by S. S. Fulda, February 1 (via Europe).

The cable also states:

"On advice of American Consul have called in all women and children District of Shanghai."

A cable received on January 28 from Bishop Roots in Hankow reports the movements of several members of the staff: The Rev. F. J. M. Cotter and family are well, and are sailing March 13. Miss Stedman, Miss Clark and Miss Tetley had gone to Shanghai. Mrs. Walworth Tyng and family had arrived in Hankow (from Changsha). Mrs. Paul Wakefield and daughters were leaving for Japan. Miss M. E. Wood, now in the United States and expecting to return in February, was advised not to return for the present.

A further cable, received on January 29, from Bishop Roots, says: Local situation has slightly improved. Out-station women and children will probably come to Hankow shortly.

Bishop Huntington sends a cable from Anking, received January 29: Mrs. T. L. Sinclair and children in Shanghai. The Rev. T. L. Sinclair and all missionaries at mission stations are safe.

A Statement From the Treasurer.

The National Council will close its books for the year 1926 with a small surplus without using as currect income the principle of any undesignated legacies. The exact amount of this surplus cannot be determined until final reports are received from the mission fields.

On December 1 it was announced that $928,656 (adjusted to $912,087) was still unpaid on the total, which the several dioceses told the Council it might expect during the year. During the last month of the year $883,136.51 was received from the dioceses, leaving a net shortage of $28,950.49, which will be made up by savings, in excess of earlier estimates, in operating expenses.

The first year under the "Pay-as-you-go Plan" is thus successfully closed. This plan was inaugurated by the General Convention of 1925 and provided that each Diocese should, on January 15 of each year, notify the National Council of the amount which it expected to pay on its budget quota during the coming year. The Council was then instructed to adjust its appropriations to a total not in excess of the income to be expected. Acting under these instructions the Council, in February, 1926, reduced its appropriations by $200,410.

Out of ninety-seven Dioceses and Missionary Districts to which quotas were allotted, forty-nine have paid their full share of the budget, while seventy-four have paid what they told the National Council to expect.

Lewis B. Franklin,
Treasurer.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

The Convention.

"It is being demonstrated that the true social gospel proclaimed by Jesus is being more and more generally interpreted, not as a distinctive entity, not as a rebellion against duly constituted and lawful government, not as a repudiation of private and corporate property rights, not as a superimposition upon, but as an inherent, constituent factor of, the Divine plan of individual human cooperation for salvation, and the Divine decree that love of earthly brother is inseparable from that of the Heavenly Father," said the Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murray, D. D., to his Diocesan Convention, which met at Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, January 26 and 27.

The meeting of the convention was occupied largely with routine matters. An attempt to make the Executive Council elective from the floor of the House instead of at the nomination of the Bishop was defeated, and the Rev. Messrs. Birckhead, Dame, Dewart, Hooff, Kinsolving, McClenthen, Messrs. Edgar Guest Gibson, Henry Barton Jacobs, Tasker G. Lowndes, Blanchard Randall, George C. Thomas, and Albert G. Towers, were elected to membership on the Council. Mr. Edgar Guest Gibson was elected Chancellor of the Diocese. A rising vote of appreciation was given Mr. Arthur Boehm on his retirement after seven years as missions treasurer. A committee was appointed to confer with the lay council of the Cathedral congregation concerning the erection of a church for the congregation. The next convention will meet in January of next year at Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore.

The Crusade In Charlottesville.

During the week beginning January 23 the Bishops' Crusade was held in Charlottesville, the national Crusaders being Bishop Cook, of Delaware; Dean Gateson, of Bethlehem, Pa., and Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook, of Washington, D. C., who had during the previous week conducted the Crusade in Richmond. Active preparation had been made through prayer meetings, sermons, the distribution of literature and the organized efforts of both men and women, and of the young people, to secure a large attendance.

On Sunday morning, January 23, Dean Gateson preached in Christ Church and Bishop Cook in the Chapel of the University of Virginia, Dr. Glazebrook also making a brief address. In the afternoon there was a mass meeting of the young people in Christ Church, at which Bishop Cook and Dean Gateson made addresses. At 7:15 P. M. Dean Gateson preached in the University Chapel, and at 8 P. M. there was a mass meeting in Christ Church, addressed by Bishop Cook and Dr. Glazebrooke.

Each week-day there was a celebration of the Holy Communion at 8 o'clock; at 11:30 A. M. a Clinical Conference on Crusade Preparation and Follow-up; at 4 P. M. a Conference on Christian Living, and at 8 P. M. a mass meeting. All of these were in Christ Church. At 7:15 P. M. each day in St. Paul's Parish House there was a conference for university students only.

The clinical conferences were attended by a number of clergy from the Albemarle and Valley Convocations and by many lay representatives of parishes and missions, both men and women.

Of the 4 o'clock conferences Dean Gateson conducted two, Dr. Glazebrook one and Bishop Cook two. Bishop Cook preached at all the mass meetings except one, when Dean Gateson filled the pulpit. At three of the mass meetings Dr. Glazebrook also spoke. Dean Gateson addressed the students twice, Dr. Glazebrook twice and Bishop Cook once.

Bishop Tucker was present on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of the Crusade, making an address of greeting at the Tuesday mass meeting.

In addition to the regular program the three Crusaders visited St. Anne's School on different days and made addresses; Dr. Glazebrook was the guest of both Kiwanis and Rotary and made speeches; Dean Gateson conducted a service and preached in the chapel of the Blue Ridge Sanitorium; and a service was held in the First Baptist Church (Colored) under the auspices of Trinity Mission, at which addresses were made by Dean Gateson and the Rev. Dennis Whittle.

The closing mass meeting on Friday night included a solemn service of rededication and preparation for the Holy Communion. Bishop Cook preached the sermon and made an appeal to all to express in some tangible form their reawakened purposes in Christian life and service. Hundreds of rededication cards were signed and gathered by the ushers and presented at the altar. And after asking that all should complete the act of rededication in the Holy Communion on Sunday, Bishop Cook conducted a service of preparation, leading in a searching self-examination based upon the Ten Commandments. The Crusade had all the outward signs of success and the general conviction was that Crusaders had left behind them an enduring blessing.

The Annual Council.

On January 25 and 26, the clergy and lay delegates of the Diocese were assembled in Petersburg for the thirty-fifth Annual Council. The morning and afternoon sessions were held in the chapel of Grace Church, the Rev. E. R. Carter, D. D., rector; and the evening sessions in St. Paul's Church, the Rev. J. M. B. Gill, rector. Luncheon was served each day in the parish house of Grace Church, and supper in St. Paul's parish house.

The predominant note of the council was the Bishops' Crusade. Bishop Thomson's address was largely given to an account of what had been done, and what was to be done in the Diocese for the Crusade; and the clergy conference in St. Paul's parish house on Tuesday evening, January 25, was, in the main, a discussion of the methods to be followed in the various parishes. The Rev. Thomas Semmes told of his experiences as Crusader in the Diocese of Bethlehem.

While the clergy were in conference in the parish house, the laymen, in St. Paul's Church, were perfecting the organization of a Laymen's League, to be composed of delegates from the men's organizations in the various parishes. This league will hold its sessions on the first evening of each meeting of the council, under the leadership of the president, Mr. W. W. Old, and will labor for the good of the churches in the Diocese.

Mr. Monell Sayre reported that the Pension Fund was operating on a basis of ninety-eight per cent success in collections. He stressed the policy of the Pension Fund in paying the bonus of $1,000 to the widow immediately upon the death of a clergyman, without red tape; provided all the premiums had been paid. He answered seemingly to the satisfaction of enquirers, all questions that came to him from the floor; and expressed the hope that it would not be many years before the Fund would be providing a $1,200 minimum pension.

Dr. John W. Wood spoke of the work of the Church Building Fund Committee, and its close relation to the missionary work of the Church. He noted that very few churches, of those that had been helped by the committee, were taking the annual offerings requested for the work. But he said that fortunately, many Church people in dying left legacies for the Building Fund.

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, City Missionary of Richmond, told of numbers of cases of needy invalids and cripples from Southern Virginia, that he had been able to place in state institutions. He recommended the appointment of an executive secretary for social service, for the Diocese, who would work in cooperation with him, for developing Christian social service throughout the Diocese.

Mr. T. W. Matthews, treasurer of the Church's Program, reported that $68,000 of the $69,000 pledged, had been paid for the year 1926. Interesting reports were read from the Jackson-Feild Home for Girls, the Boys' Home at Covington, St. Paul's School at Lawrenceville, and other institutions.

Most of the old officers were reelected. Mr. Robert B. Tunstall, of Norfolk, was elected Chancellor to succeed Mr. Thomas H. Willcox, deceased; and Miss Mary F. Goodwin was elected Historiographer, to succeed the Rev. W. A. R. Goodwin, D. D., who resigned on account of the press of duties.

At a missionary service on Wednesday evening, the Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., spoke of Diocesan Missions, and the Rev. Franklin T. Osborne, of Brazil, told of his work.

The Council expressed its sympathy to their beloved Bishop, the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., in the great sorrow that had recently come to him in the death of his wife, Mrs. Anna Maria Washington Tucker. Bishop Tucker presided over the sessions of council with his usual vigor, and introduced the missionary speakers at the closing service on Wednesday night.

Mission at Trinity Church, Portsmouth.

The Rev. Walter E. Bentley, of New York, held a mission in Trinity Church, Portsmouth, the Rev. C. H. Holmead, rector, from January 12 through January 23, preaching Sundays, each week night and on two afternoons. Mr. Bentley's experience, first as an actor and then a parish priest and a world-wide traveler, has supplied him with a fund of interesting material and illustrations which make his sermons and addresses very appealing. The mission was a gratifying success, both from the side of steadily increasing attendance as well as the large number at the rededication meeting the last night. The question box for unsigned questions made a strong attraction at Trinity Church, and Mr. Bentley took up these questions at each service.

The Rev. Francis C. Steinmetz, rector of Christ Church, Norfolk, has resigned, to take effect March 1, this step being the final outcome of a controversy between the rector and vestry of the church, which originated in the former's attempt to substitute a statue of the Virgin Mary for one of the Angel of the Annunciation in a memorial chapel of the church. The City Court decided that the title and control of Church properly lies is the vestry and not in the rector.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Bishop's Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade, carefully prepared for, was well supported in the Diocese. The six central large churches in six districts of the Diocese were chosen for the services with mission preachers as follows: St. Peter's, Morristown, Bishop Stearly; Grace Church, Orange, the Rev. Dr. Peter, of Richmond, Va.; Trinity, Newark, the Rev. H. A. Prichard, of New York; St. John's Church, Jersey City, President Bartlett, of Hobart College; St. Paul's, Paterson, the Rev. Samuel Shoemaker, of New York; Christ Church, Hackensack, the Rev. Dr. Highmoor, of Atlanta, Ga. On Sunday evenings, January 16 and 23, some of the churches would not hold the congregations which came. On the week days there were conferences which brought together special groups, and congregations numbered in many hundreds in the evening. The work following up what has been gained has been taken up with the calling of the clergy together in the five Archdeaconries, to agree upon plans for preparation, through the meeting of parochial groups, for a mission in the one hundred and fifty-five parish and mission churches of the Diocese in Lent. There is great satisfaction with what has been done, and a strong desire to make the whole of the coming Lent a time of religious revival and spiritual quickening.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

Bishop Harding Memorial Service.

The service in memory of the late Bishop Harding on St. Paul's Day in Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, was beautiful, with many of the clergy in the chancel, the full choir singing, and the presentation of offerings from the several parishes. These offerings are for the furnishings of the Chapel of the Resurrection, which is the Harding Memorial Chapel. This chapel, now structurally complete, is an outstanding architectural achievement of the Cathedral project.

St. Paul's Church, of which Bishop Harding was rector for twenty-five years before his consecration as Bishop, has pledged itself to place the choir stalls in the chapel as its share in the memorial furnishings in honor of Bishop Harding.

Lectures on Christian Worship and the Prayer Book.

A second course of lectures presented by the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, planned for the week of January 21 and running through February 11, exclusive of Saturday and Sunday, is being conducted by the Rev. Frederick E. Seymour, Educational Secretary of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. The subject of the course is "Christian Worship and the Prayer Book". Students attending all ten lectures and passing the required examinations will be granted a certificate, which constitutes a part of eligibility requirements for a diploma, from the National Accredited Teachers' Association.

The course is being conducted every evening at St. Mark's Church.

Following Up The Crusade.

St. Paul's Church will conduct a series of conferences during the week of February 6, as a sort of follow-up of the Bishops' Crusade, and the preacher in charge will be the Rev. MacVeigh Harrison. Conferences will be held each afternoon and evening.

Preaching Mission.

The Rev. Edward Brown Jermin, of New York, held an eight-day preaching mission in the Church of Our Saviour, beginning January 30, and continuing through February 6. The services were held every morning at seven o'clock and every evening at eight o'clock.

Recent Improvements In Church Property.

Since the completion of the new parish hall, for which the cornerstone was laid on St. Mark's Day, April 25, 1926, by the Bishop of Washington, St. Mark's Parish, Washington (the Rev. William H. Pettus, rector) has removed the old dwelling houses, east of the church and north of the new parish hall. These recent improvements give St. Mark's one of the most beautiful and ideally located set of buildings in Washington. It is proposed to use the lawn for fetes and open-air services, when the weather permits. St. Mark's has had large attendance during the Bishops' Crusade, it being one of the four centers for Washington. The church, which accommodated seven hundred, was taxed to its capacity on the evenings of January 23 to 28, when the Crusader, the Rev. Frederick G. Budlong, rector of Christ Church, Greenwich, Conn., was the preacher.

SOUTHWESTERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Continuing The Crusade.

Following the initial crusades in Lynchburg, Roanoke and Staunton, missions are being held in many of the smaller parishes in the Diocese.

At St. John's Church, Bedford, of which the Rev. W. A. Pearman is rector, a mission was conducted from January 13 to 20, by the Rev. Claudius F. Smith, of Big Stone Gap, Va. There were two services each day, which were well attended and greatly enjoyed.

At Christ Church, Pulaski, the Rev. John F. Coleman, rector, the Rev. Mr. Smith was the leader in a mission from Sunday, January 23, to Friday, the twenty-eighth. Each day there was a conference at ten A. M., and a service at eight P. M. At the morning conferences he spoke on the general subject of Prayer, and at night on vital topics related to the objectives of the Crusade. The attendance and interest increased daily. The pastors and people of the other communions cooperated heartily in the Crusade, and it took on a community scope and interest. The final conference was followed by a celebration of the Holy Communion and at the closing service the people devoted themselves, by a solemn act of dedication, to Christ and to the purposes of the Crusade. In addition to the Church services, Mr. Smith made addresses to the Rotary and Kiwanis Clubs and to the pupils of Jefferson School. The Crusade in Pulaski was full of inspiration and helpfulness and lasting results in increased devotion and activity are confidently anticipated.

Beginning Sunday, January 16, the Rev. A. V. Colston, rector of the churches at Buchanan and Fincastle, held a mission for the Colored congregation at St. Philip's Church, Bedford, the Rev. Charles L. Somers, of Lynchburg, rector. Splendid interest was manifested in the services, not only by the people of St. Philip's, but by the members of other Colored communions as well. By special invitation the Rev. Mr. Colston preached on one or two occasions in the Baptist church. Friday evening, January 21, Bishop Jett visited St. Philip's and confirmed four persons. Mr. Colston's mission was supposed to close with this service, but the enthusiasm and interest of the people was so marked that the services were continued through Sunday.

Bishop Jett in South Dakota.

On Wednesday evening, January 26, Bishop Jett left Roanoke for South Dakota, where he is to lead the Bishops' Crusade during the first half of February.

After Bishop Jett has completed this engagement and perhaps a trip farther in the Northwest, he plans to take a short rest so that it is probable he will not return to Roanoke before the first of March.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. F. W. Sterrett, D. D., Coadjutor.

Death of the Rev. William Nicholas Weir.

The whole Diocese was shocked and saddened to hear of the sudden death of Mr. Weir in New York on Monday, January 24, 1927. He had gone to New York on business apparently in good health. As he was hurrying up the steps of the Thirty-third Street L station, he fell over dead. He was alone and the superintendent of motor power found out who he was from papers in his pocket. He telegraphed the news to his home in Sayre, Pa., and the warden informed the Bishops of the Diocese.

Mr. Weir was one of the most prominent and successful rectors in the Diocese. He was rector of the Church of the Redeemer for about eighteen years. His parish house activities extended its influence throughout the whole town and neighborhood. He had all sorts of classes for nearly all ages and when in town was a daily visitor to Sayre Hospital, of which he was the chaplain. His place will be hard to fill in the Diocese and the whole Church.

At this writing the funeral arrangements have not been made. His former home was in Queen Anne's County, Maryland, but it is believed he would wish to be buried among his people in Sayre by whom in the Church and out of it he was universally loved and respected.

Bethlehem Will Meet Its Quota for 1927

The Bishops and Executive Council met on St. Paul's Day and adopted the budget for 1927. While the pledges are less than last year, it was found out that the Diocese can carry on and put one new man in the field and also pay its full quota to the National Council for 1927. This result is only possible because the year was closed with a balance.

Bishop Talbot Honored.

On St. Paul's Day, Bishop Talbot was called to the Philadelphia Divinity School to receive the degree of Doctor of Canon Law. A committee, consisting of the Rev. Messrs. F. L. Flinchbaugh, D. D., R. F. Philbrook, Deans Howard W. Diller and D. Wilmot Gateson, and Messrs. Horace Dey Lente, H. B. Schooley, and A. N. Cleaver, has been formed to raise an endowment fund of $100,000 for the Ethelbert Talbot Professorship of Biblical Learning for the Divinity School of Philadelphia.

This committee has issued a booklet giving the history of the School and explaining the plans and program of the dean and faculty for the better instruction and equipment of the clergy of the Church in the future days. If these plans can be carried out it will make the Divinity School easily the leading Seminary within the bounds of the State of Pennsylvania.

The Bishops' Crusade.

So far three large Epiphanytide Crusades have been successfully conducted in the Diocese: at the Pro-Cathedral, Bethlehem, with Dr. Floyd Tomkins, and Dr. Thomas Semmes as the Crusaders; at Christ Church, Reading, with Bishop Sterrett and the clergy of the city assisting; at St. Stephen's, Wilkes-Barre, with Bishop Rogers and Dr. Semmes as the Crusaders.

The Archdeacon conducted a mission in the Church of the Advent, Baltimore, from January 16 and 21. From January 30 to February 4, he will conduct a mission in St. Stephen's Church, Catasauqua, the Rev. Wm. F. Colclough, rector.

Annual Convocation.

The Convocation of the Missionary District of Arizona met at Trinity Cathedral, Phoenix, on January 11, 12 and 13. The first day was devoted to the meeting of the Executive Council with splendid reports received from all departments which were put into shape for presentation to the regular meeting of the convocation the next day.

On Wednesday, January 12, following the celebration of the Holy Communion, Bishop Mitchell delivered his annual address, in which he spoke of the progress which had been made in the District and his plans for the future. Following the address at the opening session an interesting feature was the presentation of best wishes from the Presbyterian Synod of Arizona delivered by the Rev. V. A. Rule, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church at Phoenix. In his address, the Rev. Mr. Rule announced that he had the approval of the Presbyterian Church of Arizona to offer to the Episcopal Church any of their buildings in the state at any time for holding services. This cordial expression of fellowship was greatly appreciated and due thanks returned by the Bishop.

Following luncheon served by the ladies of the Auxiliary Guild of Trinity Cathedral, the Girls' Friendly Society having served on Tuesday, the convocation reassembled for business. Reports and changes of canons were discussed, then came appointments and elections, resulting in the following:

Archdeacon, the Ven. J. R. Jenkins; District Missionary, the Rev. E. R. Cocks; Registrar, Canon C. A. Dowdell; Chancellor, Hon. E. W. Lewis; G. O. F. Treasurer, Mr. V. O. Wallingford.

Election of delegates to the Province of the Pacific: The Very Rev. Edwin S. Lane, the Rev. E. L. Simonson, Canon B. R. Cocks, Messrs. R. L. Motes, V. O. Wallingford, Francis Crable. Alternates: the Rev. A. W. Nichols, the Ven. J. R. Jenkins, the Rev. E. L. Freeland, Mr. H. S. Reed, R. B Riell, H. Baxter.

For the Executive Council: the Rev. E. L. Freeland, the Very Rev. E. S. Lane, Mr. E. C. Clark, M. LeBoutillier, V. O. Wallingford, Major L. F. Brady.

The convocation reassembled on Thursday after celebration of the Holy Communion, in general session with the Woman's Auxiliary and the Girls' Friendly, at which plans for the Bishops' Crusade were discussed and all pledged their hearty support.

After luncheon served by the Junior Guild the two women's organizations met in separate session and the convocation proceeded to the business of hearing reports, etc. It was decided to meet in Douglas, Arizona, in January, 1928.

Galilee Mission's Thirtieth Anniversary.

Beginning Saturday night, January 29, and continuing Sunday and Monday nights, Galilee Mission, Philadelphia, commemorated the thirtieth anniversary of the institution of its work as a rescue mission for men in the old tenderloin district of this city.

A feature of the three days' anniversary was the attendance of scores of men from many parts of the United States who have been reestablished and helped to a new start in life through the Mission. Many of these men are now holding responsible positions in business, professional and religious life. During the anniversary a number of them gave testimony to the part Galilee Mission had in reshaping their lives.

Saturday night's program included addresses by the Rev. Louis C. Washburn, rector of Old Christ Church; the Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins, rector of Holy Trinity Church, and William A. Lippincott, Jr., a member of the Board of Managers. The music was rendered by the choir of Old Christ Church.

Sunday night's program included addresses by George W. Wilkins, Superintendent of the Mission; the Rev. Robert R. Windley, Chaplain; William J. Crawford and John Green. On Monday night the speakers included the Rev. L. N. Caley, rector of St. Martin's, Oak Lane; the Rev. C. H. Reese, rector of St. Matthew's Church; the Rev. Stanley V. Wilcox, rector of St. Paul's Church, and Mr. Edward H. Bonsall and Mr. E. B. McCarthy, members of the Board. The choir of St. Matthew's took part in Monday night's program.

Galilee Mission had its beginning in a small house near Ninth and Callowhill Streets, thirty years ago. It is conducted under the auspices of the Episcopal Church. During its thirty years, thousands of men have been helped to a new start in life. During the year just past the Mission served 55,057 meals to needy men; 34,982 lodgings were given; employment in the building was given to 2,979 men and positions were obtained for five hundred and eighty-two men. The chapel attendance for the year was 20,358.

All Day Missionary Meeting.

The Rt. Rev. Peter Trimble Rowe, Bishop of Alaska, was one of the speakers at an "All-Day Missionary Meeting" on Wednesday, January 26, in Holy Trinity Church, held under the auspices of the Pennsylvania Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary.

Other outstanding leaders in mission work, representing the large mission fields of the Episcopal Church in the United States and the missionary work of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, were among the speakers. The meeting opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion. The Rt. Rev. Julius W. Atwood, of Arizona, discussed Indian Missions. Dr. James H. Dillard, representing the American Church Institute for Negroes, spoke on Colored Missions at the morning session.

Bishop Rowe opened the afternoon session with a discussion of Domestic Missions. Dr. William C. Sturgis, head of the Educational Division of the National Department of Missions, spoke on Foreign Missions, and the Rev. Jules M. Pevost, head of the Bucks County Missions of the Diocese of Pennsylvania, discussed Diocesan Missions. Musical selections were rendered morning and afternoon by the American Church Institute for Negroes' Quartette.

1927 Quota Paid In Full.

The Bishop promised the National Council that South Dakota would meet its apportionment for 1927. Before January was half gone Buffalo Gap had won first place on the honor roll. The entire quota for 1927 was paid on January 13. Bristol followed with its full amount for the year a few days later. And now St. Mary's School for Indians at Springfield has set for itself a splendid example. The school has never been apportioned any quota before, but this year they have paid promptly and in full what was asked of them. So begins our 1927 honor roll.

The Fifty-Third Annual Convention Admits Women To Suffrage.

The Fifty-Third Annual Convention of the Diocese of Southern Ohio, together with the Eighth Annual Meeting of the House of Church Women, was held at Christ Church, Cincinnati, on Monday and Tuesday, January 24 and 25, 1927. The second day of the convention, which was set aside for conferences on the Bishops' Crusade, was, by a happy coincidence, both Feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, and also the thirty-eighth anniversary of the consecration of the Bishops of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent.

In connection with his annual address, which was delivered to a joint session of both conventions on Monday afternoon, Bishop Vincent made a final

He sits who gave Himself for me,
He sees the coppers that I give
Who gave His life that I might live.
He sees the silver that I withhold
Who left for me His throne of gold,
Who found a manger for His bed,
Who had nowhere to lay His head,
He sees the gold I clasp so tight,
And I am a debtor in His sight.

—Missions.

"He Hath Declared Him."

"No man hath seen God at any time," says St. John—and I take it that he means something more than physical sight which could have no application here: he means, I believe, that in His final nature, apart from authentic revelation of Himself, God is obscure and unknowable. The mystery of life lies too heavy upon us all not to know how desolate a mood that sentence may express: "No man hath seen God at any time." There is ruthlessness in natural creation which is hard to reconcile with a good God. There is impersonality in the laws of the natural world to which we are all made subject. The mechanism of the modern is only the fatalism of the ancient in a different dress, the Anangke of the Greek, the Kismet of the Mohammedan. There are times when we seem to be caught as a wild thing in a trap. Little children suffer for others' sins, and men hate and fight, and there is the everlasting problem of the dreadfully poor. What kind of a God is God? That is the ever-present problem of life.

And even if you say that the force of the Universe is personal, in the sense that there is intelligence and will in that Force, how much does He care for us, whether we rise or sink? What communication is possible between us? Are there secrets in His keeping which I may learn if I listen? Is He force, or is He Father? Those questions, without Christ, are left permanently unanswered. But if Christ is the revelation of God, if God feels towards us as Christ does; if He represents the perfect character of God completely expressed in human and understandable terms, then, for all that our liberal friend may say, we do know God. Him whom we have been ignorantly worshipping, Him Christ declares unto us. The perfection of Christ's own life and character is the best seal that He is the revelation of God. What can you think of God as being which Christ is not? What further perfection does your imagination glimpse which is not in Christ? And can you not say, with St. John, that "the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him"?—From a Sermon by the Rev. S. M. Shoemaker, Jr.

For the Southern Churchman.

Is There a Hell?

The Rev. Thos. F. Opie, D. D.

Luther Burbank is quoted as saying, "The idea that a good God would send people to a burning hell is utterly damnable to me. I don't want to have anything to do with such a God". He is also quoted as saying that all religions are doomed, etc.

Others, to be sure, have said much the same thing about hell—but if the conviction that there is no hell hereafter was all that kept Mr. Burbank away from Christianity—he was hardly justified in declaring against God and all religions. Many Christians have abandoned the old idea of a physical hell.

I do not "know" there is a hell in the other world, but I do know there is hell in this world! There is the hell of conscience; the hell of broken bodies and broken minds and seared souls. There is the hell of oppression and of injustice and of vice. There is the hell of cancer and gnawing disease and the hell of hunger and of desertion and of neglect. People who pass through these things do not fear a hell of fire hereafter—they know what real hell is!

Now, if the Church should stop theorizing about a hell hereafter and do something to banish the "hells" of this present, it would challenge rather than repel such men as Luther Burbank, Rupert Hughes and thousands of others who have become disgusted with theology and with primitive theory and anachronistic traditions—and have been literally driven out of the Church by over-much zeal for doctrine and under-much zeal for humanity.

The social side of the Gospel calls for action in behalf of the feeble-minded, the wayward, the poverty-stricken, the disease-ladened, the soul-crushed. Christ's program called little for elocution and pedagogy and pulpit oratory and doctrinal theorizing and much for compassion for the hungry and the naked and the broken and the ruined.

Nearly every jail and prison in the land encompasses a hell. Not only should Christians do something to take the hell out of our prisons, but they should do something to keep hell out of potential criminals. They should not only be Good Samaritans to the broken flotsam and jetsam of life, but they should clear the highway of life of those things that ensnare men and that rob them of character and of manhood. They should fortify the coming generation against filth and poverty and need and squalor and should encourage sanitation and education and every good work.

Religion is undoubtedly doomed if it continue in the clouds and if its chief concern is other-worldly—if it deal in superstition and ignorance and exploded theory—and if it remain blinded by the fires of a "hell-to-be" to the hell that is.

Anniversary.

M. G. B.

I would not think of death today,
Of clouded sight and failing breath,
Nor of a quiet form that lay
Too deeply sleeping.
I would not live in memory again
The deadening grief, the unimagined pain
The lonely weeping.

Oh, not of death—but I would dare
To follow thee into the dawn
That broke upon thy soul, to share
The blest awakening,
When, in the clearer air beyond earth's night
Thine eyes, with glad amaze beheld the light
Around thee breaking.

Klamath River Indians and the Church.

In the Canyon of the Klamath River, in Northern California, live the Klamath Indians, a race distinguished by their superior stature and intelligence, and possessing their own distinctive religion, customs and traditions. For these people the Church maintains a Mission at Orleans, the Church of the Holy Spirit.

In this "parish", extending roughly fifty miles up the river and fifty miles down, live over 1,000 Indians and castes, with here and there a white family to lend lonely variety. The Church is the only religious organization at work among them, as there is neither doctor nor lawyer, the Mission staff must serve not only as religious teachers, but also as doctors and nurses, dispensing medicines to the sick, and first aid, often the only aid, in accidents and surgical cases, and must act also as legal advisers and scribes. For fifteen years this work has been carried on; our people look to us increasingly, and the Mission has come to mean for them a veritable network of religious and social services.

The Klamath Indians never had a chief like the other large tribes, but were ruled by the Talth or priestly class. They are a simple, trustful people, loving home and family with an unselfish devotion. Their folk-lore and traditional religion abound with simple truths and a surprising degree of moral and spiritual insight.

The cordiality and love with which they have received the present white race, they claim to have been instilled in them by their cherished remembrance of the Wa-gas, a white people of their tradition possessing high qualities of character. The Ken-ne-ah (the present whites) have fallen far below this standard. The Talth have prophesied that ere long God will send a great conflagration to consume the world; that over the ashes of the obliterated past will prosper a new people with new governments, and new laws; the age of peace and happiness will dawn again, shedding a radiance of glory over the whole world.

The children are being gathered into the public schools, and show a mentality far above most races left so long without education. They are a patriotic people. In the little church at Orleans hangs a service flag with twenty-three stars, one of gold.

While the older Indians are slow to yield their loyalty to their early religious training, it is most significant that they attend the services, and seek the Church's offices for their children, associationg our faith with the highest they know. The percentage of baptisms in that part of the "parish" where the Church has worked longest is more than encouraging, and gradually as the young people reach confirmation age they are being gathered into full membership with the Church.

Services are held regularly in the little "parcel post" church (so-called because all material for the building was sent in by parcel post) at Orleans, with occasional services by arrangement at points up and down the river. A Church School is maintained at Orleans, which is now bearing fruit in those who are offering themselves for confirmation.

In the fall of 1920 there was only the church, a consecrated building, where other work could not be done. At that time, thanks to the Indian Hope Association, of Philadelphia, a comfortable rectory was provided. In the rectory we have a supply room, provided by the women of the church, from which articles of clothing are issued to the needy, and a dispensary, the medicines for which are provided by the federal government. Social gatherings are held, and no opportunity is lost to convey lessons in home-making and care. To assist us in training our people to better living and higher ideals, we need a community hall as a center for social, intellectual, public and other activities, and as a place for wholesome amusements. It is a great encouragement to know that the first thousand dollars has been guaranteed and almost raised by women of the Church in the East.

In the fall of 1924, as a United Thank Offering Worker, Deaconess Todd, a graduate of the Berkeley Training School, was added to the mission staff, and rapidly found her way to the hearts of the people. Her ability to act in the capacity of nurse has taken her into homes in every part of the mission. There is the greatest need for a public health nurse to be stationed at Orleans, but until such an appointment is made the work of the deaconess must lie largely in this direction. How often, and under what pathetic circumstances, is the need for medical aid brought home to us!

One hundred miles away, over these majestic peaks, in modern America, there are doctors and nurses. We are without either. God grant that the call of these children of the mountains may be heard.—The Rev. W. C. Pearson, in Sacramento Missionary.

The Cure For Worry.

One of the greatest curses of the modern world or at any rate of the average conscientious man or woman in the world we are most familiar with, is the curse of worry. Most people carry about with them a burden of care from which they are seldom if ever entirely free—care about reputation, about one's position in life, about making ends meet, about competition, and rivalry in our secular affairs, about our relations with others at home or outside the home, about physical health or the ability to do what is expected of us in this or that particular, about knowing what line we ought to take in a specific crisis or change of circumstances, about the people one loves best and who for that very reason are able to hurt us more than others can, about the measures to be taken to save some of these, perhaps, from the consequences of their own folly and sin—from ruin and despair. These and such like are the kind of problems which confront the ordinary decent-living, upright person who bears responsibility bravely in spheres great or small today.

Is it reasonably possible to escape being anxious about them? Yes, it is, or our Lord would never have told us to banish care from our thought about life. Care is one thing, and sorrow is another; no soul goes through life without sorrow; none is ever sanctified without knowing something at first hand of the fires of affliction. But worry is a different matter; no one is ever the better for it, but the worse. It corrodes the mind, weakens character, destroys that balance of feeling and judgment which should ever distinguish the man of faith. Suffer you may, and that keenly, without feeling a grain of anxiety about the outcome; and, stranger still to him who knows not God, it is possible in the hour of sorrow to draw so sweetly near to the heart of Christ, and so enter into the fellowship of His cross, as to be kept in perfect peace. Peace can exist with pain, but never with worry, anxiety, and care.

The great secret simply is that of sharing with God habitually in meeting what has to be met and bearing what must be borne. It is not sufficient to do it now and then or wait till the time of stress arrives; we must be accustomed to dwell with God in the inner sanctuary of our being, and then nothing can take us unawares that happens on the outside of life. We are what our prayers make us—everybody is. It is not only a man here or there who takes the trouble to pray; if we do not pray to God we are praying to something else all the time; our wishes, words and actions are all prayers. There is no distinction in principle between what we ask for and what we do; for what are deeds but prayers, appeals addressed to life? And where appeal only is possible, with no corresponding power of action to support it, appeal addressed to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, it can no more fail of its due effect than God can change His nature. We are not alone in this or in anything else. The mystery of human solidarity is undeniable; not less so is our solidarity with God. To commune with God in all things, to commit our way unto Him in calm and quiet surrender to His holy will, is to partake of both His power and His —R. J. Campbell, D. D.

Help.

Some years ago in West Point there was a young cadet named Leonidas Polk. Before he was a Christian he was careless and neglected his studies. As soon as he became a Christian he began to study diligently; he could not, however, make up for the loss of months. At the annual examination he was called to the blackboard and given a problem to solve. He knew nothing about it, and was at a loss to know what to do. He thought of the disgrace of a failure to himself and to the Master whom he loved. He lifted up a prayer for help to his new-found Friend. Then he took the chalk and began to work. At first all was dark, but soon he saw a beginning, and he worked through slowly to the end. He did not know whether it was right, and after explaining the process, waited for the verdict. The professors whispered together, and one of them asked him, "Mr. Polk, where did you get that solution"? "Is it not right, sir?" "Right! It is not only right, but it is the most beautiful demonstration of that problem ever given. It is new and not to be found in any of the books."—Albert Mygate, In the Christian Intelligencer.

Reveries.

Diana M. Todd.

I wonder when my anchor lifts
And my bark puts out to sea,
I wonder if some soul will sigh
And say, yes, I miss thee.

I wonder when the wild flowers bloom,
The violets so blue,
If they'll forget my passing feet,
Or say, dear , I miss you.

I wonder if the birds I love
Will gather round my door,
Or if their joyous songs will cease,
Because I'm there no more.

I wonder when the stars shine bright,
If one will brighter be!
I'd love to think that tiny spark
Would beckon you to me.

The stars, the flowers, the birds may keep
Their trysting time with me;
What matter when my bark sets sail,
So I my Pilot see?

Sacramental Money.

What the vision of the Kingdom does for us is to give us revaluation of the world. A coin is so much minted life, a holy thing, not to be handled lightly or irreverently. It is a sacramental thing, similar to the bread and wine of the communion, which are the outward and visible sign of life fruitfully expended. That is why a bank should be as a temple and the banker a priest, a man who handles holy things. The storekeeper's merchandise is sacramental stuff, congealed life. His store should be a temple, and the man who sells shoddy goods defiles the temple as much as did the hucksters and moneychangers in the Temple in Jerusalem long ago. To the man in whom the Kingdom has come, the world and all that is in it are sacramental.—Richard Roberts.

Alone With God.

Martha Shepherd Lippincott.

Alone with God in silent prayer,
My heart will find content
While, through the power of His love,
Rich blessings will be sent.
My soul will, resignation, learn
To do what is His will;
He all my loving, trusting heart,
With faith and trust, will fill.

Then, when the trials of life will come,
Dear Lord, alone with Thee,
Let me commune in silent prayer
And Thy blest wisdom, see;
For Thou wilt guide me through each night,
When dark may seem the way;
And when I'm guided by Thy light
The night will turn to day.

One cold Sunday morning fifteen people came to service in a certain church. During the service the church caught fire. The news spread that the church was burning. Scores of people who had remained at home heard the news, rushed to the scene, and stood up for two hours in snow a foot deep, in zero weather, to watch the church burn.

For the Young Folks

"I Think He Was a Blithesome Boy."

I think He was a blithesome boy,
I think His words were clear and free.
I think He was as straight and brown
As some young tree.

I think His laugh rang down the wind,
I think He tossed His tumbled hair
And flung a snatch of simple song
Upon the air.

I think He lingered on the hills
And learned the magic of the grass;
And knew the heart of every tree
That saw Him pass.

And heard upon the mountain top
The distant singing in the sun
From cedar branches blowing green
On Lebanon.

I think He came to Mary's door
With eager homeward-running feet,
And to His hungry human mouth
Her bread was sweet.

Yet He Himself was bread, and wine,
And olive branch, and cedar tree,
And grass, and star, and shining depths
Of Galilee.

Oh, He was laughter and delight,
And He was pain, and tears, and death,
And every suffering and joy
Of Nazareth.

He was all silence, and all song;
He was a cross; a diadem;
The Man of Sorrows; and the lovely Babe
Of Bethlehem.

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

The Things That Gave Jesus Joy.

M. L. G.

"Consider the lilies," Jesus said; but first, we may be sure, He had Himself considered them. He had marked the glow of their more than royal robes, the fragrance they gave to every passer-by, their unconscious, but real, dependence on the care of God. They gave Him joy, such as only the pure in heart can know, the joy of seeing God in every bit of beauty that brightens our earth.

The sight of children was a far greater joy to Jesus. Children did not tire Him as the disciples thought. No, it rested Him to turn from sneering Pharisees and half-hearted followers to these little ones, fresh as flowers, and ready to come to Him, that He might bless them. Somehow, He told those worldly-wise elders they must grow young again, to take their Father's gift with a child's unquestioning trust.

And that brings us to another of Jesus' joys—the joy He felt whenever He found faith. Just to take what He would give, as the centurion did whose servant was sick, as the blind man did on the Jericho road, and the woman on the way to Jairus' house—this could give Him a heavenly joy, like the joy of the shepherd who found his sheep, or father whose son has come home.

Prayer was another joy to Jesus—such prayer as sustained Him through weariness and pain, and opened the door of Heaven so that on the Mount He was one bathed in its glory. How poor our little prayers seem in comparison to His! Yet, He gave us a prayer that can never come amiss.

It was through prayer that Jesus gained the greatest joy of all, the joy of living in the Father—abiding in His love. Yet, even this highest of joys He wanted, and does want, to share with His friends. "If ye keep my Commandments," He told the little company gathered in the Upper Room that last night, "ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's Commandments and abide in His love."

And, then looking upon these sorrowful and bewildered disciples whom He must leave so soon, He said:

"These things have I spoken unto you that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full."

A Cracked New Year Resolution.

"Make me one, too, Will." Ned watched his brother while he lettered a large card with New Year resolutions. They were written in gold, with a great many ornamental flourishes.

Will held it up admiringly.

"Make me one, please," Ned repeated.

"You don't need any. You don't have to get up at six o'clock every morning and study an hour before breakfast; you can cuddle down and snooze till mother calls you. Besides, you'd break them all to smash before night," he added.

"No, I wouldn't. You try me, and see if I do," Ned said. He brought a card and gave it to his brother.

"What shall I put on it?" asked Will.

"Oh, something about remembering. I want to remember that I promised to shovel off Aunt Tyson's porch and make her path to the gate every time it snows this winter. I wish it would hurry up and snow again, for she gives me ten cents every time. I've got thirty already."

"That's a lot. What are you going to do with it—buy an automobile?" Will asked, teasingly.

"I'm going to buy Tommy Dixon a sled, so he and his sister can coast."

"There! How does that suit you?" Will asked, holding up the card on which was printed in large golden letters with an elaborate border of holly leaves and berries: "Resolved, That I will not forget to shovel off Aunt Tyson's porch and make her a nice path to the gate every time it snows this winter, because she is too old to do it herself, and because I promised. Ned Darding."

"Oh, that is just grand! Now there isn't any danger of my forgetting," Ned said, gleefully.

"Shan't I put on anything more—something about putting your sled away nights and hanging up your cap, for instance?"

But Ned shook his head.

"I'd better not try to remember too much at once," he said.

It snowed again Friday night and next morning the snow lay in great heaps and drifts. Ned ran for the snow-shovel, but Will was already using it to make paths about the house. While he was waiting Charlie came along with his new sled.

"Get your sled and come on down to the hill, Ned; the big boys have got it all cleared off already," he said. And Ned ran for his sled. It was fine coasting, and the sled flew down the hill like the wind. The time flew by, too, and presently a bell rang.

"Twelve o'clock!" called Charlie Logan, starting for home.

"Hello, Ned! Seems to me I heard something crack, didn't I," called a familiar voice and there stood Will. Ned looked hastily at his sled, and Will laughed. "No, it wasn't your sled. I guess Aunt Tyson must have heard it, too, because I saw her looking anxiously out the door as I came by!" he exclaimed.

"Oh!" It was all Ned said, but he took his sled and ran hastily away. He stopped at Tommy Dixon's, and Tommy came out to meet him.

"Don't you want to take my sled this afternoon? The hill is smooth as glass," he said.

"Don't you want it?" asked Tommy, eagerly, but Ned shook his head.

"Oh, thank you!" cried Tommy, delightedly.

After dinner Ned took the snowshovel and went to Aunt Tyson's.

"I thought you had forgotten me, Ned," she said.

"I did pretty near; but I'm going to make up for it," he told her.

He could hear the boys and girls over on the hill, but he kept bravely at work until the snow was cleared away and a nice, wide path made around the house.

Aunt Tyson said he had earned double wages, and gave him twenty cents.

"That resolution wasn't truly broken, Will—just cracked a little; and I've mended it 'most as good as ever. I'm going to watch it closer after this, too," he told Will that night, as he took pains to hang up the card where he would be sure to see it as soon as he woke up every morning.

Ned did not forget again, and before the new year was a month old, he had earned money enough for the new sled, which Tommy accepted joyfully.—Selected.

The Ayah and the Ayah-Ayah.

Louis Tucker.

Once upon a time at Trinidad an Ayah took her little white master to walk and he ran off into the bushes and met an ayah-ayah. The ayah-ayah was hanging upside down under the lowest branch of a rose tree—rose trees in Trinidad grow to be forty feet high—and all he would say was "Umph". So the little white master tried to throw stones at him, but couldn't because there weren't any, and his Ayah came and caught him.

Now an Ayah is a Hindu nurse who wears bangles on her ankles and on her wrists and in her nose, that go tinkle-tinkle when she walks; and her ancestors were imported to Trinidad because the natives there live on free bananas and won't work. An ayah-ayah is a two-toed sloth. They do not look in the least alike, so Charles Gostap Sin jin, Junior, who was the little white master, was troubled in his mind and asked his mother why they should have the same names only one twice as much as the other; but his mother couldn't tell why, because she was going to Government House for lunch and the carriage was waiting. So when she had gone he ran away into the bushes again to find out for himself, with the Ayah after him.

The bushes in Trinidad are not good things to run into because of the spiders and ticks and snakes and chiggers and the red ants; but the little boy did not know that, so he did not care. As for the Ayah, she cared very much, but she could not help it at all; and she got a chigger on each foot and seventeen red ants between her shoulder-blades, for she brushed through the bushes while Charles Gostap Sinjin, Junior, was so small that he could run under them.

The ayah-ayah was hanging upside down on the same branch of the same rose-tree, and all that he would say was still "Umph". The little white master hit at him with a stick, but missed him; and he had just time to throw the stick and miss him again when his Ayah caught him. The red ants between her shoulders were biting very hard and she felt very angry; so she shook him well and he set his teeth and did not cry because he knew he thoroughly deserved it.

While she was shaking him, they both saw something move in the bushes; and as they watched, it came out into the open and it was a jaguar. The little master was not particularly frightened, because the only jaguars he had ever seen were in cages and, therefore, he had never thought of jaguars as dangerous; but the Ayah was so terrified that she stopped shaking the little master and began to shake herself.

The jaguar looked them over very slowly and smiled; at least, he drew back his lips and showed his teeth, but it was not a pleasant smile. Then he looked them over very carefully again and they could see that he was deciding which one to eat. There was more of the nurse, but the little master was tenderer and for a good many minutes he could not make up his mind. They wre afraid to runaway, because, of course, he would jump on them at once if they moved. Then he began creeping slowly forward, like a cat creeping after a mouse; and the nurse began shifting herself round to get between him and the little master; and then the jaguar jumped.

Now, all this time the ayah-ayah had hung to the under side of the low rose-branch, keeping quite still, so that the jaguar had not noticed him; but when the jaguar jumped, he bumped into the ayah-ayah and they fell down together to the ground. The ayah-ayah screamed and stuck his claws into the jaguar; and the jaguar screamed with surprise and bit and clawed the ayah-ayah and killed him; and the Ayah screamed and caught up the little master and ran; and little master Charles Gostap Sinjin, Junior, screamed louder than anybody else. So when they came to the house all the servants gathered and locked the doors; and when the big master came home with his wife, he went jaguar hunting in his own garden and found the jaguar eating the last of the ayah-ayah, and the big master shot him quite dead. So the family moved into town; and when they learned how the Ayah had gotten in front of the little master, they gave the Ayah more money than she had ever had before in her life for being a good and faithful servant; so that she was able to buy a little house of her own; and she lives there still.

Sky Friends.

Gentle Breeze and Sky Blue sat on the edge of a woolly cloud waiting for Hurry Wind, wondering what tale he would bring from the earth, for he was always scurrying around finding out things he knew. Away by himself Gray Cloud was watching, too, for he and Hurry Wind were great chums, and had many a boisterous time together.

When the Sun's jolly red face appeared above the treetops, Hurry Wind piled up the tumbled cloud-blankets on the Sun's bed, then flurried over the sky ocean, and bounced the woolly cloud about as he sat down beside Gentle Breeze and Sky Blue.

"You don't look very happy this morning, Hurry Wind. What makes you sad?" questioned Sky Blue who always liked to see every one happy.

"As I swished by a house, on a hill down below, I looked in an upstairs window and saw a little boy on a bed, and he looked very sad; there were tears in his eyes, too. He said to a lady sitting beside him: "But Mummy, Danny and Jim can go out to play, and I have to lie here all day long'.

" 'Look out your window at the sky and see the clouds sailing by,' she said.

" 'But there's no fun in that, just clouds and blue; nothing ever happens in the sky,' he said."

They all sat very still, thinking about the little boy who wanted to go out to play.

Gray Cloud floated up and hung above them to see what was the matter.

"Go away," Gray Cloud, "you'll make it rain," Sky Blue called up to him. But Hurry Wind said, "Oh, don't send him away; maybe he can tell us of something to happen in the sky for the little boy."

So Hurry Wind told Gray Cloud what they were thinking about, and asked him if he knew anything to do, and Gentle Breeze said, "Do you know what fun is?"

"Yes, I know what fun is; it is doing things. I often have fun doing stunts," said Gray Cloud.

"I'll do one now and show you."

He tumbled about, making himself like an elephant, then turned a somersault, coming down almost on top of the woolly white cloud. Hurry Wind rushed up and blew him off. He looked so funny they all wanted to know right away what they could do.

"Only clouds can make themselves into things," he said; "but winds and breezes can help."

"Can I do something?" Blue Sky asked. "I want to help make the little boy happy, too."

"Oh, you can be the ocean for cloud-ships to sail on."

"Oh, I will like that. Make a ship first then."

"All right, Sky Blue; where do you want your ship to go?" said Gray Cloud.

"Away to the end of the rainbow to bring me gold and colored silks like the ones the rainbow is made of."

"It won't get back till sunset then. Bring up the white clouds, Hurry Wind, and we'll get the ship away."

Gray Cloud was indeed pleased to be allowed to join these Sky Pals, for usually he had to stay pretty much by himself, except when he and Hurry Wind made wind storms and the rains. They were always sending him off, for fear he would bring rain and spoil their sunny days.

The White Clouds came piling up the sky before Hurry Wind, bumping together, twisting and turning into all kinds of shapes. Then Gentle Breeze chased a big one round and blew it into a ship with sails; then he sent it sailing away.

"Look, Sky Blue," he called, "there's your ship. Isn't it a beauty! It's a treasure ship, and I'd like to sail with it."

"Do," said Sky Blue, "and bring it back at sunset."

So it sailed away with Gentle Breeze puffing out the sails.

As Hurry Wind chased the clouds around a great shaggy cloud lion reared up ready to eat some one.

"Now I'll be a tiger," said Gray Cloud, "and fight him."

So he went quickly toward the great towering lion, and while Hurry Wind blew around them, they rolled over and tumbled this way and that way.

"Now let's have a race," said Hurry Wind. "I'll drive a team of white horses and you drive a pair of grays."

"That's a go."

There was nothing Gray Cloud loved more than a race.

After it was over Gray Cloud said, "This is more fun than I have had for a long time. I wonder where Gentle Breeze and Sky Blue's treasure-ship is?"

"Look over in the West; that's it."

"I'm going now to peek in the window again," said Hurry Wind, and he rushed away to the house on the hill, to see if the little boy had seen their play. He heard him say, "Mummy, things did happen in the sky today. I saw an elephant, a lion, and a tiger fighting, and horses racing. And, Mummy, I saw a ship go sailing away. And now it's come back and has unloaded the treasure. Over there in the West I see a bed of gold, and the Sun's going to bed in it, and there are lovely silks of many colors to spread over him. Some one was laughing outside the window Mummy."

"It was the Wind you heard," she said.—By Margaret Howard in Our Little Ones.

Glad.

Glad that I live am I;
That the sky is blue
Glad for the country lanes,
And the fall of dew.

After the sun the rain,
After the rain the sun;
This is the way of life
Till the work is done.

All that we need to do,
Be we low or high,
Is to see that we grow
Nearer the sky.

Resisting Temptation.

"Grandma, what is resisting temptation?" asked five-year-old Maude.

"Why do you ask, dear?" said grandma.

"Our teacher wants us to tell her next Sunday."

"Your teacher reminds me of something I heard when I was a little girl like you," answered grandma.

"Please tell me," pleaded Maude.

"It is a temptation which came to a little girl, and to which she almost yielded. Her papa gave her a big, round silver dollar, saying, 'Nellie, take this to Bennett's bakery and get it changed into pennies'. Nellie took the dollar to the bakery, and when the man gave her a big roll in change, she opened wide her eyes. In those days the cents were much larger than they are now, and a great many of them were in constant use. This little girl was very fond of candy called 'juba paste', made in the candy shops in that beautiful old city which was her home. She thought: 'I could take just one cent, and papa would never miss it out of all these.' She knew she could get a nice large piece for one cent, enough for any child. You see, my dear, there was temptation to take what was not hers, to do wrong," said grandma.

"Oh, did she take it?" exclaimed Maude, with wondering eyes.

"I will tell you. She sat down on the white curb of the pavement and slyly slipped a penny out of the roll. She looked at the shining thing, then slipped it into her pocket—all little girls at that time had pockets in their dresses. She pushed her handkerchief over and and stood up saying to herself, 'Nobody will ever know'. She could go no further, for suddenly the words of her Sunday-school teacher came to her, saying, 'God sees and knows everything'. She felt ashamed that God knew, and then the thought came that perhaps the dear mother who had died and left her, knew also that her dear daughter had come so near to sin. At once the little hand went into the pocket, the coin was withdrawn and placed with the others, and Nellie went home, glad that she had resisted temptation which had almost overcome her. Do you understand now, Maude?"

"Yes, grandma, I'm so glad she resisted."

"Well, you see, there is always a thought sent us showing the right way to resist temptation which comes to all of us," replied grandma.—Child's Gem.

A Certain Boy.

He doesn't like to go to bed,
And getting up is worse;
To washing, too, I've heard it said,
He's just as much averse.

And as for school and studying
When he would rather roam,
He hates it more than anything
But doing jobs at home.

I must admit that it is true,
Though 'tis a sorry boast,
Whatever he is told to do
Is what he hates the most.

I do suppose that if he chose
What he should do all day,
He'd play and eat a while, and then
He'd eat a while and play.

Two Sparrows.

By Florence Isaacson.

Two little sparrows sat in a treetop. The heaviest snow of winter had come.

"My, I'm hungry," said the first little sparrow. "I have flown all about out among those beautiful houses and I have not found a crumb."

"That is too bad," said the second little sparrow. "I flew down to those small places where there were so many children looking out of the windows and I have had a good breakfast."

"Why those people are poor and they have so many to feed. Surely they cannot afford to scatter crumbs to sparrows."

"But," said the second little sparrow, "it is just those little children who think the most about us sparrows. They are always looking out of the windows and they see us and love to share their crumbs. You come with me and I will see that you get a good breakfast."

So they flew away to a window where two little girls were looking out and fluttered against the pane.

"Oh, Mother!" cried one of the little girls, "here are two more little sparrows. May we have some more crumbs?"

"You see," said the second little sparrow, as they flew away with their crops full of crumbs, "it depends upon the hearts and not the wealth of people whether or not they feed the sparrows."—Cradle Roll Home.

Church Training Schools, Soochow.

Mrs. A. R. Standring, of the Church Training School for Women and the Primary School for Women, Soochow, in the District of Shanghai, writes on her return to China after furlough, "It was good to get back to my own work and my own home". She says the schools had been pretty much disrupted by "our several civil wars", and when they opened at the beginning of the second term there were five students in the Primary Department and eleven in the Training School.

Many pages of statistics as to the value of these schools would be less convincing, however, than some of the character sketches, which Mrs. Standring always includes in her report, illustrating what this training does for older and uneducated women. For example:

One student when she first came was a timid country girl who had never seen a foreigner. "She was afraid of me and very much out of place in her new surroundings. But as soon as she became accustomed to the school routine, we found she was very bright and industrious. She did three years' work in two. She had regular religious instruction, of course, and wanted to prepare for baptism. As she was betrothed to a non-Christian she could not be baptized, but she went on with her preparation. Her father died, and her brother became the head of the family. He didn't approve of wasting money educating a mere girl, so he took her out of school.

"Two weeks after my return she came and begged me to find some way of paying her expenses so that she could come back to school. She was determined to break her betrothal, be baptized, and after the proper preparation, enter the Training School and learn how to be a help to her own people. I saw little hope of her being able to break her betrothal, but she seemed so much in earnest I took her back on faith. Faith resulted in a gift from the Woman's Auxiliary of Northern Indiana, so her tuition has been paid for a year. Wonderful to relate, she did break her betrothal by borrowing the money and paying her fiance's family $112. She came back after the Easter vacation with all the necessary papers and evidence, and on the Eve of Ascension Day she was baptized. She does excellent work, and her hope is to be confirmed next spring and enter the Training School in the fall."

Another: "I gave one student ninety-eight in her examination in my class on the Prophets, the highest mark I have ever given. She was a woman who five years ago, was taken to St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Shanghai, presumably to die. She was in the Hospital for two years, and Dr. Fullerton considers her recovery a miracle. She first heard about Christianity in the Hospital, was baptized and confirmed there. Now her one ambition is to be appointed Bible woman in the Hospital.

Both the schools are doing an important work, for the women and for the spiritual life of the Diocese, but the question of support is becoming an important one. The women in the Training School pay tuition for the first half-year while they are on probation, and after that they are paid two dollars a month. Although prices go higher every year, the Training School has always been able to add to its appropriation and meet all extra expenses with money earned in the embroidery department. This department, as may be imagined, has had a hard struggle the last two years. During the wars the women who came in by the day to work could not come, as they were afraid to be on the streets. The school has just managed to keep its head above water, and pay a doctor's bill for one student who was ill for six weeks and had to have expensive injections. Mrs. Standring hopes for better times.

"One great joy and comfort," she adds, "has been the artesian well (given as part of its 1924 Easter Offering by Trinity Cathedral, Cleveland, Ohio). In the history of the Province there has never been such a scarcity of water; wells are dry and canals lower than they have ever been, but we have an inexhaustible supply of good water. It's a comfortable feeling and we have grateful hearts. So have all our neighbors!

"I am writing to the strains of 'Jesus, Tender Shepherd, House Me', played very well and too soothingly on the organ. Five students have been taking organ lessons and will be able to play for the services in the smaller parishes when they go out to be regular workers.

"They are wonderful, earnest, patient, industrious. The educated Christian women of China are going to be a power in the life of the nation, and these schools are helping them to become so."

My Desire.

Mrs. Thomas W. Cooke.

How I long that life should be Spent in service, Lord, for Thee.
How I hope for Thee to work,
Nothing large or small to shirk.

How I wish to learn Thy way,
Work for Thee each tiresome day.
How I long to know Thy word,
As those of old with wonder heard.

How I hope some heart to find
Hurt and torn, that I may bind.
How I'd like some word to say
To help a child of Thine today.

How I'd love to teach Thy word
To weary ones who've never heard—
Take me, Lord, and make of me
A worker anywhere for Thee!

Deaths

Ruffin Died, on November 3, 1926, at his home, "Evelynton", Charles City County, Virginia, JOHN A. RUFFIN, for many years a vestryman and faithful treasurer of Westover Church.

Claiborne WILLIAM F. CLAIBORNE, candidate for Holy Orders in the Diocese of Colorado, died January 15, 1927, in a hospital in Baltimore, Maryland, after an operation. May his soul rest in peace and light perpetual shine upon him.

MRS. BEVERLEY D. TUCKER.

MRS. ANNA MARIA WASHINGTON TUCKER, wife of the Right Reverend Beverley D. Tucker, Bishop of the Diocese of Southern Virginia, passed from this life January 7, 1927, in her home on Stockley Gardens, Norfolk, Virginia. Of her thirteen children, ten were at her bedside as she passed over and another son arrived from Pittsburgh the following morning. Two sons only, Dr. Augustine Tucker, of St. Luke's Hospital, Shanghai, and Prof. Ellis Tucker, of St. John's College, Shanghai, were absent.

Mrs. Tucker was born at Mount Vernon, November 17, 1851, and was the daughter of John Augustine Washington, the last of the Washington family to own the historic residence. The two most distinguished families of Virginia, the Washingtons and the Less were among her closest kndred. No American could point to more distinguished ancestry and yet her personal greatness was more than equal to her inheritance.

Mrs. Tucker had been in failing health for two years, but the final illness was brief. The loss to her family, her friends, the community in which she lived, and that vast public who knew her, either by contact or tradition, is inestimable, but the change from this life to the next must have been very slight to her, for the Kingdom of Heaven within her had been visible to all who saw her for many years. She attained here in this life absolute sincerity, simplicity and humilty. If she thought of herself at all, she must have had only the command, "Be ye therefore perfect" in mind, or she could not have reached the utter humility of character which marked her and set her apart from others. She was a living example of a perfect wife and perfect mother, nor is the word perfect used carelessly here. She never failed in understanding or tenderness. Her wide interests included all her children's interests and all their friends.

She had a naturally sunny and cheerful disposition and none who heard it will ever forget the sound of her wholesome laughter dispelling all idle gloom and fantastic depression.

She was no respecter of persons and external, transitory distinctions meant nothing to her. Endowed by nature with transparent purity of soul, her life of unfaltering faith and deep devotion strengthened her vision and perfected her judgment so that she acquired that clear sense of proportionate values which is the direct outcome of holiness.

To many she was a touchstone whereby they tried the truth and worth of their thoughts, to even more she was a compelling influence in daily life. To all who knew her at all, she was the final proof that the greatest gift of any mortal to this world is a completely-fashioned and noble character.

Though she is no longer present to our earthly sight, her memory and her influence are as compelling today and will be for generations to come as if she were still among us.

She exemplified the truth that holiness is the one great gift of God to men, that being once seen embodied, cannot be forgotten.

LOUISE C. WILLCOX.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

and complete assignment of his remaining authority, rights and powers of jurisdiction in the administration of the Diocese, and devoted the balance of his address to a consideration of the future policy of the Diocese with respect to its Cathedral.

In the course of his address the Bishop Coadjutor, the Rt. Rev. Theodore Irving Reese, called the attention of the convention to the apparent failure of the Diocese to register any considerable growth during the past ten years, and suggested that the emphasis of the Bishops' Crusade came jsut at the right time to be brought to bear on this problem.

Bishop Vincent's transfer of complete authority and jurisdiction forecasted the removal of the administrative offices of the Diocese from Columbus to Cincinnati. Since his consecration in 1913, Bishop Reese has resided in Columbus and the administrative offices which have arisen in connection with expansion of field work since the inception of the Nation-Wide Campaign have naturally developed around the Bishop Coadjutor's office.

The removal of the Diocesan offices will involve a change of residence for the Bishop Coadjutor, the Rev. B. H. Reinheimer, Archdeacon and Executive Secretary, and the Rev. Maurice Clarke, Executive Secretary for Religious Education. Under plans considered at the convention, the Diocesan House next door to St. Paul's Cathedral in Cincinnati will be renovated and utilized.

The outstanding event in the sphere of legislation was the adoption by a very large majority of the amendment to the constitution of the diocese changing the word "Laymen" to "Laymember" and thereby admitting women communicants to suffrage in the Diocese. Subsequent to the adoption of the constitutional amendment, the canons of the Diocese were amended to make suffrage effective.

Under the terms of the amended canons, the parishes are entitled hereafter to elect four delegates to the Diocesan Convention, "two of whom may be women"; and in the case of the missions two delegates are to be elected, "one of whom may be a woman".

In the case of the vestries, the canons were amended to make it possible for women to be elected as members of the vestries, but not to the office of Junior and Senior Warden.

The canon on the Bishop and Cathedral Chapter remains unchanged; under its provisions women are not admitted to the chapter, but are eligible to membership in all the departments. As a matter of fact, they have been represented on all of the departments for the past six years, and there is no doubt but what the valuable contributions that they have made to the work of the Diocese as members of the departments, constituted a strong argument for the change in the constitution and canons admitting them to fuller suffrage.

The canons adopted eight years ago creating the House of Church Women of the Diocese were repealed and at the same time the convention adopted resolutions expressing its appreciation of the real contribution which the House had made to the advancement of the work of the Diocese during its existence.

The members of the two conventions were thrilled with the announcement that the Diocese had paid its quota of the National Church Budget for the first time in the year 1926, and with the vote to notify the National Council that it would pay its quota for 1927 in full by dividing the program receipts on the basis of 50-50, even though the assured income at the moment appears to be about $12,000 of the total of the Diocesan Budget and the National Church Quota.

The second day of the convention was devoted largely to a consideration of the Bishops' Crusade. The representatives of the National Crusading force were the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, Bishop of East Carolina, and the Rev. John S. Bunting, rector of the Church of the Ascension, St. Louis. Both speakers stirred the delegates and gave great impulse to the Diocesan plans for carrying the Crusade to every parish and mission in the Diocese. Bishop Reese announced that he had arranged to meet all the vestrymen of the Diocese in ten district dinners and conferences and that the clergy would also be assembled in three groups for a day of devotion and preparation for the Crusade, which is to go forward in the parishes during Lent.

The following elections took place:

The Standing Committee: the Rev. Messrs. Frank H. Nelson, S. E. Sweet, and E. F. Chauncey; and Messrs. Mortimer Matthews, W. O. Frohock and Morrison R. Waite.

Deputies to Synod: Clerical, Charles G. Reade, Maurice Clarke, B. H. Reinheimer and Gilbert Symons; Lay, W. S. Keller, Wm. T. Magruder, W. O. Frohock and Mortimer Matthews.

Alternate Deputies to Synod: Clerical, A. N. Slayton, Geo. H. Hills, J. D. Herron, and Geo. T. Lawton; Lay, A. W. Shell, John M. Richardson, John R. Schindle and Otis H. Fisk.

Better Publicity For Churches and Charities.

There has been formed in New York a small Publicity Engineers Club, and it is preparing to enlarge its membership and its scope. Its leaders are men on great daily newspapers who report and edit Church news, and who solicit and often write advertisements of Churches in the daily papers. Their aim is to assist Churches and charities to gain better publicity, and have reports in more accurate form. Invitations have gone to men and women in churches, who handle news and advertising of their churches, not only to join the club, but also to cooperate in efforts to improve the work. An effort is to be made to have a trained news source expert in every church, charity, mission board and society. The churches and charities of New York and its environs spend in advertising in daily newspapers more than $250,000 a year. Within the past five years very much larger space to Church news is given by the great dailies of both New York City and the country, and the news is being edited in better form.

Memorial Windows For St. James' Church.

Sunday morning, January 30, four windows in the south clerestory of the chancel of St. James' Church, the Rev. Dr. F. W. Crowder, rector, were dedicated in memory of Richard March Hoe.

A group of three windows on the north side of the church, next to the chapel, is being made by Henry Wynd Young, Inc., of New York, and another group of three adjoining these, by the D'Ascenzo Studios of Philadelphia. The progress on these windows is rapid and all of them are promised before Lent.

The four windows in the north clerestory of the chancel have been given by Mrs. Richard M. Hoe, in memoriam. These, when installed, will complete the windows in the chancel.

Through the generosity of a member of the vestry an order has been given for the replacing of the wooden frames and tracery of the clerestory windows in the nave with stone. This opens the way for the filling of these windows with stained glass and several parishioners are contemplating memorial gifts of these windows.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Charles S. Armstrong has resigned from St. Matthew's Church, Jersey City, N. J., to become rector of the new parish of Et. Elizabeth's, at Upper Ridgewood.

The Rev. Joseph Manuel, rector of St. Barnabas' Church, West Philadelphia, has been appointed chaplain of the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia. He succeeds the Rev. Thomas C. Johnson, who has accepted a call to St. Elizabeth's Church, Long Island. Mr. Manuel will take up his new work February 28.

The Rev. Carroll Lund Bates, rector of St. Luke's Church, Live Oak, Florida, sailed on January 29, with Clark's Mediterranean Cruise for a visit to the Holy Land and Egypt. He will return to his parish for Easter Sunday. A locum tenens will be in residence in his absence.

The Rev. Frederick H. Steenstra, rector of St. Mark's Church, Warren, R. I., has accepted a call to St. Mark's Church, Mauch Chunk, Pa., effective March 1.

The Rev. J. J. D. Hall left Philadelphia January 20 and sailed from New York the next day for a trip to the Holy Land. He expects to be away between three and four months.

The Rev. Joseph Burton, formerly in charge of the Church of The Holy Communion, Allendale, S. C., and of the Heavenly Rest, Bluffton, S. C., has accepted the appointment to be Archdeacon, with headquarters at Allendale, S. C.

The Rev. Richard E. Page, formerly rector of Trinity Church, Canton, Miss., has taken charge as rector of St. Paul's, Meggetts, of Christ Church, Adams River, and of Trinity, Edisto, S. C. His new address is Meggetts, S. C.

The Rev. John S. Gillespie, formerly rector of St. Clement's Church, Greenville, Pa., took charge as rector of St. Mary's Church, Cleveland, Ohio, on February 1.

The Rev. Roger E. Bunn, formerly rector of St. Cyprian's Church, Georgetown, S. C., has entered upon his new work as rector of St. Mary the Virgin, Chattanooga, Tenn.

The Shepherds heard and the Wise Men saw. Man has yet a long way to go to improve on what arrested the ears of the former and caught the eyes of the latter.—Rev. William Porkess.

ORDINATIONS.

On Sunday, January 2, Robert A. Russell was ordained to the diaconate in St. Mark's Church, Denver, by the Rt. Rev. Fred Ingley, S. T. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Colorado. Mr. Russell has been for some time lay reader in charge of the missions at Idaho Springs, Georgetown, and Breckenridge. Under his leadership a beautiful new church was recently built in Idaho Springs, to take the place of the pioneer frame building destroyed by fire.

In St. Luke's Church, Evanston, Ill., the Rev. Herald G. Gardner, junior curate of St. Luke's Church, Evanston, was advanced to the priesthood by the Bishop of Chicago on Sunday morning, January 2. The rector, the Rev. Dr. G. C. Stewart, was the preacher; the senior assistant, Mr. Nitchie, was master of ceremonies; the Rev. Frederick Jewell and the Rev. Edwin Todd were chaplains to the Bishop.

On Tuesday morning, January 25, 1927, in Emmanuel Church, Covington, Virginia, Dr. Edward Reinhold Rogers was ordained to the diaconate by the Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D.

The Rev. George Floyd Rogers, of Asheville, N. C., brother of Dr. Rogers, preached the sermon and presented the candidate.

The Rev. John J. Gravatt, Jr., rector of Trinity Church, Staunton, said the Litany.

The Rev. Charles F. Magee, of St. Andrew's Church, Clifton Forge, read the Epistle and the newly ordained deacon read the Gospel.

Holy Communion was celebrated by Bishop Jett.

Following the service a luncheon was served in the parish house by the ladies of the congregation.

Dr. Rogers, a graduate of the University of Virginia with the degree of Ph. D., is a teacher of long experience and for a time conducted a school for boys at Charlottesville, Va. Since 1918 he has served as Superintendent of Boys' Home at Covington, Va.

During the present vacancy in the rectorship of Emmanuel Church, Covington, Dr. Rogers has been conducting the services there and he will probably continue to do so until a rector takes charge. Also, for the present at least, he will continue his work as Superintendent of the Boys' Home.

DEATHS.

The Rev. John James McCook, D. D., LL. D., beloved of generations of Trinity College men, died at his home in Hartford, Conn., January 9, in his eighty-third year. For forty years, until his retirement a few years ago, he had been professor of Modern Languages at Trinity College, of which he also served as trustee. Since 1866, except for one year, he had been rector of St. John's Church, East Hartford.

On the day of the funeral all classes at Trinity College were suspended, and a memorial service held, at which tributes were paid by former colleagues and others. The funeral was from St. John's Church, East Hartford, conducted by the Rt. Rev. Chauncey B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop of Connecticut; President Ogilby, of Trinity College, and the Rev. James W. Lord, curate of the church. Interment was in Cedar Hill Cemetery, Hartford.

But When Ye Pray.

But when ye pray, say our—not mine
or thine;
Our debts our debtors, and our daily bread!
Before the thronged cathedral's gracious shrine,
Or in thy closet's solitude instead,
Whoe'er thou art, where'er thou liftest
prayer,
However humble or how great thou
be,
Say our, thy brother man including
there,
And more and more it may be thou shalt see
Upon life's loom how thread to thread is bound;
None for himself, but man and fellow-man,
Or near or far, meet on one common ground,
Sons of one Father since the world began.
So shall God's Kingdom come in might and power
When all can pray, not mine, or thine, but our.

I Offer You $15 a Day

Make $15 a day selling this wonderful new household article that has taken the country by storm. It is CED-O-BAG a moth-proof, damp-proof, dust-proof, germ-proof storage bag for clothes, blankets and furs. It is the greatest, fastest selling household article that has come on the market for years. Every housewife wants one, buys on sight. CED-O-BAGS are made from rubberized fabric which has been chemically treated. They are patented. Nothing else like them. Instead of a small easily torn paper bag or a clumsy, expensive cedar chest, a CED-O-BAG provides adequate space for two to four garments. And yet, with all of these distinctive advantages CED-O-BAGS are priced for quick sale.

Ced-O-Bags Offer Big Profits

There is a chance for you to clean up a lot of money in your town at once just by taking orders for CED-O-BAGS. L. H. Green went out and made a clear profit of $12 in one afternoon. J. V. Davis took five orders in one evening and was $5 richer. Edith Phillips made $53 in one week's spare time (evenings.) You can do as well, or better.

No Experience Needed

You don't need experience or training. Every home in your town is a live prospect. All you have to do is show the housewife a CED-O-BAG and take her order. We deliver and collect. You get your profits at once, and move on to the next house and take another order. Everyone buys. Geo. Jones took 22 orders in two days spare time and had a clear profit of $22. 21 agents report an average profit of $3 an hour.

How Much Money Do You Want?

Would you like to make an extra $100 or $200 a month, in your spare time? Would you like to gather a lump sum of $500 or $600 in a couple of months? If you would, here is your chance. Mail me the coupon and I will tell you all about this money-making proposition. I will show you how you can make $15 a day or more in this easy, pleasant, engaging work. I will show you the way to quick profits—big profits. Mail the coupon now.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Jesus had the strength to wait.—F. W. Robertson.

"Don't break the back of today with the burdens of tomorrow."

Each time one gets angry, he has given the habit of bad temper a firmer hold upon his soul.

"Humility is not crouching in servility or cowardice, but being men after the pattern of our Master."

The sun meets not the spring bud that stretches toward him with half that certainty, as God, the source of all good, communicates Himself to the soul that longs to partake of Him.—William Law.

"I heard him call
'Come, follow', that was all.
My gold grew dim,
My soul went after Him.
I rose and followed, that was all,
Who would not follow if he heard His call."

Men can no more leap into sudden heroism than into sudden scholarship; heroism is the scholarship of the soul; only mastered by a thousand difficult lessons.—Dr. J. W. Dawson.

Dost thou intend a kindness to thy beloved one? Do it straightway, while the fateful Future is not yet here. Has thy heart's friend carelessly or cruelly stabbed into thy heart. Oh, forgive him! Think how when thou art dead, he will punish himself. True precepts—clear dictates of prudence both, yet how often neglected!

If we dare not proclaim Christ as the Deliverer of the spirit of man from its bondage, if we dare not say that He has come actually to reveal God's righteousness to men, we had better cease to speak of Him at all. For it is such a one that men want; it is for such a one that in their inmost hearts, even when their language against the Son of Man is loudest, they are crying.—T. D. Maurice.

AT HOME AND ABROAD

DRYNESS HAS RUINED MANY A SERMON, restricted the influence and circulation of Church papers and put people to sleep in church for, lo, these many years. Encouraged, perhaps, by these successes it has now attacked a cathedral. News comes from abroad that the dangers besetting St. Paul's Cathedral, which is undergoing extensive repairs, are caused by the drying up of the clay in which its foundations are laid. According to the London correspondent of The Chronicle, "London clay has many good points and when moist is a first-rate foundation. Through our new drainage system, we have taken away a great quantity of the moisture, and the new roads do not allow the surface water to percolate the soil. Consequently the clay is not nearly as moist as it was, and this means that it dries and forms fissues, which are the reverse of healthy to buildings. We see its effects in all parts of the metropolis, and a great many of the older houses have suffered considerably".

Preachers and Church editors please take notice and avoid Dryness.

A LAWSUIT BETWEEN A RECTOR AND HIS VESTRY was recently decided in favor of the vestry. The trouble arose over a statue of the Virgin Mary, which the rector had insisted upon placing in a memorial chapel, against the wishes of the vestry. It was an unfortunate circumstance, but an encouraging sign that laymen are beginning to recognize and enforce their rights concerning Church property. It will save law suits if they ascertain the views of prospective rectors about the doctrine of the adoration of the Virgin and like matters before calling them.

IT IS DISCOURAGING TO NOTE THE ANTI-CHRISTIAN [illegible]IET in Chinese affairs. A native Chinese clergyman, however, suggested to the writer that this prejudice was not so much religious as racial, and that if the Churches could be turned over to the native workers, it would disappear. This, of course, opens a large question, that only those who are thoroughly informed are competent to decide; but it would seem that the time had come to give native Christians the utmost authority that their executive ability deserves. Undoubtedly this whole question of native administration will become a matter of paramount importance in missionary counsel in the next few years, whatever will be the present outcome in China.

CONSTRUCTIVE CRITICISM OF THE PARENTS OF TODAY fell from the lips of a New York Judge when he tried the case of a sixteen-year-old wife and mother, who had killed the man who had betrayed her four years before. The question naturally arose in his mind, "Where was the mother of that twelve-year-old girl"?

Where are the mothers of thousands of twelve-year-old girls today, and what do they know of the companions of their children? There is much criticism of the conduct and morals of young people, surely it would be worth while to turn the bright light of public attention upon some of our parents, and see if we cannot bring back that loving home atmosphere that in the past has built such sturdy citizenship in men and women of our country. With such new furnishings as the radio and victrola, surely the home can be made a successful competitor of the moving picture and the dance hall. The Judge said: "The eternal truth that there is a price for parenthood; that the best influence over the man or woman of tomorrow is the influence of the mother and father of today."

THE WASHINGTON POST APPEARS IN A NEW EDITORIAL ROLE when it publishes quite a lengthy editorial on "The Christian Year", referring to the Church poet, John Keble, and calling attention to the erection of a school in his memory. We quote as follows from the article:

"A hundred years have now elapsed since its first publication, and during all that time it has been a source of consolation, inspiration, and spiritual exaltation to countless English-speaking readers of every Christian sect, for it is universal in its appeal. Its success was instantaneous from its very first appearance. The extent of its popularity may be judged from the fact that it went through ninety-five editions between 1827 and 1866, the year of its author's death.

"To the children, in particular, he was strongly attached and, with all his high attainments, he did not shirk the drudgery of teaching regularly in the local school. That school still stands, but it has become inadequate to the present demands upon it both in size and repair. Accordingly, it has been decided to build a new schoolhouse, to be called the Keble Memorial School. The project has received enthusiastic support from all parts of the world, for wherever English is spoken and read, the name of Keble is held in reverence and esteem."

THE AMERICAN CHURCH INSTITUTE FOR NEGROES has rendered a valuable service along educational lines in the establishment of numerous institutions to give the Colored people the advantage of modern advancement in this direction. There is probably no institution in the country that has a finer record than St. Paul's School at Lawrenceville, Virginia. According to a reliable Church paper, "Its fine moral influence has practically eliminated crime in a section of Virginia where there is a dense Negro population. It is one of the largest Institute Schools, and one of the three or four largest schools in the whole Episcopal Church. No graduate of St. Paul's School has ever been prosecuted for crime or misdemeanor. Its venerable principal has developed this school from its beginning in a log cabin nearly forty years ago, to its present high state of efficiency in commodious and handsome buildings. Long may he continue in the noble work to which he has given his life".

A STUDY IN CONTRASTS

While the Crusaders' Call is going forth in the Church, and we are being asked for reconsecration of ourselves to God, and it is hoped in some instances those will be touched, who have not before been reached by His message, it is well to look back into the Bible, and note the great variety of religious experiences that we find therein.

Fortunately for mankind, God's sympathy with us recognizes that there are many avenues to the soul, that man's spirit reaches out to Him in a great variety of ways, rising to giddy heights of enthusiasm and falling to perilous depths of despair, almost in the same moment.

Perhaps this is nowhere better illustrated than in the life of St. Peter. Upon his first recognition of Jesus as the Messiah, the Saviour was so filled with enthusiasm that He used the famous expression, "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock, I will build my Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it". But when He spoke of going up into Jerusalem and His sufferings there, Peter immediately began to presume upon the commendation that had been given him and said, "Be it far from Thee, Lord; this shall not be unto Thee". Whereupon the Master's reply was, "Get thee behind me, Satan; Thou art an offence unto me; for thou savourest not the things that be of God, but those that be of man" (Matthew 16:22, 23).

How human is this scene! We come out of an inspiring, uplifting service, filled with high spiritual ambition, determined to lead a better life and walk closer to God. And lo, some trying domestic incident, or business disappointment occurs, and our ideal is shattered. We descend suddently and precipitately from the Mount of Transfiguration to the Valley of Weakness. Will God understand? Can He appreciate such frailty and fickleness? Look back at the Saviour's dealings with Peter and we find a sure and certain answer, a great up-flowing spring of consolation.

Another place in the Bible where there is recorded, a tremendous contrast in the religious approach and its result, is in the eighth and ninth chapters of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles. Here we have the account of two conversions—Philip's persuasion of the Ethiopian eunuch, and Paul's conversion on the Damascus road.

In the first case, Philip takes the Scriptures and expounds them, pointing out the prophecies and their fulfilment, appealing to the man's reason, using logical arguments without emotion or excitements. He is convinced, recognizes the power of logic, is baptized, and goes "on his way rejoicing". There is no extraordinary change in his life. He was a good man already, an unusually good one, for he was thoughtfully reading the Bible as he drove along in his chariot. New light was added to his life, a greater joy came into his heart, but, apparently, there was no great spiritual upheaval.

Now follows the account of Paul's conversion, and we believe it should be a part of the same chapter, because we can imagine Paul and Philip recounting their diverse experiences in the presence of Luke and the latter busily making notes when Paul and his companions "came unto Caesarea, and we entered into the house of Philip, the Evangelist, which was one of the seven and abode with him". See the striking contrast of the scene on the Damascus road, where there is no appeal of reason, but a blinding vision forces Paul to the earth in contrite submission to the will of Jesus. He rises a transformed personality, no longer a persecutor, but a preacher of Christ. His days as a haughty official of the Sanhedrin are over, but henceforth he is an humble minister of the Gospel.

Can any one imagine more diverse experiences than those here recorded? Surely these things are set down that we may know that God in His mercy and love has prepared for us many avenues to His heart, along which His children shall travel into His presence in unnumbered millions throughout the ages.

Let us keep these things before us, as we attend the innumerable services that will be held throughout the land in the next few months, and perhaps we of the clergy will do well to remember that an emotional appeal may touch some hearts, and a logical argument will be more effective with others, and so try to arrange our sermons that they shall contain both of these powers of persuasive force to bring people into contact with God.

GETTING ACQUAINTED

The Rev. John C. Welwood, D. D., writes this week's pulpit sermon with a mature mind, having retired from the active ministry, after a varied career, including both army and foreign service. After doing his college work at Wesleyan University, he got his B. D. from the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass. After serving parishes in Massachusetts, he went as Chaplain with the Second Massachusetts United States Volunteers in the Spanish American War. He was rector of the American Church of St. John, Dresden, Germany, during the stormy period from 1914 to 1921, in which year he retired, but he still preaches from time to time, and this week's sermon was delivered in Christ Church, Alexandria, Virginia, last October, making such deep impression there upon the congregation and rector, that its publication was requested.

The Rev. George Parkin Atwater, D. D., was born in Lisbon, Ohio, and did his college work in his native state, graduating from Kenyon College in 1895, taking his theological studies at Bexley Hall, receiving a Doctor of Divinity degree from Kenyon in 1918. He made a record in his first parish, serving the Church of Our Saviour, Akron, Ohio, from 1897 to 1926, going to Grace Church, Brooklyn Heights, Brooklyn, N. Y., last October. He is one of the Associate Editors of The Witness, and has been a frequent contributor to The Atlantic Monthly. His article this week is the third of the series of "The Boy and His Church".

The Rev. Karl Morgan Block, D. D., was born in Washington, D. C. He did his college work in his home city, receiving his B. A. degree from George Washington University. He studied theology at the Theological Seminary in Virginia, where he secured his B. D. degree in 1910. After serving churches in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, and distinguishing himself as Chaplain at Camp Dix, he went to St. John's Church, Roanoke, Virginia, where he served most successfully for six years. While there the Roanoke College conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. During his rectorate at St. John's, a very complete parish house was added to the plant of that Church; in the auditorium of which Dr. Block conducted for several years a unique and unusual Bible class of more than two hundred men, made up of all denominations. Meeting on Tuesday nights, this class was one of the features of the religious life of the city. Dr. Block has always been actively interested in young people, and assumed charge of a page devoted to this branch of Church work in the Southern Churchman in 1922. Recent activities in the Bishops' Crusade have necessitated his being somewhat irregular in sending in material for this page lately, but we hope that he will be able to continue it from now on. In the spring of 1926 he accepted a call to his present work as rector of St. Michael and All Angels, St. Louis, Missouri.

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

CHARACTER

By the Reverend J. C. Welwood.

God created man in His own image.—Genesis 1:27.

TODAY our subject is Character.

"God created man in His own image." To the extent to which man develops his soul towards this image, he possesses character. It would be very difficult, perhaps impossible, to eradicate every trace of God's image in the human soul. We may be surprised to discover in the most degraded, evidences of high moral purpose sometimes breaking through. So there is always ground for hope that the image of God may yet appear.

Character depends upon the clearness of the image of God that has been effected. In these days, almost every one sooner or later owns a camera. So we are familiar with the process through which the film or plate must pass to produce the picture. The exposure gives the picture, but, until the film is developed, the picture is invisible. The proper colored light to which it is safe to expose the film reveals no difference in the film from what it was before exposure to the object photographed. It must be developed. Some photographers do better work than others. Some are careless and spoil the negative. And so is the image of God on the soul of every new born babe. The problem of life is to make the best image possible out of that exposure to God. For we like to think of the innocent new life coming from God. It is Wordsworth who says,

> "Trailing clouds of glory do we come
> From God who is our home.
> Heaven lies about our infancy".

But there are those who develop the image of God on the soul better than do others. They who have the best characters are they who have brought out the picture of the vision of God in clearest detail.

Character is being like the image. Being. Character does not consist in doing. Its fruitage is good works and in general one's character can be read by the works it shows forth. But the character itself is in the being, not in doing. Emerson begins his essay on character with this thought that character does not reside in what one does. He says:

> "I have read that those who listened to Lord Chatham felt that there was something finer in the man than anything which he said. It has been complained of our brilliant English historian of the French Revolution, that when he has told all his facts about Mirabeau, they do not justify his estimate of his genius. . . . . Sir Philip Sidney, the Earl of Essex, Sir Walter Raleigh, are men of great figure, and of few deeds. We cannot find the smallest part of the personal weight of Washington in the narrative of his exploits. The authority of the name of Schiller is too great for his books. . . . . Somewhat resided in these men which begot an expectation that outran all their performance."

I am not sure that something of this kind may not be said of our Lord. He wrought many good deeds and promulgated many lofty precepts, but they do not explain His transcendent power over the ages and the divinity ascribed to Him in spite of the natural protest of the mind. Every noble character that history has produced attained greatness not by what it accomplished, but by what it became. Fichte, the renowned German philosopher, regarded by many men of judgment as one of the profoundest thinkers and noblest men of modern times, said, "Will to be what thou oughtest to be, what thou canst be, and what therefore thou wilt be:—this is the law of the Higher Morality as well as of the Blessed Life". Here he sums up the whole of character and defines the road to the attainment of the clear outlines of the image of God in which man was created. Character will bring forth only good works surely, but the purity of the source is of more importance than the volume of the stream. The faith which St. Paul preached as superior to good works has been misunderstood and only in the last hundred years has it been properly interpreted, and not yet is it grasped by all, that character was the kind of faith he meant. What we do, though of course of importance, is of secondary consideration. What we are is the supreme test in the sight of God and before the riper judgment of mankind. (Samuel Johnson Lectures, etc., Pp. 318 and 319.) To quote another, "The items of conduct are ciphers. What a difference it makes whether you run your ciphers on at the right of a unit or set them down without a unit! The unit is being, character, personality. To have a thirst for what is real, that will not be satisfied with mere doing or appearing, and cares only for having the substance of life, in place of shadow and phantasm—this is all that makes the busiest work tell".

Now to advance deeper into our subject, the faculty of being in which character finds its rise is the will. As Fichte says, will to be what thou oughtest to be. If a course of action is compulsory, the agent is a mere automaton. He is a piece of machinery. Some one else is the doer. If the collegian attends chapel only because he is compelled to go, if the clerk is honest only because he is compelled to be, if the citizens of a nation follow desirable precepts only because compelled to, in each case the doer is really he who does the compelling and the agents or machines who obey the command gain no character thereby nor do they give expression to any character of their own. It is for this reason, so we should say, that God does not compel us to be perfect. He could have made us perfect at the first, but, in not being called upon to exercise the will and to overcome a will to do what ought not to be done, we would not have character. It is for this reason not exact to say that a man inherits a good character. Such a one, in obeying the momentum of uprightness bequeathed him, is simply following the behests of his forbears exactly as the collegian obeys the rule to go to chapel or as the clerk is good because he must be. The ancestors are the doers and the legatee of their goodness is so far an automaton. His share in the character depends upon the action of his own will in preserving the enviable momentum he has received. And what is said here of inheritance may also be affirmed of environment. Because a soul lives worthy of emulation in an environment of wealth and among people of high moral standards is not enough to assure the product of such environment of a good character. The man who attains an equally good level of uprightness coming up out of the slums has had to use his will vastly more than the man who was born to lofty impulses. There is a machine for ascertaining the tensile strength of a steel rod or rail. A gauge measures the test to which it is put by the machine. So the will is being tested all the time. It may endure every trial to which it is subject, and, on the other hand, it often comes to the breaking point. That dominance of the will is the supreme gauge of character. As Fichte says, "Will to be what thou oughtest to be". If you would mend your character, you must strengthen your will.

Now from the superlative importance first being and second will, let us progress to a third step, that which is expected of us. No one has ever developed the image of God on his soul with the same distinctness of outline with which God Himself has photographed it there. Some have five spiritual talents, some two and some only one. There is a limit, at least in this world, to the degree of Godlikeness possible. The ultimate aim at the end for which creation was exercised at the beginning, is the realizing the perfect likeness of God. The Psalmist declared that he would be satisfied when he awoke in the likeness or image of God. But that will be far into the vistas of the life to come. He voiced, however, the yearning of the human soul. We ought to become all that is possible for us of God. No one can conceive of shape and feature and outline of God. But in every one does the appeal of Godlike traits find a response. The individual who is kind and forgiving and sympathetic and helpful and intolerant of sin or dishonesty or trickery possesses traits that are Godlike and, to that extent, is recognized as an example of how God's image can be brought out in the soul's attitude to others. Nature has no manifestation comparable with that of the aspiring soul unfolding the image of God. She may illuminate the night with her stellar universe made of suns and worlds too marvelous to be comprehended. She may toss the seas into a grandeur that is as gigantic as it is sublime. She may heave up her mountains to proportions that chain us in wonder and amazement. She may paint the gardens of earth with a beauty that vies with the rainbows of heaven. But these are not her proudest achievement. Grander than suns and planets, more awe-inspiring than the threatening seas, sublimer than the cloud-penetrating mountains, finer in beauty than the daintiest flower, is the divine image in man, when man is the best that he can make of himself. That is the proudest product.

Visit the home where these characters of strength are flowering. Here is the boy or girl of ten, pure of thought, quick in mental desire, firm in moral principle, keen in play and pastime. Or here they are at twenty, established in morality, mentally enthusiastic, joyously leading in life's gaities, to those in need, a staunch friend. At thirty, they are beloved and revered socially, and whether patriotic or domestic, commercial or studious, they are leaders ever, and ever the ideal of probity and truth. In cheery old age, they are the same foes to evil and lodestone to those who seek after righteousness. This describes what we ought to be, and this is what those with a sanctified will can become by an exercise of that will.

To take another leaf from Fichtè, Will to be what thou canst be. For what we ought to be, we can be. There has been some criticism in our day of the pulpit for holding up ideals that are too high. They operate to discourage the hearers. I do not think ideals can be too high. Ideals are in the nature of the case never realized, but the nearness of approach to a high ideal is proportionately as near as that to one not so high. So, one may approach so near to a high ideal set before him that he may develop to be better than even the lower ideal itself. However that may be, one cannot expect to rise higher than his strength with God's help will take him. He has his place in the world and that place is the complement of his talents. Of the allotted task which nature has given him, he should leave nothing unfulfilled. Society has for him a duty to perform, a right for him to espouse and an honor for the regulation of his conduct. Duty, right, honor. But put these into the plural and observe how the change reduces the dignity of life. If a man is simply observant of his duties, if he is ever claiming his rights and on the alert for honors, he lives a selfish life. He misses the social ideal which should lure him to be what he can be. We can all be more than we are but the only path by which we can become more than we are is that by patient growth. It may be a searching question to ask ourselves, "Have we ever willed to be what we ought to be"? We will admit for the present that we have not become what we ought to have become. "We have left undone those things which we ought to have done." We may be too humble and too self-condemnatory, but admit, in order to see what will follow, that we have not become what we ought to have. Is there not a future before us? Some of us have few, some have more years to look forward to. But even handicapped by an incomplete past with which accuse ourselves, is there not something we can still become? Are we damaged so severely by unfulfilled duty that we are beyond further development? Nay, we know that we are not. We know that, though our pilgrimage is to be but short, there is yet an ideal of being what we ought to attain and which we can attain. What you ought to be, you can be. Goethe says, "Nature can what she wills, because she wills what she can". If we will do be what we can be, what is left for us to be, that we can be and will be. "They asked the painter Guido where he found models for his grand human heads. The artist called in a porter who was passing by, and drew a copy of his bust, in which you could plainly discern the man, yet where every capacity was turned to highest account". So if the picture of our characters were drawn of what we should be before we die, we would look upon faculties enobled, a disposition purified, motives exalted, and yet the picture would be one we could still recognize as a picture of ourselves. What we can be and what we ought to be may fall far short of what the more talented may achieve, but if we become what we can be and become what we ought to be, our characters will be as glorified as will the characters of those who have advanced farther.

In conclusion. There has been no son of man who ever fulfilled the idea of his nature as did the Son of Man. That which He ought to have become and which He could have become, He did become. The image of God photographed on His nature was maintained perfect throughout His career and, like every one of us, He had to develop it Himself. What surpassing dignity, what sublimer grandeur, what nobleness, what exaltation marked the completeness of the picture! Yet He was the same Man who started out from Nazareth and the carpenter's bench. He has commanded the love and adoration of the ages because of what He was. Yet He prayed that He and His disciples might be one. He would that we arrive at the same richness of character. His wish that we might share His glory completes the divine lineaments of the picture. That is Godlike. The aspect of character that enters our daily lives is to will the possession of strength to become what we believe to be what we ought and can become. Once having a clear idea of what is duty and right and honor, we will show character when we proceed irresistibly and listen to no unworthy enticements, proceed grimly and fearlessly and even fiercely when temptations stand in the way. These are occasions for the exercise of the will with God's help. To master here is to make oneself master of himself and of every situation, but always with God's help. How we are helped by an intimate knowledge of the way Christ was Master of Himself and of every situation! When we emulate His character, we shall be willing to follow the same path, though it be thorny and dark, or smooth and bright. That path will lead to the society of masterful souls who have conquered. We shall find in our converse with the Divine Character and with those who are reflecting the divine image in which they were created that satisfaction which comes from living as near as we can while on earth in the likeness, though at first invisible, always photographed on our hearts.

Such a character is fit to last through the eternities and such is in store for all who live under the influence and control of the character of God which He revealed in Christ. For He was the express image of the Divine Countenance.

Letters to the Editor

In this Department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letters to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

"IGNORANCE" DISAPPROVED.

Mr. Editor:

The article entitled "The Dangers of Ignorance", by C. L. Marsilliot, in your number of January 29, is written in sarcastic vein. It would seem to have a tendency to broaden rather than to draw together our two Church parties. One would infer from his manner of expression, not so much that the author is grieved by what to many of us seems an absurdity and a belittling of Christianity as such a title as "The Living Rosary of Our Lady and Saint Dominic" would indicate, but that he is irritated and impatient. As to asking prayers of Saints, as the Rev. Shirley Hughson points out, we ask our friends in this world to pray for us, where is the idolatry of asking a like service of those beyond this world; therefore, as near if not nearer the mercy seat!

Mr. Marsilliot shows himself capable of expressing himself amusingly, where such a style is seemly, but in this article he fails to "beget the smiles that have no bitterness". When he speaks of his "ignorance", I would say that many Church people are ignorant of much of the Church history which gives at least an explanation of many of the practices, pious or absurd, according to the point of view.

One can see that he has a zeal for his evangelical Church and sufficient affection for its Prayer Book and doctrines to entertain strong "feelings" against those who disregard them or seem to disregard their true teaching. A prayerful, reverent study, a tolerant (not an indifferent) spirit, I think, will place him in a position to combat the peril to the Church with a more logical treatment and as a result a greater Christian triumph.

THE BOY AND HIS CHURCH

THE CHURCH YEAR

By the Reverend George Parkin Atwater, D. D.

IF YOU were to attend a baseball game with no knowledge of the game, or of the rules, it would not interest you. If a grown-up American boy should appear at school who did not know the difference between first base, second base, third base and "home", you would think that his education had been neglected. It wouldn't be any fun to have a boy in the game who didn't know enough to run to first when he had hit the ball. The boy himself would not enjoy the game.

Have you ever watched a game of chess? Two men sit on opposite sides of a "checker-board", on which are placed odd little pieces, of curious form. The men stare hard at the board for a long time, and then one player moves a single piece to another square, or else he removes a white piece from the board entirely, and puts one of his black pieces in its place. If you know nothing about chess it is very perplexing. Why should that piece that looks like a horse's head be moved in such a peculiar fashion? And why should that tall piece have the privilege of going clear across the board?

In order to understand the game you must first study the names of the pieces. You learn which is a Knight, which is a Castle, which a Queen, and so forth. Then you must learn the manner in which each piece may be moved on the board. After you have proceeded so far you may begin to learn to play. And then you may watch a game with real interest.

It is so with every method or device intended to systematize our actions or our knowledge. They become interesting or valuable only when we give enough attention to them to learn the meaning and the vocabulary of the system.

The Church has a great number of valuable things to teach you. It would be confusing to present them in one big group of unrelated facts rather than in a definite and logical order. It would be as if the Baldwin Locomotive Works should deliver two or three carloads of "parts" to a railroad, and say: "Here is your engine." We know that it is not really an engine until it is "assembled".

Latin Grammar is hard enough as it is, but how much harder it would be if we tore apart the pages of the book and tried to study grammar by selecting pages at random.

The Church wishes to teach you certain facts and principles in a proper order. And as she teaches she wishes to have you put the teachings into practice, so that you may carefully express in life, and in character, the very thing being taught. It is as if an instructor in the gymnasium should not only tell you how to exercise on the parellel bars, but should, with each instruction, have you actually exercise on the bars.

So, within the Church there has been developed a system of presenting its teachings. This system is called the Church year.

The Church Year is an arrangement of the calendar year, in eight seasons, during which the Church sets forth, in order, the events of Christ's life, His important teachings, and other Christian facts and instructions.

During the year the Church presents its truths and teaches its practices, to increase your knowledge of the Christian religion, and to develop your Christian character.

We must think of the Church year, not as a succession of Sundays which have special names, but as a succession of seasons in which certain Sundays naturally fall. Added to this are certain special days which we call Holy Days, on each of which a special event is commemorated, or some person remembered.

The Church year will never have its real value for you unless you are willing to spend a few minutes to learn the order of the Seasons. Can you imagine the perplexity of the person who did not know the order of the months of the year? If he thought that June followed February, and that December followed August, his mind would be in confusion about summer, and Christmas and birthdays, and the orderly succession of events.

This is equally true with the Church year. Our first task is to learn the order of the Church Seasons. And it is a very easy task if we undertake it in the proper way. There are only eight seasons, but they should be learned in groups. Fix your attention upon this group, and repeat the words until you have them firmly fastened in mind.

ADVENT—CHRISTMAS—EPIPHANY

Repeat this group of words until you cannot fail to say them in the right order, just as you would say Sunday, Monday, Tuesday. When this is really learned take the next group of three seasons:

LENT—EASTER—ASCENSION.

Having repeated these until you can say them without effort, then learn the next two:

WHITSUN-TIDE
TRINITY.

Now repeat the whole group in this fashion:

Advent, Christmas, Epiphany (pause)
Lent, Easter, Ascension (pause)
Whitsun-tide (pause), Trinity.

There you have them, and no one will ever be able to convince you that Advent follows Epiphany.

But there is a logical reason for this grouping of the seasons. Let us consider these facts about the first group: ADVENT—CHRISTMAS—EPIPHANY—are the seasons that illumine the teachings of the Coming of Jesus Christ to earth.

The word "ADVENT" means "coming" and refers to the coming of Jesus Christ. There are four Sundays in the Advent Season. On those Sundays the Church teaches us that Christ's first coming was expected, and that we should prepare for His second coming. The Advent season falls in December. See Prayer Book, Pp. 52-57.)

It is natural that the Season of ADVENT, which sets forth the expectation of Christ's coming, should be followed by the Season in which the Church celebrates the fact that Christ came, in the flesh.

This is the CHRISTMAS season, the chief festival of which is CHRISTMAS DAY. It is not necessary to enlarge upon the meaning of this season, for it is the part of the Church Year that is observed by all people. (See Prayer Book, Pp. 58-67.)

But we must not forget that Christ came, not to be the Saviour of the Jews only, but to be the Saviour and the Light, of all people, for all time. The Church teaches this in the EPIPHANY season. The word "EPIPHANY" means "a showing forth" or "manifestation" and refers to the manifestation of Christ to the Gentiles.

The Epiphany Season begins with the Feast of the Epiphany, January 6, and lasts from one to six weeks, depending on the date of Easter. (See Prayer Book, Pp. 69-80.)

The next group of seasons—LENT—EASTER—ASCENSION—sets forth the facts and teachings that surround the latter days of Christ, and His departure from earth. His coming is thus presented in three seasons, and His departure in three seasons. But that the transition may not be so abrupt, the Church has set apart three Sundays, between Epiphany and Lent, in which to prepare her children to go from the joyous seasons of Christmas and Epiphany, to the penitential season of Lent. These are the Sundays with the hard names:

SEPTU-GESIMA
SEXA-GESIMA
QUINQUA-GESIMA.

These mean "seventieth day", "sixtieth day", and "fiftieth day", and refer to the approximate relation of these Sundays to Easter Day. They are like a chain of three links binding together the ADVENT—CHRISTMAS—EPIPHANY and the LENT—EASTER—ASCENSION group of seasons. (See Prayer Book, Pp. 8-84.)

Lent is a penitential season of forty days, not counting Sundays. Lent begins with Ash Wednesday. The last day of Lent is Easter Even, or the Saturday before Easter. The second Sunday before Easter is called Passion Sunday, and the week following Passion Sunday is called Passion Week. The Sunday next before Easter is called Palm Sunday, and the week is called Holy Week. Thursday in Holy Week is called Maundy Thursday, Friday in Holy Week is called Good Friday. (See Prayer Book, Pp. 88-124).

Lent is the season in which we practice self-discipline, in Prayer, Fasting and Alms-giving, so that we may retain the mastery of the spiritual life over the material. The Church teaches us in Lent of the suffering and trials of Christ,which culminated in His crucifixion on Good Friday, when He died upon the Cross for our redemption. Christ by His death upon the Cross made a full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world.

We receive the benefits, the power and efficacy of that sacrifice, the remission of sins, by the sacrament of the Holy Communion which Christ Himself instituted on Maundy Thursday, just before His death.

But Christ overcame the power of death, and on the third day He rose from the dead. This fact we call the Resurrection. So on the third day from Good Friday we keep the Feast of the Resurrection, Easter Day. (See Prayer Book, p. 125.)

(Observe that from Palm Sunday to Whitsunday the Church provides the same number of days to commemorate the events as the events themselves actually occupied. From our Lord's triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Palm Sunday), to the descent of the Holy Spirit (Whitsunday), eight weeks elapsed. The Church uses eight weeks to commemorate the events of that period.)

Easter Day is called the Queen of Feasts. It fell on the first day of the week. Ever after that Christ's disciples met on the first day of the week to carry out His injunction, given on Maundy Thursday, to celebrate the Holy Communion. This is the origin of the observance of Sunday. Every Sunday is a festival, an echo of Easter. (See Prayer Book, Pp. 125-139.)

Christ was forty days on earth after His resurrection. He then departed from the earth on Holy Thursday, which we call Ascension Day. We observe Ascension Day always on the fortieth day after Easter. (See Prayer Book, Pp. 140-141.)

The Ascension Season lasts ten days.

We now come to the great festival which is called Whitsun-day. The Apostles tarried in Jerusalem ten days after our Lord's Ascension, waiting for the fulfillment of Christ's promise that they should receive the power of the Holy Spirit. On the day of Pentecost (Whitsun-day) they received that power. (Read the Second Chapter of the Books of Acts.)

So the Church observes the Sunday which falls ten days after the Ascension as Whitsunday. (See Prayer Book, p. 143.) This is the birth-day of the Church. From this time the Apostles began their work conscious that they had received power to do so from on high. (Read St. Matthew's Gospel, Chapter 28, verses 18-20.)

Whitsun-tide is the season which begins with Whitsunday. It lasts one week.

Trinity Sunday is the Sunday following Whitsunday. It begins the long Trinity Season, which lasts about six months. During this season the Church sets forth the teachings of Christ. (See Prayer Book, Pp. 148-186.)

Throughout the Church year are numerous special days, all of which may be learned from the Prayer Book. (See Pp. 188-219.)

The Church emphasizes the different seasons, not only by having names for the Sundays and seasons, but also by providing a special Collect, Epistle and Gospel for each Sunday and Holy Day, and by using proper colors for the hangings and vestments.

If we begin in Advent to observe the Church year, and use our Prayer Book, and listen to the lessons, we begin to walk in the footsteps of Christ, and to learn His life. It is as if the Church spread the life of Christ before us as a panorama, and we see the succession of events in proper order. Each year we participate in services filled with the spirit and knowledge of Christ.

From Advent to Trinity the great drama of our Lord's life is unfolded with impressive beauty and profound meaning. From the first light that begins like the dawn in Advent, from the joy of Christmas and the universal blessing of Epiphany, the Church leads us through Lent to the depths of our Lord's sufferings on Good Friday; raises us again to the joy of Easter, and the coronation of Ascension Day; then carries us forward to the full appreciation of our fellowship in Him and His Church at Whitsun-tide, and in the teachings of the Trinity Season. The never-to-be-forgotten record is thus interwoven into our lives, so that we are not merely hearers of the story, but are like His disciples, walking with Him over the plains of Galilee, riding with Him over the waters of blue Capernaum, climbing with Him the mountains of Judea, treading with Him the Temple courts at Jerusalem, standing at the foot of the Cross; and finally sharing with the apostles the peace of His Holy Spirit in our lives.

(The reader is urged to examine the Prayer Book, especially the Collects, Epistles and Gospels, beginning on page 52, and note the succession of seasons as there presented. A complete manual of the Church Year, giving the details and a chart, may be secured for fifty cents from the Parish Publishers, Akron, Ohio.)

THE CHURCH AND THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S WORK

Edited by the Reverend Karl Morgan Block, D. D.

MEETING OF THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON YOUNG PEOPLE'S WORK.

THAT the Young People's organizations are a vigorous and progressive part of the life of the Church was proved by the recent meeting of the National Commission on Young People's Work, held at Racine, Wisconsin, under the auspices of the Department of Religious Education, January 27-29, 1927. The commission adopted a number of resolutions setting forth the attitude of the young people on various questions of general Church interest, and at the same time passed legislation which will aid greatly in the actual work of the parish groups.

The two outstanding statements of the attitude of the Young People are those on the Bishops' Crusade and on the general financial policy of the National Commission. The following resolution seems to indicate that the youth of the Church have caught the true spirit of the Crusade:

> Whereas, In the past glorious history of our Church children and youth have been crusaders with a spirit of adventure and of seeking ever the highest and best to help promote the Kingdom of God among men.
> Be it Resolved, That we, the young people of the Church of today, not only accept but volunteer to answer the challenge of the Bishops' Crusade, by renewed personal allegiance to Christ and to the Church which is His Body.

The recommendation on financial policy extends in its broadest interpretation beyond the realm of finance, and is a clear and reassuring statement of the relation of the young people to the Church, as they themselves see it:

> "The National Commission has felt the need of more funds to carry out its work than are available at the present time. After mature consideration and discussion the commission has reached a very definite conclusion, namely: that no money tax or assessment should be made upon individuals, parochial groups, or dioceses by the National organization. We feel that it is much to be preferred that the young people contribute to the General Church through their parish and diocesan budgets with the idea that when the General Church can meet its obligations in full it will recognize and make adequate provision in its appropriations for the growing field of Young People's work. The basis of this decision is that the National Commission feels that the young people have made every effort not to develop an organization apart from or alongside the Church, but rather have indicated consistently that they are a normal and natural part of the Church's life."

The widespread request for a national prayer and a hymn for general use has been answered in the writing of a prayer by the Rt. Rev. John Gardner Murry, D. D., Presiding Bishop of the Church, and the adoption as a national hymn of Miss Edith Clayton's "Father, we come with youth and vigor pressing". Attention of the young people's organizations is called to the fact that an attractive card, suitable for individual use or for pasting in hymn or conference books, containing this prayer and hymn, are available at one cent each from Miss Clarice Lambright, 1006 Temple Building, 14 Franklin Street, Rochester, New York. These cards are already prepared, and will be sent immediately on request.

In answer to the general call for publishing of material of help to parish groups, the commission has undertaken the immediate publication of a handbook in loose-leaf form, to contain sections embracing all the phases of Young People's Work. In addition to the general sections on Worship, Service, Study and Fellowship, there will be others treating Organization, Simple Rules of Conducting Meetings, a general list of suggested topics, and classified prayers and hymns for use in young people's groups. The book is being printed in loose-leaf form for the obvious reason that it will be necessary to make additions; these will be included as soon as there is a reasonable demand for them.

The young people of the South will be glad to learn that the National Commission has accepted the invitation of the young people and of the Department of Religious Education of the Province of Sewanee, to hold the first triennial conference of the young people at the University of the South. The conference is to be five days in length, and will occur, if satisfactory arrangements can be made with the university authorities, between August 28 and September 8, 1928.

The commission appointed an executive committee to carry on the work in the interim between this and the next meeting of the commission. All correspondence should be addressed to one of the persons on this committee, in order to get an immediate response: Miss Clarice Lambright, 1006 Temple Building, Rochester, New York; the Rev. Karl M. Block, D. D., 6340 Ellenwood Avenue, St. Louis, Mo.; Mrs. Kercheval Smith, 3012 North Calvert Street, Baltimore, Md.; Miss Marian Macdonald, 673 Richmond Avenue, Buffalo, New York; and Mr. Harold C. Barlow, 1801 Fond du Lac Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis.

A more complete account of the meeting is being prepared and will be distributed through the diocesan and provincial officers of young people's groups.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE COMMUNITY

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

A CHURCH AT WORK.

Since the completion of the new parish house and Sunday-school rooms of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, that building has been thrown open for meetings of the greatest possible variety. It is a down-town church, and proves its usefulness as a community center.

One of the most interesting of these gatherings will begin on Monday, February 14, when the Virginia Conference of Social Workers convenes there for its annual three days discussions of social problems, which include a great variety of topics. These state meetings are of the utmost value to the clergy, especially those in the country, and should be attended by them whenever possible.

Ministers have a valuable contribution to make to scientific social work, and, at the same time, they can learn much from contacts with those engaged in this noble profession. Drawing these two groups together is an important matter, and one excellent way to do it is to offer our parish buildings as a center for such meetings. It is to be hoped that other churches will follow the example of St. Paul's in extending hospitality to such important conventions.

PREVENTION OF LAWLESSNESS.

At a meeting of one of the committees of the National Crime Commission held recently in Chicago, two suggestions for the prevention of crime were proposed. One was a much more careful supervision of the sale of firearms, especially pistols.

In the State of West Virginia a license is required before any one can buy a pistol. This permit costs a considerable sum, and is quite difficult to obtain. It is necessary to show good reason why the applicant should have a pistol, such as being a night-watchman, bank messenger, or holding some such position where self-defense might become necessary in the course of one's usual occupation. This law has done much to reduce crime and violence in that state. Its advantages are obvious, and work almost entirely against the irresponsible. An examination of the reports of robbery, hold-ups, etc., will show that it is not once in a hundred times that the possession of the pistol saves the victim.

In England, ever since the war, there has been, what might be called a gentleman's agreement, if such a term be applicable to law-breakers, between the police and the criminal classes, that neither should carry firearms, and, curiously enough, the arrangements seems to work satisfactorily. We do not believe that it could be put into operation in this country, where the lawless element is very much larger and more violent than in England.

The second plan, under discussion, was advocated by the Honorable Newton D. Baker, former Secretary of War, who said in part:

"Today, instead of making the world safe for democracy, we must make our cities safe for ourselves to live in. To do this we need to organize public opinion in such a way as to overcome apathy for crime conditions and the maudlin sympathy displayed for the criminal. There must be more sympathy for the victim of the original, for the police who apprehended the criminal, the prosecutor and the judge who bend their efforts to bring him to justice."

Undoubtedly, the growth of the attitude of respect for the law would do a good deal toward maintaining its observance, but this all comes back to what has been so often reiterated on this page, namely, that a respect for the Constitution of the United States must be developed among our better citizens before we can expect the lower classes to abide by the law.

One may not approve of the prohibition amendment, and it is perfectly legitimate to take vigorous steps to have it amended through the proper channels, but until this is done it is certainly demoralizing to have otherwise respectable and supposedly law-abiding citizens, deliberately disregard this basic provision of our law.

It offers every inducement to those of the lawless classes to carry their violent practices to the furthest extreme when they know that the wealthy are paying no heed to laws that are supposed to be enforced equally on all our citizens.

Present conditions are undoubtedly the result, to some extent, of this attitude among the so-called "best people", and they will certainly continue to grow worse until such people recognize their responsibility to set the right kind of example.

COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING.

By Mary Evelyn Brydon, M. D.

The Ten Commandments as Fundamental Principles.

Last week I asked you to try to put the Ten Commandments into ten words. I asked you to make them positive rather than negative. Did you try it? I wanted to start you to thinking in terms of the positive teaching rather than negative teaching. It may be possible to teach a child to do a thing by telling him not to do the opposite, but it isn't considered good pedagogy according to up-to-date educational authorities.

The Ten Commandments are the basis of all law. I mean of all human laws. Take the Bill of Rights, the Declaration of Independence, the Statute Laws that are used by the courts in your state and see whether they are not so many modifications of the different Commandments as laid down for us in the twentieth chapter of Exodus. Everything is there. We are told in many ways what we may or may not do to one another, to each other's property, homes, person, wife, children, how we are to act in given situations, what we may or may not say—all of it is right there in the Ten Commandments. If everybody kept strictly these Laws of God we would need few of the many laws as laid down for our guidance in Statute Books.

What the Ten Commandments and the Statute Laws have in common is that both aim to teach us how to live right with God and with our neighbors; Christ teaches us how to make the most of life. All must be taught to the children in a way that they can understand. To live right; make the most of life—these are the results that we wish to attain. Christ teaches us the second, and we will take His teaching up later. The fundamental principles as laid down for us in the Ten Commandments will teach us the first. That means that you must know what to teach, or the subject you are to teach.

But do you? Certainly before we discuss methods of training in these laws we had better see if we really know what it is that we want to teach.

Let us take each Commandment and look at it in a different light, for the moment, from that in which it appears in the Bible. This we will do for our own admonition.

In the Parents' Institutes which I have held in my state, we have taken up this subject in the following way and I believe have received much benefit from such a method. It is not I who have made this list of ten words to represent duties to be learned from the Ten Commandments in a positve way for the training of children. It has taken some thousand parents in open discussion over a period of three years to evolve them. I bring you their summary. Study them; compare them with your list I asked you to make out. Next week I shall take each up in detail and discuss them in order to learn exactly what each Commandment may mean in the training of children in a positive way. I shall learn for myself and then teach my child from the First Commandment, Belief; Second Commandment, Worship; Third Commandment, Reverence; Fourth Commandment, Rest; Fifth Commandment, Obedience; Sixth Commandment, Protection; Seventh Commandment; Purity; Eighth Commandment, Honesty; Ninth Commandment, Truth; Tenth Commandment, Contentment.

DIOCESAN COUNCILS AND CONVENTIONS

WEST TEXAS.

THE twenty-third annual Council of the Diocese of West Texas was held in St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, beginning with an inspirational service Tuesday night, January 25, at which Bishop Capers delivered his annual address. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion at ten o'clock Wednesday morning, the council sermon being preached by Bishop Moore, of Dallas, after which the council was organized for business. The Rev. L. B. Richards was elected secretary, and the Rev. J. S. Budlong was appointed assistant secretary. The parochial reports indicated a year of exceptional progress throughout the Diocese. The apportionment for general missions will have been met within six hundred dollars, which deficit the council voted should be raised and forwarded to the National Council as soon as possible, and the school is equipped equal in every detail to the other Church Schools of the country. The Texas Military Institute, the Diocesan School for boys, has been thoroughly renovated at an expense of some forty thousand dollars, and is filled to capacity. Practically all of the Diocesan officers were reelected, the Standing Committee consisting of the Rev. L. B. Richards, president; the Rev. J. S. Budlong, secretary; the Ven. B. S. McKenzie, Hon. A. W. Seeligson, Hon. S. G. Tayloe and Mr. Jesse A. Chase. As the Synod of the Province of the Southwest meets in San Antonio October 18 to 20, Bishop Capers appointed a special committee on arrangements, with the Rev. R. P. Crum as chairman. The Presiding Bishop has accepted an invitation to be present at the meeting of the Synod, and Bishop Capers stated that he hoped to have Bishop Freeman, of Washington, as a guest. The meetings of the Woman's Auxiliary, Girls' Friendly Society and Daughters of the King were held in connection with the council. About one hundred and sixty-five persons attended the Diocesan dinner at the St. Anthony Hotel on Wednesday night.

J. S. B.

UPPER SOUTH CAROLINA.

The response of the laymen to the need of the Diocese in financial extremity was the most encouraging feature of the annual convention of the Diocese of Upper South Carolina held in York January 25-26. Mr. Joseph E. Hart, of York, volunteered to lead a committee of laymen to procure the $5,600, which was required to obviate the most damaging reductions which the finance department has been forced to suggest. The men came forward with the assurance that the amount would be raised. This action was a great relief to the whole convention.

The convention formally accepted the offer of Major and Mrs. W. B. Moore of $10,000 for Voorhees School for Negroes and Clemson College Parish House to operate as a loan during their lifetime and at their deaths to become the property of the Church. Deep appreciation was expressed to Major and Mrs. Moore for this generosity.

Principal E. E. Blanton, of the Voorhees Normal and Industrial School for Negroes, spoke of the work of the school and of its place in the education of the Negro youth for elevating the life of the community. He had with him three others. The four sang very effectively some of the Negro folk songs and spirituals so much loved by those interested in the Negroes. They created a favorable impression of the life of Voorhees.

The Commission on Mountain Work had a constructive report which was made by the Rev. Malcolm Taylor, chairman. The commission proposes to start a work in the mountain section of the Diocese by placing a clergyman in the field to be primarily a pastor, and to preach and minister otherwise as occasion presents or develops. Nothing of an institutional nature will be attempted, for some time at least.

The results of the elections were in part: Secretary, the Rev. A. Rufus Morgan; treasurer, Mr. Bryan H. Lumpkin. Standing Committee of the Diocese: the Rev. Messrs. Henry D. Phillips, D. D., A. R. Mitchell, M. S. Taylor, T. T. Walsh, W. H. K. Pendleton, and Messrs. B. H. Boykin, W. Bedford Moore, Jr., J. Nelson Frierson, James S. Middleton and A. P. Brown.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod: the Rev. Messrs. A. Rufus Morgan, Capers Satterlee, Malcolm S. Taylor, L. N. Taylor, E. V. W. Edwards, E. M. Claytor; and Messrs. B. H. Lumpkin, Carl Hart, W. Bedford Moore, Jr., James S. Middleton, M. C. Heath and C. M. Lindsay.

The convention showed the best attendance of its history since the first annual convention. Its next meeting is to be held in St. John's Church, Columbia, the Rev. G. C. Williams, rector, January 24, 1928. This congregation has recently completed a new church building which can easily take care of the convention.

SOUTH FLORIDA.

Chief features of the opening service of the fifth annual convention, Diocese of South Florida, held in Christ Church, Bradenton, January 25-27, were Bishop Mann's address and an address on Parish Organization, by Frank P. Dearing, senior warden of St. John's Church, Jacksonville.

The Ven. James G. Glass, Archdeacon of South Florida, was unanimously reelected secretary, with hearty tribute to his rare efficiency and care in fulfilling this arduous duty through five years past.

Further plans for the furtherance of the Bishops' Crusade were given, the two main centers for the work of Bishop Knight and the other visiting Crusaders to be at Tampa, following the close of convention, and at Miami a few days later.

A vote of appreciation to all who contributed to the fund for replacing the great loss to Church property through the September hurricane, was passed.

The treasurer was authorized to pay to the treasurer of the National Council the deficit on the amount pledged by South Florida for 1926.

Following a report from the trustees of the University of the South, a resolution was adopted; commending the authorities of the University of the South in the effort to raise a two million dollar endowment fund to increase the usefulness of the University to the Church and to the cause of education, and pledging interest in and prayers for the success of the campaign.

John W. Claussen, of Miami, was re-elected treasurer, and Floyd L. Knight, of Miami, was reappointed chancellor. Those elected on the Standing Committee were the Rev. Messrs. W. G. Clark, G. I. Hiller, H. G. Walker, T. W. Bethea and J. C. M. Valentine.

Deputies to the next Synod were the Rev. Messrs. Maderia, Taylor, Curtis, Hiller, Clark and Young; and Messrs. G. F. Smith, George Hosmer, W. E. Tylander, H. J. Wilmshurst, S. L. Lowry, Sr., W. G. Hankins.

Invitation to hold the next convention in St. Luke's Cathedral Parish, Orlando, was accepted, the date being January 24, 1928.

Both Bishop Mann and Bishop Wing in their addresses to convention warmly commended the courageous spirit shown by clergy and laity in the parishes and missions which had serious loss in the hurricane, and they urged a hearty participation in the Bishops' Crusade by all congregations in this Diocese.

"The majority of Americans are boastful of living in an age of progress," said Bishop Mann. "But what do we mean by progress? Certainly mere change is not necessarily desirable advance. It may be aberrancy or retrogression. The only valuable movement is such as leads to better conditions. So there must be an ideal which we want to realize. We must see it in the distance and long for it and measure our progress as it is making us draw nearer that ideal."

"Instead of seeking our assurance of progress from the ether and the dust, from the geologists and the chemists, let us turn to Him whose life was the light of men, and whose promise to those who accept Him is their eternal goodness and glory."

"Belief in progress! Most assurely so for all who will obediently and enthusiastically follow the Great Leader. He knows and shows the way. Therefore, let us throw ourselves more confidently into our proclamation of the Gospel as the one hope for true progress. Let us say to all who will hearken, 'Repent ye, for the Kingdom of Heaven is at hand'."

OKLAHOMA.

Bishops' Crusade and Annual Convocation.

The Bishops' Crusade at St. Paul's Cathedral, in Oklahoma City, began on Sunday, January 16, Bishop Wing, of South Florida, being the Preacher, and Dean Hoag, of Salina, Kansas, being the Interpreter. There were large and attentive congregations throughout. The sermons were inspiring, instructive and helpful, and Dean Hoag was a wonderful interpreter of the "Life that is hid with Christ in God".

On Thursday and Friday of the same week the annual convocation of the District of Oklahoma was held in connection with the Crusade.

The convocation was opened with a celebration of the Holy Communion, Bishop Seaman, acting Bishop of the District, being the celebrant. He was assisted by the Rev. Hugh J. Llwyd, who read the Epistle, and by Bishop Wing, who read the Gospel. Bishop Seaman delivered his address at this service. He commended to the clerical and lay members of convocation, "The National Church League as an organization which is working to maintain and strengthen the constitutional nature of the Protestant Episcopal Church in face of the well-organized efforts on the part of those who are contending for the form of congregationalism found in and encouraged by the Monastic Orders. He pointed to the fact that this form of congregationalism is supported by a phase of individualism expressed by various clergymen, and even by some Bishops in the Church who seem to be emulating the individualism of the Bisnop of Rome, which permits individual Bishops to exercise power without any constitutional restraints. The Bishop asked the clergy and laity to pray faithfully that the coming General Convention, which must deal openly with these conditions, may be guided by the Holv Spirit, and characterized by real charity, by means of which earnest struggles may be carried on with Christian forbearance.

The outstanding event of the convocation was the announcement of the Rev. C. L. Widney, of Emmanuel Church, Shawnee, that that mission relinquishes the $600 which it has been receiving from the missionary funds and will organize as a parish. This is the first mission in six years to do this.

The statement of Mr. Widney was supplemented by the announced purpose of All Saints, McAlester, and St. Matthew's, Enid, that they will achieve self-support this year, and of El Reno, Pawhuska and Holdenville, within two years..

Convocation arranged for the Oklahoma Summer Conference to take place of the School of Methods, held for several years past. The Rev. Eric Montizambert was elected director of the conference, and the deans of the several departments are as follows: Christian Social Service, the Very Rev. John W. Day; Religious Education, Mrs. C. G. Templeton; Young People's Department, the Rev. Thomas Mabley. The elections resulted as follows: Chancellor, the Hon. Preston C. West, Tulsa; Secretary and Registrar, the Rev. C. L. Widney, Shawnee; Assistant Secretary, the Rev. Herbert Morris, Guthrie; Treasurer, Mr. J. C. DeLana, El Reno; Examining Chaplains, the Very Rev. John W. Day, the Rev. Joseph Carden and the Rev. A. S. Hock; Delegates to the Provincial Synod, the Rev. H. E. Toothaker, the Rev. Hugh L. Llwyd, and the Rev. Franklin Davis. Alternates: the Rev. J. C. Donnell, the Rev. A. E. Saunders, and the Ven. H. B. Smith; lay, Mesrs. Lewis Pratt, J. C. LeLana and Bragdon; alternates, Messrs. Walter Young, Wright and R. E. Lee.

The next convocation will be held at Grace Church, Huskogee, January 26 and 27, 1928.

J.C.

NORTH TEXAS.

The keynote of the Annual Convocation of North Texas, held at Plainview, January 16, 17 and 18, was its preparation for the Bishops' Crusade and the adoption of plans for its follow-up work.

The following officers were chosen for the year:

Executive Committee:

The Bishop, chairman ex-officio. Council of Advice, the Rev. Messrs. L. L. Swan, Clarendon. chairman Department of Missions; F. B. Eteson, Plainview, chairman Department of Christian Education; F. A. Parsons, San Angelo, chairman Christian Social Service; L. G. H. Williams, Lubbock, chairman Department Publicity; Mr. Will Stith, chairman Department of Finance; Mr. J. B. Dooley, Amarillo, Chancellor; Ven. Hall Pierce, Amarillo, Secretary (Registrar).

Delegates to Provincial Synod:

The Rev. Messrs. W. P. Gerhart, F. B. Eteson, L. G. H. Williams, and Messrs. T. R. Smith, W. W. Rix, H. S. Gooch.

Alternates:

The Rev. Messrs. F. Stedman, L. L. Swan, F. Parsons, and Messrs. Will Stith, H. H. Allen and J. B. McClelland.

Mr. J. B. McClelland, Treasurer Field Department, was able to report the budget quota for the National Council and District paid; North Texas' share of the deficit paid, National Council Advance Work quota paid, and nine-tenths of the District Advance Work quota paid.

New lots were reported at Pampa and Lubbock, a new parish house at Big Spring, and a new chapel at Baird. The church at Colorada was remodeled and a new altar installed.

It was voted to help finance the Sewanee campaign to raise two million dollars for a development fund.

The third day of convocation was the second anniversary of Bishop Seaman's consecration. He was presented with a token of appreciation from the convocation.

Abilene was selected as the next meeting place of convocation, January 15, 16 and 17, 1928.

It was voted to send representatives to the Madison and Manhattan Conference on Rural Work.

The District Woman's Auxiliary met at the same time and place, and elected the following new officers:

President, Mrs. W. W. Rix, Lubbock; First Vice-President, Mrs. I. R. Anderson, Plainview; Second Vice-President, Mrs. Joseph Daly, Abilene; Secretary, Mrs. Henry Gooch, Amarillo; Treasurer, Mrs. T. R. Smith, Colorado; United Thank Offering Treasurer, Mrs. J. B. McClelland, Clarendon; Educational Secretary, Miss Ruth Rix, Lubbock.

SPOKANE.

The Crusade and The Convocation.

"Love, joy and zeal" are the essentials of religion and the Bishops' Crusade, according to the statement of Bishop W. P. Remington and Mr. Walter McPherson, who conducted the Bishops' Crusade in connection with the annual Convocation of Spokane, just closed. The services were among the largest attended in the history of the local church. Over four hundred and fifty attended the annual dinner held on Monday evening, and more than one hundred of these were young people. The interest was intense and scores of enlistment cards were signed at the close of the four-day sessions. Two previous Crusades at Walla Walla and Yokima preceded the one held at Spokane. These were also very successful. The local clergy have planned to carry the Crusade into the outlying towns and churches.

The Bishop's report showed that three hundred and eleven had been confirmed during the past year. This is the largest in the history of the jurisdiction. His report showed the obligation to the Church's Program had all been met.

Those elected to the Provincial Synod to be held in may at Seattle were the Rev. Messrs. A. A. Bramhall, F. W. Pratt and E. L. Rolls; alternates, the Rev. Messrs. T. A. Daughters, Alex Coffin and A. J. Palmer; and the lay delegates are Messrs. W. L. Sterling, S. King and B. G. Ewing.

Those elected or appointed on the Bishop and Council were the Rev. Messrs. W. H. Favorham, W. D. Vincent, S. King and H. E. Hamilton.

The Council of Advicate: the Rev. Messrs. E. R. Allman, T. A. Daughters, E. W. Pigion and Messrs. John King, Fred Phair and E. H. Knight.

FIRST CHURCH CONFERENCE IN PORTO RICO.

By Mrs. Charles B. Colmore.

Church Conferences in the United States have multiplied so rapidly in the past few years that one hesitates to send to the Church Press the account of still another one, though this one was held outside the borders of Continental America. However, we believe that the Church at home will be interested to hear of the great blessing which has come to us through the efforts of the Rev. T. A. Conover, of Bernardsville, New Jersey.

To those of us whose privilege it is to share in the Church work in the Missionary District of Porto Rico there has been given no such spiritual uplift or inspiration quite so wonderful as that given us during the six days of our first Church Conference, held at St. Andrew's Mission, Mayaguez, January 10 to 16. The faculty consisted of the Rev. T. A. Conover, Dr. C. E. Edmunds of the General Seminary (whose son is doing missionary agricultural work in this District), Dr. Adelaide Case, of Teachers' College, Columbia University, and Miss Florence Newbold, of the National Girls' Friendly Society. Courses were given on "How to Teach the Bible", "How to Teach the Prayer Book", "Principles of Teaching", "Work Among Young People", and "Personal Religion".

Gathered in the Church Monday evening the opening service, when Mr. Conover made us come up unto the Mount of Transfiguration, we knew for a certainty that it was our Lord Himself who had put it into the hearts of some of His faithful people to make this conference possible. To the friends in Mr. Conover's parish who financed the conference we in the District owe a great debt of gratitude. Living as we do on this island in the mid-Atlantic, fourteen hundred miles from New York, our only port of entry into the United States, we feel far away indeed from the help and inspiration which come from contact with individuals and groups who are leading in the corporate life of the Church today.

From the daily celebration of Holy Communion, at 7:15, through the morning classes, the noonday intercessions, afternoon conferences, group recreation and evening talks on Personal Religion, every moment was filled with the very things we needed most in the way of spiritual inspiration and practical help. Bishops, clergy, teachers, lay workers, and students, both native and foreign, gathered together in a common desire to benefit by this great opportunity and then to go back to our various posts and share with our people what we ourselves had gained.

At St. Andrew's, the Rev. F. A. Saylor ministers to all English-speaking people in the community, in addition to his Spanish work. There are no other English services in Mayaguez. It is an interesting note that three of the Presbyterian missionaries, with a group of young native women from their training school, attended the conference daily and were most enthusiastic in their expressions of appreciation for the help it had been to them. "God is working His purpose out" and this close association with our Presbyterian friends was mutually helpful and makes for a better understanding of one another. Who knows to what it may lead?

On Sunday morning when we knelt side by side at the sung Spanish Holy Communion (the closing service of the conference), visitors from the States, native and American clergy and workers, as well as the large congregation, there came to many of us a deeper realization of the oneness of the Church. "Elevad vuestros corazones"—"Lift up your hearts". We did, indeed, lift them up in joyful thanksgiving to our Lord, that no matter where we are, nor in what language we express it, we are "made one body with Him, that He may dwell in us and we in Him".

The Bishops' Crusade In Honolulu.

The Bishops' Crusade was carried on, and met with excellent response, in the far-off Pacific Ocean, in the Missionary District of Honolulu.

The Advent season was observed as the period of preparation, especially St. Andrew's Day, with special preaching in the various parishes and missions, and quiet days of intercession for clergy and laity.

Observance of the period of the Crusade itself was begun on the first Sunday after Epiphany with an eight-day mission in St. Andrew's Cathedral, Honolulu, for all the city parishes and missions. The preacher was Archdeacon Percy C. Webber, the well known missioner, who was in the Islands at the time, after having held a mission at Epiphany Church, Honolulu. The mission met with splendid response, each day's congregation being larger than that of the day before, culminating in a magnificent service on Sunday evening, January 16. The plan of the Crusade was followed as closely as possible, a lay speaker giving a brief address before the missioner's sermon, and the Bishop of this District closing with a summary of what had been said by the Archdeacon. Thus Bishop, priest and layman participated in each service while the clergy of the city assisted in turn at the early Eucharist and the evening service each day.

Following this, missions were held in the parishes and missions on the outlying Islands, the Bishop visiting some points on Maui and Hawaii, Archdeacon Webber going to other points on Maui, the Rev. James F. Kieb to Hawaii, and the Rev. Elmer S. Freeman to Kauai.

Important Action Taken By Two Dioceses.

On January 26, the Council of the Diocese of Milwaukee, on recommendation of Bishop Webb, set off the northern part of the Diocese as a new jurisdiction of which the see city is to be Eau Claire. This action follows on the gift of $100,000 as an endowment fund for such a new Diocese and the gift of a Bishop's House by the vestry of Christ Church Parish, Eau Claire.

On February 1 the Council of the Diocese of Fond du Lac, took similar action setting off six counties of their Diocese to be incorporated in the new Diocese. This will give a section of Wisconsin comprising about one-third of the territory of the State and about one-fourth of its population. Final approval will be asked of the next General Convention.

News From China.

A cable received on February 1 from Bishop Roots reads as follows: Members of the foreign staff in Changsha, Ichang, and Shasi, have been recalled to Hankow. All are well. All Middle Schools, except Boone Middle School and St. Hilda's, Wuchang, have been closed for the present. Later it may be necessary to close these two also.

A cable from Bishop Roots received on February 4, may be summarized as follows:

The Rev. F. J. M. Cotter and family sail from Shanghai for England on February 23.

The Rev. Walworth Tyng and family,
Mr. and Mrs. F. C. Brown,
Miss Mary Dawson,
all of Changsha, have been obliged to leave their station and are now in Wuchang.

Bishops Roots hopes that Mrs. Roots, who is now in this country, may be able to sail for China early in April.

It is evident from the cable, that difficult days are ahead, especially for our educational work.

At its meeting on February 8, the Department of Missions will consider whether or not the schools shall remain open under the conditions imposed by the Cantonese Government at present in control in Central China, or whether it would be better to close them for the present.

Bishop Roots informs us that in order to pay the deficit in operating expenses of the schools from July to February, resulting from the military operations and generally disturbed conditions in Central China, $10,000 will be required.

If the schools continue to operate, it is probable that a deficit of not less than $10,000 will be incurred for the six months, February to August, 1927.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D. Bishop

Woman's Auxiliary Institute.

On January 27 and 28 an Institute for Study Class Leaders was conducted in Roanoke under the auspices of the Diocesan Woman's Auxiliary. Miss Laura F. Boyer, of New York, was the leader, using as a text book, "Beyond City Limits", by the Rev. Frederick Deane Goodwin. Being thoroughly informed on her subject, Miss Boyer was able to present it in a most forceful manner and all who heard her received a very great deal of help and valuable instruction. There were morning and afternoon sessions each day, all of which were held in the parish house of St. John's Church.

Sixteen churches and missions in the Diocese were represented by thirty ladies.

The attendance, while gratifying, would doubtless have been larger, but for the fact that representatives of many other churches in the Diocese, as well as some of the above, took a similar course under Miss Boyer during the session of the Virginia Summer School of Religious Education at Sweet Briar College last summer.

Memorials at Abingdon.

On Sunday, January 16, a number of handsome memorials were set apart at St. Thomas' Church, Abingdon, by the Rev. Beverley M. Boyd, rector. Before setting apart these gifts, which were strictly in the nature of memorials, he referred with appreciation to the generosity of the ladies of Christ Church and St. John's Church in Roanoke, who had given the choir stalls, and Mr. W. E. Mingea, of Abingdon, who had given the pews.

The memorials, which were then dedicated, were:

The pulpit, given by the sons and daughters of Mr. and Mrs. James L. White in memory of their father and mother.

The lectern, given by Mrs. Bessie White Watson, in memory of her mother.

The altar service desk, given by the infant class in the Sunday School.

A mural painting, "The Risen Christ", given by their sons and daughters in memory of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Preston Trigg.

Brass altar vases, provided by a bequest in the will of the late Miss Elizabeth Crawford.

The Bible, given by Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, in memory of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Elliott Roosevelt, who at one time were residents of Abingdon. Mr. Elliott Roosevelt had given the Bible, which was lost in the fire that destroyed St. Thomas' Church in December, 1924.

The altar cross, given by Mrs. Harry Sargent, in memory of her aunt, Mrs. Pocahontas Robertson Trigg.

Brass candlesticks, given by Miss Florence Meek in memory of her two sisters.

The altar, given by Mr. W. E. Mingea in memory of the Rev. Dr. John J. Lloyd, for fourteen years rector of St. Thomas' Church.

The altar service book, given by Mrs. Arthur Lloyd.

Sometimes a fire comes as a blessing in disguise and this seeems to have been true in the case of Arbingdon, for, in place of the frame church which had been in use for many years, the congregation, with the help of friends in many directions, has erected a stone edifice which, enriched by the beautiful memorials above noted, is undoubtedly one of the handsomest small churches in Virginia.

Meeting of The Church Club.

"The Work and Problems of the Rural Church" was discussed by the Church Club, of Philadelphia, an organization of laymen of the Episcopal Church, at its meeting Monday night, February 7, at the Church House. The Rev. George B. Gilbert, of Middletown, Conn., the guest of the evening, presented the subject.

Mr. Gilbert is a pioneer in rural Church work and in the application of Christian social service methods among country populations. He is chairman of the Diocesan Rural Work Committee, and also chairman of the Rural Work Committee of the Connecticut Federation of Churches.

Clerical Brotherhood Speakers.

The speakers at the Clerical Brotherhood meetings at the Church House, Philadelphia, are:

February 7—the Rev. W. C. Emhardt, "European Religions of the Church". Mr. George M. Lamsa, Field Representative of the Archbishop of Canterbury's Assyrian Mission.

February 14—the Rev. J. Cullen Ayer, Jr., Ph. D., "The Sacrament of Marriage".

February 21—Charles Platt, M. D., the President of the National Probation Association, "Probation and Parole".

February 28—The Bishop's Pre-Lenten Day. The Rt. Rev. Julius W. Atwood, D. D., the Rev. James O. S. Huntington, D. D., O. H. C., and others.

Missionary Institute.

The mid-winter Missionary Institute of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese was held at the Mayo Memorial Church House, Richmond, on February 1, 2 and 3. Much good is accomplished by these Institutes, and the growing attendance shows their value to the women of the Church. Classes are conducted on Mission Study for members of the Woman's Auxiliary and Juniors, and classes in Methods and Program Work for the Girls' Friendly Society.

The subject of study this year being Rural Work, one in which the people of the Diocese are greatly interested, separate classes were held, one in the morning for an hour, and a two-hour session in the afternoon. Mrs. Wishart, who taught both classes, is a stimulating teacher, and her text book, "Beyond City Limits", proved very interesting.

Mrs. Davison had classes in Junior work and Mrs. Story, one of the national officers of the Girls' Friendly Society, presented the work of that organization.

Miss Louisa Davis and Miss Sallie Deane conducted Missionary Conferences, and each evening an hour was spent in listening to interesting addresses. On Tuesday the Rev. Dr. James W. Morris, of Brazil, and the Rev. Warren Seager and the Rev. R. A. Magill, of China, were the speakers. Wednesday, the Rev. F. D. Goodwin spoke on Rural Work, and Mrs. Storey on the Girls' Friendly Society; and on Thursday Miss Stubbs and the Rev. F. S. Persons spoke on Mountain Missions.

Bishop Brown closed the meeting on Thursday night with a cordial endorsement of each organization represented.

Young People's Service.

The Young People's Service Leagues of Richmond held a special service in St. Paul's Church on Sunday night, January 30, for all the young people of the city. The service was conducted by Craige Ruffin and O. T. Heinrich, the vice-president and president, respectively, of the Richmond Council. It was a rather unique service in that it was entirely conducted by young laymen, the only ordained minister taking part, being the Rev. Alexander C. Zabriskie, of the Virginia Theological Seminary, who pronounced the benediction. The speakers were W. Brooke Stabler and Ernest V. Stires, both students at the Virginia Seminary. Mrs. Ernest V. Stires, who is the daughter of Madame Louise Homer, sang two anthems. The young people of Richmond responded wonderfully, and it was necessary to turn a large number of them away from the doors.

Reception Tendered the Rev. H. B. W. Peters.

The congregation of the Church of the Epiphany, Richmond, had a reception on Friday, January 28, in honor of the Rev. H. B. W. Peters, who has had charge of the church since his ordination last June. Many expressions of appreciation of Mr. Peters' work were made. Mr. Peters was presented with a gold watch and chain as a token of appreciation; and a silver service and a number of household utensils were given to Mr. and Mrs. Peters.

Mr. Peters, who has been in charge of the Church of the Epiphany during the sick leave of the rector, the Rev. J. H. Gibboney, on February 1, took charge of St. Stephen's Parish, Northumberland County, with residence at Fleeton.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

Self-Denial Offering.

The annual service for the presentation of the self-denial offering of the Order of the Daughters of the King in Washington was held in St. Andrew's Church on Wednesday evening, February 2. The sermon of the occasion was preached by the Rev. J. J. Queally, rector of the Church of the Transfiguration. The self-denial offering of the Daughters, presented annually in Washington, is presented at the time of the General Convention every three years and together with the offerings of the whole order is used for the support of certain missionary women workers of the Church.

Boy Scout Service.

Boy Scouts in uniform, marching in a body to the service at Christ Church, Georgetown, on Sunday morning, February 6, formed an impressive and inspiring picture. They were attended by their leaders and the Scout Committee of the Christ Church troop and immediately followed the processional of the choir. The sermon by the rector, the Rev. E. Pinkney Wroth, was delivered especially to the boys and strong and forceful in thought and delivery, was built upon the text, "Let no man despise Thy youth". The Christ Church Scout Troops have grown splendidly in the last year or so, and though having no official connection with the Church as such, have so cooperated that a splendid feeling between Scouts and people is manifested. The service on Sunday morning was the beginning of the week's celebration of the seventeenth anniversary of the Boy Scout Movement.

Laymen of Epiphany Meet.

The third dinner-meeting of the men of Epiphany Church, under a new plan recently organized, was held Thursday evening, February 3. Mr. William Knowles Cooper, head of the Washington Y. M. C. A., delivered an address on the topic assigned by the Program Committee, "Understanding Youth—Whose Responsibility?" His address built on his personal experience and study of the question of the youth movement, made a strong appeal to the men present. Music was provided by Messrs. Adolf Torovsky and Ambrose Durkin, of Epiphany choir, and the occasion was brought to a close by an address by Dr. Phillips, rector of Epiphany Church.

A two-year program and renewed effort for increasing usefulness as an organization are the special features of the new plan for the meetings of the men of Epiphany.

A service of intercession and healing, under the auspices of the Guild of the Nazarine, was held in St. Mark's Church on Friday evening, February 4, when the rector, the Rev. W. H. Pettus, officiated.

The Council of the Diocesan Pageant and Drama Society of the Diocese has held meetings recently, and is formulating plans for pageantry work during the General Convention in Washington in October, 1928. Members of the council are: the Rev. E. H. Stevens, the Rev. C. P. Parker, Mr. N. W. Dorsey, Mr. Leslie Rucker, Comdr. C. T. Jewell, Mrs. H. G. Torbert, Mrs. Maie Moore Forest, Miss Helen Griffith, Mrs. C. D. Johnson and Mrs. William Channing Johnson.

Church Club Dinner.

At the annual dinner of the Church Club, given in honor of Bishop Manning, facts were given concerning achievements of the Diocese of New York in support of the general program of the Church. In the past year New York has given to the Church at large the sum of $585,000 and, in addition, the Diocese has received from its own communicants $230,000 for Diocesan promotion. New York Diocese is asked by the Church at large for $640,000, and in 1926 it contributed $562,324, making a record better than it ever made before. Of the sum, the parishes and missions gave $525,000, leaving only a small balance to be given by individuals. The fact shows excellent organization and good team work. In 1926 there was a gain of more than $100,000 over the record for 1925. More than one hundred parishes and missions completed their quotas in 1926 as against sixty-four in former years.

At the dinner Bishop Manning came out strongly for a cleaning up of the stage, of literature and magazines, which he said need such cleaning as almost never before. He said the Church, and all Christians are bound to act, and not just talk. Speaking of enforcement of laws, he urged that they be enforced, and that no Christian either break a law himself, or perform any act, or say any word, that may induce or encourage others to break it.

Death of the Rev. James V. Chalmers.

The death of the Rev. James V. Chalmers, long vicar of Holy Trinity Church, a part of St. James' Parish, is of more than local interest. Mr. Chalmers labored for years in behalf of temperance, and against the saloon. He was spared to the ripe age of seventy-nine that he might so contend. He lived to see wonderful changes, and to believe that just as other causes were fought by evil forces, but finally won out, prohibition will do the same. Holy Trinity is on the upper East Side of Manhattan, the Rhinelander Memorial, and formerly saloons were on almost every prominent street corner. He became acquainted with keepers of saloons. He knew his subject, and his influence went far beyond the limits of the New York Diocese, or even of the Church itself.

The Bishops' Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade, which began in this Diocese on January 23, met with overwhelming success from the very beginning and it may be said that the spirit which prevailed throughout the entire mission was one which made the people and clergy feel that they were brought closer to God and left with the desire to fulfill all that they had seen and heard. Truly it was a rededication to the service of Christ and His Kingdom.

The first service was held at Christ Church, Savannah, in the evening. The combined choirs of one hundred and five voices rendered the music which, alone, would lift one up "to higher things". The clergy of the four parishes in the city with the archdeacon of Savannah followed their respective choirs. The Rev. Julius Schaad, rector of Saint Paul's, Augusta, was the preacher. The congregation, composed of all the churches in the city, were present and filled the church to its seating capacity.

On every morning during the week a devotional service, with a celebration of the Holy Communion was held at Christ Church. This service was largely attended by both men and women. Mr. Schaad gave a series of lectures on the "Inner Shrine", which proved interesting and helpful in every respect. The average attendance at this service was two hundred and fifty communicants.

A series of meetings of the women of the parishes were held every afternoon. These meetings were supposed to be group meetings, but the attendance became so great that they were forced to go to a church to seat the people. Mrs. W. J. Loaring Clark, of Sewanee, Tennessee, conducted these meetings and all regretted that she was forced to leave the city before the mission closed.

Mr. Courtney Barbar, of Chicago, Illinois, led several meetings of the men and gave the aids of the mission from a layman's viewpoint. He conducted several meetings of the men in Bible classes, suppers, mass meetings, and private discussion groups.

The Rev. C. C. J. Carpenter, of Grace Church, Waycross, came to Savannah to lead the young people's work. His talks were helpful and interesting and the young people were made to feel that they, too, had an integral part in this great movement.

The last service of the Crusade was held at Christ Church on Sunday morning. There were nine hundred and eighty-seven people in the church and over one hundred and fifty were turned away for lack of room. Mr. Schaad, the Crusader, preached in most fitting manner. Bishop Reese, assisted by four of the clergy, were in the chancel and over seven hundred people communed.

The average attendance a day during the Crusade was over one thousand. But it is not the numerical figures that count, but the renewed devotion which the people of the Church will play in the establishment of God's Kingdom

For The Work of The Church.

Creation of a trust fund, the income from which is to be used for training of young men in the Episcopal ministry and young women in Church work, is provided in the will of Miss Emma Jane Karrar, a devoted Church woman who recently died in Raleigh. Miss Karrar also made bequests to Christ and St. Saviour's Churches in Raleigh, St. Mary's School, St. Luke's Home, Raleigh, and the Church of the Messiah, Mayodan.

Laymen and The Crusade.

Laymen in North Carolina are matching the clergy in their enthusiasm for the objects of the Bishops' Crusade. They will attend the two Diocesan conferences in Raleigh and Charlotte in large numbers. Mr. N. C. Cordon, an influential business man of Winston-Salem, has set the pace for other laymen of the Diocese, devoting much of his time to his work as executive secretary of the department of evangelism.

Laymen of St. Luke's, Spray, and the Church of the Epiphany, Leakesville, had a supper and conference on the Bishops' Crusade in the basement of St. Luke's on February 1. Mr. George Orr, of Winston-Salem, and the Rev. Mark Milne, of Salisbury, were the two chief speakers. Mr. C. B. Beck, a layman of Spray, presided. The Rev. William J. Gordon, rector of these two churches, left on January 22 for a tour of the Holy Land.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Crusaders.

The National Crusaders to West Virginia were Canon Stokes, of Washington, D. C., Bishop H. St. G. Tucker, the Rev. H. G. Lane, of Raleigh, N. C., the Rev. Percy Kammerer, Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, and Mr. Robert Barrett, of Alexandria, Va.

Bishop Strider has been asked by the National Commission on Evangelism to act as Crusader in the Diocese of Easton, the Rev. J. L. Oldham in the Diocese of Lexington, and the Rev. John Gass in the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia.

Students in Seminary: West Virginia has a larger number of students than usual in the Virginia Theological Seminary at Alexandria. There are four enrolled there this year: Edward M. Pennell, Jr., Morgan Alley, George Shirley and Oliver Litter.

The Every Member Canvass has been held in most parishes in the Diocese with gratifying results. The three leaflets —the Presiding Bishop's Parish, the Bishop's Parish and the Rector's Parish—were largely used in many cases as preparatory to the canvass.

Church School Circulating iLbrary: Miss Etta Ambler, the Diocesan Church School Worker, is endeavoring to form a Church School Circulating Library for use of parents and Church School workers in those places where no Sunday-school reference library is available.

Missions Held: Bishop Strider has recently conducted missions in Trinity Church, Shepherdstown and in Parkersburg. The Rev. C. W. Sydnor, St. Luke's Wheeling, conducted a mission in Grace Chruch, Elkins.

Crusade Conferences.

The Bishops' Crusade Conferences, held in Little Rock the week of January 23, were conducted by Bishop Edward Fawcett, of the Diocese of Quincy, and by the Rev. Gordon Reese, of Holy Trinity Church, Vicksburg, Miss.

Bishop Fawcett had the clergy in the morning, and preached at the evening conference. Mr. Reese spoke to the women in the afternoons.

The conferences for the clergy were well attended, in spite of the difficulty of getting about on account of high waters. The evening conferences for the people in general, were very poorly attended. This may be partly accounted for by the very inclement weather, it having rained most of the time.

As some appointed as Crusaders for the Diocese did not come, it was arranged to send the ministers of the parishes into other churches than their own to conduct the Crusade meetings. It is believed that it will work out to great satisfaction.

The Young People.

In the interest of the Crusade, the Young People's Service League had a Diocesan gathering in Little Rock, Saturday and Sunday, February 5 and 6. This was in the nature of a camp. The quarters were in the Cathedral Parish House.

Mrs. Fay Hope, the Field Secretary, and Miss Louise Turley had charge of the girls; and Mr. Gordon Reese had the oversight of the boys.

Dean John P. Williamson will go to St. John's Church, Camden, as the Crusader, representing the Diocesan Committee. He is the new Dean of Trinity Cathedral.

The Rev. M. H. Hankins has charge of Christ Church, Little Rock, until a rector shall be selected. Mr. Hankins was assistant to the Rev. John Boden, late rector for a number of years.

Mrs. John T. Foster, the wife of the rector of Trinity Church, Van Buren, died recently. Mr. Foster is off on a vacation which the vestry urged him to take. Bishop Winchester conducted the funeral services.

Bishop Winchester went to Waco, Texas, for an address to the Church Club of St. Paul's. He accepted an invitation to go to St. Louis for a speech to a gathering of "Evangelical Students". And last week he went to Pine Bluff to speak to the Churchmen of that city.

The Crusade.

The first week of the Bishops' Crusade in Tennessee was conducted in St. John's Church, Knoxville, January 23 to 28, by Bishop Shayler, of Nebraska, and the Rev. Prentice A. Pugh, of Nashville. The local preparation had begun two months earlier, and comprised, in addition to special sermons, a generous newspaper publicity. Thirteen cottage prayer meetings were held in various parts of the city by the rector and two lay readers of St. John's Church. The desired condition of "Prayerful Expectancy" was secured and the result was seen in the large congregations and in the increasing interest manifested from day to day. The total attendance for the six days was 3,712. The Crusaders addressed about 3,000 other persons at the University of Tennessee, the city high school and different luncheon clubs. A profound, and it is believed a permanent impression was made on the congregation, many of whom have started on the service of personal evangelism in addition to a more careful and diligent practice of the inner Christian life.

Twenty-five hundred people attended the opening mass meeting in St. Mary's Cathedral, Memphis, hundreds being turned away.

It is planned to carry the Crusade into every parish and mission in the Diocese.

FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. Juhan, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishops' Crusade.

The intensive period of the Bishops' Crusade closed in the Diocese of Florida on Friday evening, January 21. The Crusade was held in three centers, St. John's Church, Jacksonville; Holy Trinity Church, Gainesville; Christ Church, Pensacola, and St. John's Church, Tallahassee. The National Crusaders assigned by the National Commission, were the Rt. Rev. Henry Judah Mikell, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Atlanta; the Rev. Dennis Whittle, rector of Luray Parish, Virginia, and the Messrs. Bartow Strang, of Chattanooga, and Edward H. Bonsall, of Philadelphia, the President of the National Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The Crusaders began their work in Jacksonville, on Sunday, January 9, and were met with responsive congregations from the first. They expressed themselves as being well pleased with the Diocesan preparation, as made by Bishop Juhan and the Chairman of the Diocesan Commission on Evangelism, the Rev. Charles W. Frazer, the rector of St. Mary's Church, Jacksonville. Bishop Juhan accompanied the visiting Crusaders throughout their visitation to the Diocese.

As is customary, Bishop Mikell preached at the evening mass meetings; he also held daily conference with the prospective Crusaders of Florida. The Rev. Mr. Whittle held conferences with the women, each morning, and with the young people each afternoon, while the laymen held conferences daily with the men of the Church. These conferences were followed by light suppers, so that the men might later attend the mass meetings.

Florida is certain that no stronger team of Crusaders could have been sent to her. Bishop Mikell delivered three powerful and scholarly sermons on the objects of God, Sin and the Church. These will not readily be forgotten by his hearers. Mr. Whittle, a man of deep spirituality and experience, touched his hearers in a different, but in quite as effective a manner, while Mr. Strang, who visited Jacksonville and Gainesville, and Br. Bonsall, who visited Pensacola and Tallahassee, made a profound impression upon the men.

The follow-up work has already begun. A schedule of Crusades has been drawn up by the Diocesan Commission, covering the entire Diocese. Every parish and mission will have Crusaders sent to them between now and the first week in March, and the preaching stations of the Diocese will be covered by Bishop Juhan himself.

The Diocesan Crusades began on Sunday, January 23, when the Rev. Menard Doswell, rector of St. John's Church, Jacksonville; Mrs. Wm. P. Cornell, the Executive Secretary of the Diocese, and Dr. W. D. Jones, also of Jacksonville, went over to Trinity Church, St. Augustine, for a three-day period. The Rev. L. Fitz-James Hindry, the rector of the parish, had made splendid preparations for the Crusaders and the three meetings each day were well attended and met with responsive hearts. Mr. Doswell spoke to the mass meetings and to the young people, Mrs. Cornell to the women, and Dr. Jones to the men.

A number of the clergy, and laymen and women of the Diocese have been chosen for Crusaders and are now being trained for their work. From now on the work will be extended and the results are bound to be a blessing and a power to the Church of Christ.

Gifts To Mission Church.

Bishop Darlington has received from Mrs. Marius de Brabant, of New York City, the sum of five thousand dollars, which he has given to the incorporated trustees for investment for a permanent endowment of St. Gerald's Mission Church and Sunday School, Harrisburg, the income only to be used for the support of the Church. The Church is named for Gerald Clark Kling, the infant son of Mrs. de Brabant, who died some years ago.

Mrs. de Brabant has also given largely and previously to the payment of debts, repairs, and the purchase of church furniture, church ornaments, a processional cross, baptismal font, and altar hangings.

O Lord, we beseech Thee favorably to hear the prayers of Thy people, that we, who are justly punished for our offenses, may be mercifully delivered by Thy goodness for the glory of Thy name, through Jesus Christ Our Saviour, Who liveth and reigneth with Thee and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Release.

Out of myself, Lord!
From the narrowing prison;
The grave-clothes bound on hand and foot and knee,
Up to that life and light where Thou art risen,
Call me, and set me free.

Out of myself, Lord.
From the restless seeking,
The babel of earth's care and fret and loss,
Into the hush where love alone is speaking—
The silence of the cross.

Out of myself, Lord!
From life's tangled story,
The doubts unsolved, the fears unanswered still,
Into the clear white morning of Thy glory,
The peace which is Thy will.

Out of myself, Lord.
What shall yet befall me
I ask no more; enough that Thou art mine.
Turn but Thy face, O Son of God! and call me
To lose my life in Thine.

A Conversion in Tokyo.

The Rev. Y. Sugiura is a Japanese priest, ordained in 1894, whose name is one of the best known to us among Japanese clergy, for his many years of heroic work in the worst of Tokyo's slums. He sends the following little story in his own words:

There is a strange story about the conversion of an old man by the name of C. Sugiura. In his youth, he was brought up in the Nihonbashi fish market, Tokyo, and he grew up a very violent man, under the influence of the people in the market. He was so fond of fighting that he would take part in other's quarrels; and no woman would come near him, so he remained single to the end of his life.

At the time when I started the Good Samaritan Dispensary in the Fukagawa slums, thirty-four years ago, he was an old man of unruly behavior, and lived in the vicinity of the dispensary with his brother, sunk to the lowest stratum of society. His brother was then dying of consumption, and he used to come to us to get medicine for his brother, but he seemed to be entirely indifferent to our religious instruction.

At last his brother died, having been baptized by me on his death bed, and the peaceful and happy state of the brother's departure had made a deep impression upon this rough man. It was a cold winter day, when we buried the departed; and the snow was falling heavily, as he was sitting alone in his home that dreary night; and, according to his account, something occurred which gave him a tremendous shock.

Early the next morning, astonished and frightened, he rushed into the dispensary and said that his brother had come in the middle of the night and said to him in clear voice, "Brother! Brother! It is true that there is a Kingdom of Heaven". He also bade him to take this message to his three friends, "The priest, Mitsutaro and Ryuko". And in the most eager manner, he said to our Bible woman, who answered the door, "I know who the priest is, but who are the other two"? "Ryuko is my name, and Michitaro, not Mitsutaro, is the doctor's, you have misunderstood," was her answer and it had deepened the astonishment of this wild fellow so intensely, that from that day his character was thoroughly changed.

For thirty years, he has been the ideal Christian among my church members, he has kept the Sabbath strictly, conquered his wild temper entirely, loved his enemies in the marvelous manner; he has had no fear of death, always waiting cheerfully for the time when he should be called to Heaven and has astonished his friends many times with this readiness when he has been ill and especially at the time of the great earthquake and fire. At last, last year, at the age of eighty-six, he was called, and he answered the call with marvelous delight and hopefulness.

The "Heroic Gospel".

With the beginning of the New Year the Protestant Episcopal Church will launch a nation wide movement "to reawaken the entire membership of the Church to their Christian obligations". National headquarters will be opened in Washington and meetings and conferences are to be conducted by two hundred leaders of the Church during January and February at strategic points in the country, to urge every member of the Church to renew the pledges made at confirmation. An all-day prayer service was held in many churches November 30 to pray for the success of this movement, which is known as the "Bishops' Crusade", because it originated in the House of Bishops. The members of the Church will be urged to the acceptance of the "heroic Gospel" rather than a "comfortable Gospel".

In announcing the plans for the campaign recently the statement was made that a condition striking at the very fundamentals of the existing social order is threatened by "an age without discipline or self-imposed restraint. . . . License has come to take the place of liberty and the well ordered disciplines of domestic and social life are not only disregarded, but defied".

The commission in charge of the campaign says that the situation which confronts the Christian Church is a serious one: "Its authority is challenged, and the very fundamental things upon which its fabric rests called in question. An age that is filled with speculation and doubt calls for a fresh and persistent affirmation of the great imperatives of our Christian faith." The commission believes that "a futile piety" is responsible for "much of the failure and impotence of the Church". The Church is menaced, it is said, "by a type of Christian practice that lays claim to the refinements and respectability which professed allegiance to the Church affords, but that assumes no obligations to adhere to the high claims of an active, articulate faith".

The situation so courageously defined as existing in the Protestant Episcopal Church is found in practically all other denominations, and the call of the Bishops may well be heeded throughout every denomination. The beginning of the new year offers an excellent opportunity for earnest prayer that the Church may appreciate its responsibilities and be aroused to the accomplishments of its God-given task. The week of prayer in all the Churches with which each new year is usually opened may well be used as an occasion for calling Christian people to repentance, prayer, faith and more consecrated efforts.—Christian Observer (Presbyterian).

For the Southern Churchman.

For a Day.

Julia W. Cockcroft.

If those whom I love
Were the sands on the shore,
And I were the wind,
For a day blowing o'er,
I'd ask not to brush
Each separate grain apart
And hold it prisoner
Of my imperfect strength—
For my heart in every atom finds
Response, or need so great,
I would wish to blow the fairest wind
For all—the whole inviolate,
Just one, strong puff to reach—
The shore's entire length.

If those whom I love
Were the waves of the sea,
And I were the sun,
With but one day to be,
I'd ask not to tinge
Each passing wave and hour
With faulty color of
My personality—
But for power to dart so poignantly
One vivid, perfect ray,
As to leave my well-beloved no grief,
Nor painful thought of dying day,
But of Eternal Life,
Instead—the Certainty.

If Thine Eye Be Double.

When the Rev. Mr. Vincent entered the inner office of the great eye specialist, who was one of his parishioners, he found the table covered with great books, lying open. There were Bible commentaries, a Greek dictionary, an English Bible, and an interlinear Greek and English Testament. The minister noticed that the Bible and Testament were open at the Gospel of St. Luke.

"Doctor Holman consulting Doctor Luke, eh?" said the minister. "I am glad to know one scientific man who thinks his Bible an up-to-date authority."

"Well," replied the surgeon, "that was just what I was trying to find out; of Doctor Luke was up-to-date. I have a most interesting case of double vision, and I have been reading up to see if by any mistake the translators have not given the correct interpretation of Luke's words; but poneros is 'evil' and skoteinon is 'darkness'. Did nature's provision of duplex machinery—two eyes, two ears, two arms, and so forth —ever appeal to you?" asked the surgeon, abruptly, looking eagerly at the minister; he was full of enthusiasm. "It is a wise provision; for in case of an accident to one there is a second to fall back on. But what if the two systems are functioning at the same time independently, with different reports to the brain?

"That is what is happening to my patient," continued the surgeon. "Both his eyes are good, and each makes its own report. In trying to read, the man sees both pages of his book, or newspaper, at the same time. On going down street, he always sees two places in which to put his feet and, like the man trying to sit on two stools, he often falls to the ground. A blind man walks better and more surely than he does. If we pluck out one eye, as the Bible enjoins (if we could only find which is the 'evil' eye!), the man would be helped; but it would be a grievous thing to destroy a perfectly good eye and upset the wise provision of nature."

"But is that all you can do?" asked the minister, with keen interest.

"We are trying other things first," said the surgeon. "We are trying to see what will power the man has over his eye-muscles and are helping him with lenses. We can operate on the muscles of the eye, but that is a ticklish job, and may not help after all—Christ knew what He was talking about. To the multitudes of men nature has been very good; the cases of double vision are very rare. But in morals the Psalmist seems to be near the truth. If all men are not born in sin, they seem to be born with double vision anyway. Good and evil are tremendously mixed up. Life, for most men, is a blur and a confusion. With one eye they see God, with the other they see Mammon; one hand reaches for the promises, the other for the wages of sin. Result: confusion always. When the focus is single, then the man gets somewhere.

"So you see," added the surgeon, "I have been trying to find out if Doctor Luke and the Divine Physician had such a case as mine before them and that the words should read something like this: If thine eye-sight be double, thy whole body will be filled with confusion."

"That is a pretty good interpretation," declared the minister, deeply interested.

"It is what nature reveals in my patient," said the surgeon. "I have studied Matthew's version of the Master's word, and he has a clear perception of double vision. No man can serve two masters, God and Mammon as the double vision calls him to. He cannot walk two ways at once, the Gentile road and the highway of the Kingdom. So I was looking up Luke to see if he had the correct diagnosis of the physiological conditions as well as the spiritual significance."

Injudicious Praise.

Mrs. Lee was visiting the studio where her five-year-old daughter, Virginia, was beginning the study of instrumental music. Virginia had been asked to join in some simple little songs and had done very well.

"Oh, what a lovely voice you have, Virginia; you can certainly sing," gushed Mrs. Fields, the owner and conductor the studio.

"Isn't she fine? She ought to have little lessons in vocal work," raved Faye, Mrs. Fields' grown sister.

Virginia twisted with pleasure and complacency and remarked, "Yes, I think I do sing real well."

"Of course you do," agreed the ladies.

The thoughtful mother took her little daughter out of the studio as soon as possible. On the way home, Virginia asked if she had heard what had been said. To this the mother responded: "Yes, I think it so nice of them to say such kind things about my little girl. Of course you know, dear, they wanted to make us feel happy so they were extra generous."

The child was thoughtful for a few minutes and then said, "Well, I do think I can sing better than any of the other children around here. Mother, don't you think I should begin to take vocal and dancing lessons?"

"No, indeed, dear; not for quite a while."

"But, Mother, Faye said I was a born dancer and Mrs. Fields told me I was the most graceful child in her classes, unless it is Dena, and, Mother, I can do better than she can even if she does feel so smart and big."

"Listen, dear, Mother will tell you when she wants you to do those extra things, so let us not worry any more about them."

After a short silence: "Mother, Faye thinks I won't ever amount to anything the way you are raising me."

The mother was absolutely nonplussed for a few moments. She felt really more than vexed that a child so young should have been exposed in this way, especially since she had had to help Virginia constantly because of a natural tendency to think too highly of herself and her ability. She was sorry to see the unaccustomed frown of irritation on the young face and wondered how Mrs. Fields, herself a mother, could take such an attitude toward a child or permit her sister to do so. "Does Mrs. Fields carefully consider and weigh all her actions and those of her children as I do?" she questioned. "We were both students of Child Psychology, yet I cannot see that she applies any of her knowledge either in training her own children or in dealing with mine." But she pushed the annoying thoughts quickly and resolutely aside, and looking down tenderly at her little daughter, she asked, "And what does Virginia think?"

It was the child's turn to be nonplussed. Then meeting her mother's loving gaze, a new spirit of loyalty was born.

"I'd rather have you for my mother," was her somewhat irrelevant reply.—Lenora Bailey.

Home Appreciation.

How often do we look far away in appreciation of things that we have at home? A priest from California was recently a guest at the table of a friend in Ireland and expressed his appreciation of the bacon served at the breakfast table, when he was surprised at the reply of his friend, who said, "This bacon you are eating is from Minneapolis, and I am just trying it out", People are rushing off to Europe in search of many things that they find closer at home. They may go wild over the Alps when they have never seen or dreamed of the grander scenery in the Rockies. People in the village think they must hear city preachers when they may have just as good ones in their own pulpits. And the preacher may think he must get into a city pulpit to do his best, when he has plenty of opportunity and urgency to put out the best that is in him where he is. Presbyterian Banner.

My vines and flowers have ceased to bloom:
Enveloped in the air of gloom,
Their twigs and branches are quite bare —
Naked, they stand shivering there!

Not a sign of life they show—

Yet, beneath the icy sod,
Moves the silent hand of God.

Hosts of a King.

We cannot give lodging and entertainment to such personage as Christ is without it being seen by others. He is not an ordinary visitor; and though no state ceremonies accompany Him, there is that about His whole customs which arrests attention. We may have occasional visitors whose amiable dispositions and influences refine and improve us; but they cannot do for us what Christ does. They cannot, by their own strength and love, confer on us spiritual blessings. His company is the best; it not only makes time pass pleasantly, but it makes us ready for eternity. His songs not only make the heart merry, but they make it new. Now this connot be, and nothing of it seen or known outside. We soon tell upon ourselves; we soon let out the secret, and it is then "noised abroad" that we have Him beneath our roof-tree. Oh, happy is that house in which He lodges.—John Macfarlane.

Ruskin says the Psalter contains, in the first half of it, the sum of personal and social wisdom. The first, eighth, twelfth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, nineteenth, twenty-third and twenty-fourth Psalms well learned and believed are enough for all personal guidance; the forty-eighth, seventy-second, and seventy-fifth have in them the law and the prophecy of all righteous government; and every real triumph of natural science is anticipated in the one hundred and fourth. Take your Bible and examine these Psalms with this thought to guide you. The study will well repay you.

"We are laborers together with God" (1 Cor. 3:9). "The need of the hour is not for more men and women who are anxious to do some great thing, but for more men to keep their eyes open for chances to do little things. Every community has in it those who are doing nothing simply because 'the big chance' has not come their way. They need to take to heart the words of a distinguished man: 'The chance for heroic endeavor of a spectacular kind does not often come. The man who really counts in this life is not the man who thinks how well he could do some bit of heroism if the chance arose, but the man who actually does the humdrum, work-a-day, every-day duties as these duties arise and when "the big chance" comes, the worker most apt to take advantage of it is not the one who professed to be waiting for it, but one of the persons who has been content to do small things well'."—J. T. Farris.

For the Young Folks

Consider.

Consider
The lilies of the field, whose bloom is brief:
We are as they;
Like them fade away,
As doth a leaf.

Consider
The sparrows of the air, of small account:
Our God doth view
Whether they fall or mount—
He guards us, too.

Consider
The lilies that do neither spin nor toil,
Yet are most fair—
What profit all this care
And all this toil?

Consider
The birds that have no barn nor harvest weeks;
God gives them food—
Much more our Father seeks
To do us good.

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

The Friends of Jesus.

M. L. G.

There is a saying that a man is known by the company he keeps. The enemies of Jesus were only too glad to fling at Him the taunt that He was the Friend of sinners. Yes, He received them and ate with them. Matthew and Zaccheus, despised publicans, were His hosts. The common people heard Him gladly; a few rough fishermen became His close companions. For our Best Friend was not "exclusive". No! the charge hissed at Him by scornful Pharisee and cold scribe was true. He did receive sinners, and He does. What hope would we have, any of us, but that He receives sinners still?

But there were some among His acquaintances who came nearer than others to the mind and heart of their Lord. John, to whom He could entrust His Mother; the unnamed friend who made Him welcome to his house for the Passover supper; the household at Bethany; Mary Magdalene, whose eyes first saw Him risen; Peter, who most deeply knew the joy of sin forgiven.

Do you want to be His friend, as He is yours? Then hear His words, and take them into your heart. "Ye are my friends," He said, "if ye do whatsoever I command you." And how lovely are His commands! "Come unto Me," "Learn of Me," "Watch and pray," "Love one another," "Go ye into all the world."

Ponder these in your hearts, children, while you are young, that you may earn the joy of serving Him, and of hearing His voice in your heart saying, 'I have called you friend".

Make the Most of Yourself.

Henry M. Stanley, reared in an almshouse and handicapped by poverty and friendlessness, is the one who gives his generation its knowledge of Africa. James Watt, sick and starving on eight shillings a week, crying at last in utter despair, "Of all foolish things, nothing is so foolish as trying to be an inventor", is the one who gives the world the steam engine, and inaugurates a new era in human progress. Louis Pasteur, crippled at forty-six by a paralytic stroke, and hampered for the rest of his life by that cruel limitation, is the one who gives humanity its knowledge of germ-life and begins the development of modern medicine. Booker Washington, born in slavery and so poor that he had to crawl under a boardwalk in Richmond for shelter at night on his long tramp to Hampton Institute, is the one who finally lays the foundation for the education of his race. Here are men through whom God achieved His purposes for mankind. Every one of them was surrounded by inexorable chariots of iron, yet see how much God made them mean to the world.

You are disheartened this morning? You think that a young man with your handicaps can never amount to anything? Pluck up courage! Live at your best! No one can guess how much God can do for the world through you if you will only make the most of yourself for Him.—James Gordon Gilkey, in the Record of Christian Work.

The Heart of the Sixth Grade.

It really was too bad that Dorothy Lane should have the mumps just when the sixth grade, in which she was a pupil, was planning to have a Valentine festival for Friday afternoon, and Dorothy was to have been queen of hearts. Dorothy cried hot tears upon her pillow as she thought of her lovely pink tarleton dress with its many tiny red hearts and sparkling beads. All vanity was shut up in the closet. The tears came faster as she thought of the crown resplendent with tinfoil and the dainty silver slippers that had been her last summer's white kid ones covered with silver paint. She cried some more when she thought of the tiny heart-shaped spice tarts that Ella had been going to make for her.

At school things were almost as gloomy. When all the boys and girls were in, Miss Allen announced Mrs. Lane's message that Dorothy was ill with mumps and that she would have to be out of school at least ten days. Sighs of regret came from all over the room. What would the festival be without the queen? All that Thursday morning the sixth grade looked at Dorothy's empty desk. Just before Miss Allen dismissed the room for lunch she said: "How many boys and girls want to take a Valentine surprise to Dorothy?" Every one did, because every one liked Dorothy. "All right," said Miss Allen, "come back early from lunch, and we'll see what we can do."

When Johnny and Martin got back Miss Allen had everything ready: scissors, paste, red cardboard, red and white tissue and red crepe paper, and before any one else came they cut out two big hearts from the red cardboard. Miss Allen then took a strip of red cardboard about six inches high and used it for the sides of a box, the top and bottom of which were two big hearts. Johnny cut part of the crepe paper into narrow strips, and other comers fluted the edges. This was fastened around the edge of the top heart with paper braids. The box was just finished when the bell rang. Every one was excited, but each studied hard and recited well. When recess came Roger Thompson took a small brush and dipped it into Miss Allen's white ink. On the lid of the box he painted, "The Heart of the Sixth Grade".

Sarah, Annie, Ruth and Lois went to the corner store and spent their pennies for peppermint motto hearts to go into the box.

The next morning members of the sixth grade came to school early. Each had something in his hand. There were eager whisperings in the halls just as if a secret was being kept. At 8:30 Roger, Martin and Johnny left the building with a great white tissue-covered package. They hurried to the Lane home, set the package on the porch, rang the bell and ran.

Mrs. Lane carried the box in. She was pleased to notice that it was addressed to Dorothy, because Dorothy was weeping, and her fever was rising. And diversion would be welcome.

"Oh! oh!" cried Dorothy when her mother appeared at the door.

Mrs. Lane carried the big box over to the bed and took off the wrappings. "Why, here is a note! Perhaps you'd better read it before you open the box," she said, handing it to Dorothy. And this is what Dorothy read:

"Dear Dorothy: We are all very disappointed because you cannot come to school for a few days and that you cannot come to the festival. We have decided not to have it today because you can't come. All the valentines we had planned, with a few small gifts to you, are in this heart, a heart full of love to you.

"There is a ribbon tied to each article, and the ribbons are numbered. Pull one every hour today, but after today pull only one after each dose of medicine you have to take.

"To our queen from her loyal subjects from the sixth grade.

"P. S.—We are going to use our half holiday at Miss Allen's this afternoon. She asked us to a candy pull."

Dorothy cried and laughed together. It was nice to be remembered, though she didn't feel that she deserved so much remembering.

Mrs. Lane was thinking, too. "Dear," she said, "how would you like for Ella to make the tarts we had planned and send them to school this morning at recess?"

"I'd like it ever so much, but," and her face clouded, "she wouldn't have time, would she, mother?"

"Perhaps not," replied Mrs. Lane, "if she were to begin now; but I think Ella was up extra early this morning to make tarts for the subjects of a dear little queen I know, and I imagine every one is done now, lying on the pantry shelf cooling. It's nine o'clock now. You may pull a ribbon, and I will go see if the tarts are almost ready."

Dorothy pulled the ribbon numbered one, and out came the softest wool bedtime dolly, white yarn with big black button eyes. In his hand he carried a red heart on which was written: "I came from your friend across the aisle, Annie Ruth Simmons". Dorothy squealed with delight, and soon she snuggled down in her bed happily to wonder what would come out when the other ribbons were pulled.

At ten Mrs. Lane, dressed for the street, came to the door to tell Dorothy that she was going up to the schoolhouse with the basket of tarts. Recess was at 10:15, and she'd have to hurry.

"Give them to Roger Thompson, mother; he's king of hearts," Dorothy called, and then she reached over to pull the second ribbons. This one brought a gorgeous valentine of lace and ribbon from Roger Thompson, king of hearts.

All day long Dorothy enjoyed her box. Every hour there was something new to think about. She didn't care to cry any more and, strange to say, she didn't have quite as much fever in the evening. Once in the afternoon she went to sleep and almost missed the time for pulling the next ribbon, but she didn't quite; and when she pulled against something hard and heavy, she finished waking up with a bounce. The hard object proved to a bottle of grape juice dressed in red and silver ribbons sent by Paula and Selma Branch, whose father kept a drug store.

Three evenings later, when Mr. and Mrs. Lane were in her room for a little while together before bedtime, Dorothy said: "Mother and daddy, I know what I'm going to do when I get through with having mumps. I am going to fill up several boxes—joy boxes I'll call them—for people who are sick or hurt. Maybe they will help some one forget a hurt and be happier for a while."

And Mr. Lane replied: "A fine idea, Dorothy. Perhaps your mother and I can help."—Nashville Christian Advocate.

The Valentine Dick Made.

A sheet of paper first he took
And nicked the edges round it,
Printed large, "My Valentine",
And thought how fine it sounded.

And then he drew a gallant ship,
With one big star to guide it,
Finished with two plump red hearts,
And wrote this verse inside it:

"I made this all my very self;
And such a lot of bother
I wouldn't take for any one
Only 'cept my mother."

Mabel Fairweather.

Spring and the Robin's Song.

Up above, in the garden, the ground was still cold and hard, and covered with a white blanket everywhere, except in one or two places where the warmth of the sun had softened it. Nowhere could you see a sign of all the flowers that had once made the garden so beautiful. You wouldn't dream to look about you that they were anywhere near.

But if you could have peeped down beneath that blanket of snow, just a little way. My! what a commotion you would have found. All the Crocus youngsters, and the Snowdrops were pushing and jostling each other; their parents couldn't do a thing with them. You see, they wanted to peep out above. They wished to put on their new white and gold and purple Easter hats and gowns and their green coats, and come out into the bright sunshine. They were so tired of the dark bed where they had rested all the winter.

Mother Crocus and Auntie Pearl Snowdrop and the other relatives could not understand why they were in such a hurry, and told them that Jack Frost would nip them if they ventured up too soon.

The older flowers stood anxiously about, and watched the youngsters scuffle and jostle, and then another and another, and they were very near the top.

All at once Kitty Windflower cried out:

"Good-by!! I'm going! I'm sure I heard a robin sing!"

"Oh, wait, silly children," cried Mother Crocus. "It's cold up above. You must wait till you really hear a robin sing."

"Let us go! Don't hold us back! We'll push up, and soon we'll be on top, and then we'll look so beautiful, with our new hats and gowns," said Yellow Crocus. "Lilly Snowdrop, stop crowding so! I'm going first."

"Why, where's Kitty Windflower?" asked Mother Crocus. The flowers looked for her, but no one could see her.

"She must have gone above into the garden," said Goldie Daffodil. "Perhaps she really heard a robin sing. Maybe we had all better go. Push up carefully, all of you. Just your little pointed caps above the ground. If it is cold and icy, stay back and don't go any further. But listen until you hear a robin sing."

So all the flowers pushed up very carefully till they had made little openings where they could peep out. And they looked and listened, and the first thing they heard was a breeze blowing out of the south, and it blew a robin's song right their way. And there, in the garden, sat Kitty Windflower in a pretty lavender gown, with her furs all rolled back.

Then they knew that Earth's housecleaning was done, and the garden ready for them. So they all unwrapped their coats, and stood about in bright new gowns of white and purple and gold.

There were robins singing in the trees, and the south wind was blowing. A little girl at her window clapped her hands and said, "Oh, look and listen! The flowers are out and the robins are singing. Spring has come at last!"—Exchange.

El Mucam and El Gamu.

Louis Tucker.

Once upon a time, in the very early ages, there lived in the heart of the weary waste which is the driest desert in the middle of sandy Arabia, the only two camels in all the world. They had fleshy tails, like Bactrian sheep; but otherwise they were beautiful and graceful animals, like enormous short-necked sweet-tempered antelopes. One of them was named El Mucam and the other was named El Camu; and they lived all over the dusty desert, eating the tops of the thorn-bushes and drinking once a week at the Oasis of the Twin Palms in the middle of the Weary Waste. Then, one day.

El Mucam said to El Camu,
"I can run faster than you do".
And El Camu said to El Mucam,
"I can run faster than you can".

and so they ran and they ran and neither one got ahead of the other. They ran till they wore the hard hoofs off their feet and the soft flesh split in two and got paddy and lumpy at the bottoms. Every time they jumped they humped themselves into a hump and straightened out again, and every time they humped themselves they stretched their necks to get ahead of each other. They ran and they ran till their necks got long and wobbly; and, of course, the extra stuff had to come from somewhere, so their tails grew shorter and very thin, like rope.

They ran and they ran, all around the Weary Waste and back again, till they came to the Oasis of the Twin Palms; and there they bumped their noses against the palm trees at the same moment, just in the middle of a jump; so that they split their noses and warped their legs and ruined their tempers and had no time to unhump themselves, but fell down insensible and lay there until they came to. And so they got up again just plain ordinary camels, and their children have been quarreling ever since about who won the race.

The Ideal Parish Field.

Modern ideals can be found in other than modern writing.

"There was a thoroughly religious man, a parish priest, who was rich in holy thought and work. He was, moreover, a learned man, a scholar, who wished to preach Christ's gospel truly, and devoutly to teach his parishioners. He was benignant and exceedingly diligent, and very patient in adversity; and such he was proved many times. He was very loath to excommunicate any for failure to pay their tithes; he would rather give to his poor parishioners part of their voluntary contributions and of his own regular income. A very little was sufficiency for him.

"His parish was large, and the houses were far apart; but never did he leave off visiting, when they were sick or in trouble, the furthest in his parish, the great and the lowly, going on foot, with a staff in his hand. This noble example to his sheep he gave, that first he did things and then he taught. The words he picked up in the gospel; and this figure of speech he added to it, that if gold rust, what shall iron do? For if a priest be wicked, in whom we trust, it is no wonder if an ignorant man go astray. It is a shame, too, if a priest think of it, to find a filthy shepherd and a clean sheep. A priest ought indeed to give example by his cleanness how his sheep should live. He did not leave his parish duties to be performed by a hireling, and his sheep encumbered in the mire, while he ran off to Saint Paul's in London to get an endowed position for himself, or to become a member of a brotherhood. But he dwelt at home, and took good care of the fold, so that the wolf never made trouble in it; he was a shepherd and not a hireling.

"Although he himself was holy and virtuous, he was not harsh with sinful men, nor in his speech forbidding discreet and considerate. To draw people to heaven by fair living and by good example—this was his business; but if any one was obstinate, whether he was of high or low estate, that one he would reprove sharply. A better priest I do not believe there is anywhere. He did not look for display or honor, and he did not work up an over-scrupulous conscience; but the teaching of Christ and His twelve apostles he taught, first following it himself."—Canterbury Tales.

If we work upon marble, it will perish; if we work upon brass, Time will efface it; if we rear temples, they will crumble into dust; but if we work upon immortal souls, if we imbue them with principles, with the just fear of God and love of fellowmen, we engrave on these tablets something which will brighten all Eternity.—Webster.

Deaths

JOHNS: Died suddenly at her home in Washington, D. C., on January 2, 1927, HELEN LANE JOHNS, widow of the Rev. Arthur S. Johns, aged seventy-six. She leaves a son and daughter.

YOUNG: Entered into eternal rest at her home in City Point, Virginia, December 31, 1926, ANNE ROBINSON YOUNG, widow of the late Nathaniel Francis Young, and daughter of the late Nathaniel Peyton and Virginia Carroll Young.

"Her children rise up and call her blessed."

REV. JOHN RICHARD JOYNER.

On January 30, 1927, at his home, 4728 Park Heights Avenue, Baltimore, Md., there passed the spirit of the REVEREND JOHN RICHARD JOYNER, in the eighty-fourth year of his age.

Born in Pitt County, North Carolina, he left the University of North Carolina in 1862 to enlist in the C. S. A. and was paroled at Appomattox April 9, 1865.

Having completed the course at the General Theological Seminary in New York, he was ordained deacon in 1868 and priest in 1872, by the Rt. Rev. Thomas Atkinson, D. D., Bishop of North Carolina.

After an active ministry of thirty-five years, he was retired in the Diocese of Maryland, where he spent the remaining years of his life.

Interment was in the churchyard of Zion Church, Charles Town, W. Va., the Rev. Mr. Mitchell officiating.

IN MEMORIAM.

On the thirtieth day of January the REVEREND JOHN RICHARD JOYNER was transplanted. His long years of invalidism were borne cheerfully, and without a murmur; wherever he had been in active service, even for a few months, the radiance of his life was held as a power for good, never to be forgotten. He read enough to keep up with current progress in science and the Church periodicals were absorbed with keen discrimination. Mr. Joyner's end was not really an end of his usefulness, for many will take heart from his example and continue to press forward to the goal of lofty character.

MRS. MANN S. VALENTINE.

In answer to the call of her Master on the morning of January 8, the soul of SALLY CARY FINCH, beloved wife of Mann S. Valentine, Jr., entered into the gates of Everlasting Life. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me, my brethren." Sally Cary Valentine must have had these words engraved upon her heart, for throughout her life she was constantly seeking those who needed love and kindness. Endowed by nature with a buoyant, joyous spirit, she gave of herself to all the sick and suffering she found along life's journey. Knowing of sorrow or illness, she was never satisfied until she had procured needed assistance for the sufferer. She was over-mindful of the work of the Church in Powhatan, her native county, and many of its members shall rise up and call her blessed. A lover of flowers and one who received from them an uplift of spirit and a keen enjoyment of their beauty, her sympathetic heart could not rest contentedly until at Christmas time her own plants and flowers were shared with those in the hospitals for less fortunate ones.

Out of the depths of our own lonely hearts, we join the Angelic host of their song, "Well done thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord".

IN MEMORIAM.

Major Allen P. Howison.

"He who giveth unto the poor, lendeth unto the Lord."

"Kind hearts are more than coronets, and simple faith than Norman blood."

MAJOR ALLEN P. HOWISON, of Randolph, Alabama, died at his home, in Bibb County, on January 18, 1927. Interred at San Francisco, January 29.

He was born June 10, 1848, at "Epsom", near Manassas, in Prince William County, Virginia. He was the younger son of James Howison and Amanda Farrow, in both lines descended from the stauchest Scottish families. With his brother, Capt. J. B. Howison, and sisters, Misses Emma and Elizabeth, he spent a happy childhood with their parents, at "Epsom", famous for its hospitality and horses.

As a skilled rider, he did scout work for the Confederates around Manassas, Brentsville, and Nokesville, being taken prisoner and kept until near the end of the Civil War. His youth, and unfailing courtliness won friends even there and he escaped in a dead man's clothes.

His beautiful devotion to his parents and sisters, after the war, was typical of his kindliness in after life. In his work in reconstruction days, his life in California, his service on the Texas Border, his business interests in Alabama, and other states, he showed the same masterly characteristics of a thinker and leader, a knight in the business crusades of his world.

Many a needy worker or broken-hearted mother found in the virile acts of this dominant mind "an hour of justice worth a thousand years of prayer". He served The Confederate Memories on General Jackson's staff, while associated with his brother, Captain Howison, at Gallatin, Tennessee. His sisters in Alabama found in him a bulwark of bachelor strength and consideration. His charities were endless. His example, energy, dignity, and honesty were priceless in influence to the community, many people crediting their success to the guidance of their beloved friend and adviser, "Major", for in their lives there was but one. Lawyers, bankers, and friends gathered to pay a last tribute, and gray-haired men and women clung with tender hands to his sorrowing relatives, fearful at losing the last tie to his fatherly interest and unbounded courage.

His Church ties found expression in his open confession of faith, the uprightness of his life, his defence of the defenceless, his mercy towards his enemies, and his loyalty towards his friends, and his charities. His idealism of these ties centered around one lifetime friendship ever worthy of a trust, Bishop John Gardner Murray. His father's tomb at Howison Cemetery, near Manassas, bears this inscription, "A good name is better than great riches".

He asked but one tribute with true American simplicity, not in keeping with the Howisons who wrote "The History of Virginia", or "The Limits of Evolution" for California, not in keeping with his sister's tribute to "Manassas' Dead" in song and story, but just this bare truth —"He did the best he could". His sister, Mrs. E. H. Kyser, was buried at Effingham a year ago, in September, 1926. She is survived by these relatives: Dr. J. A. Kyser, Miss M. H. Kyser and Miss Alice Kyser, of Minter, Ala. Also his brother's family, Mrs. Wemyss, of Tennessee; Mrs. W. J. White, of Miami, and his brother's sons, Messrs. Henry, Charles and Allen Howison, of Visalia, California. May the Howison coat of arms always bear witness to the name, the "Highlanders", defending the defenceless; the "lilies", for their purity, on their blue field of truth; the upright hand for their honesty; and the "Crimson Heart" this motto, "Sursum Corda", "Hearts Upright".

made arrangements to purchase a plot of ground, fifty by one hundred and fifty feet, in the rear of St. James' Church, Enola, to complete the plot of the former high school there. The church is a memorial to his father, Henry F. Shoemaker, and his brother, William Brock Shoemaker. The church building has recently been repaired in its roof and thoroughly repainted in two shades of gray, and the whole debt of $6,500, which was on the property, was paid the past year. Mr. and Mrs. William H. Irwin, of Enola, with forethought kindly purchased the rear lot and held it until such time as the Church was able to purchase it. Regular Sunday evening services are held by the Rev. Richard B. Doherty.

The Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade was held the week of January 23, the "center" for the week being St. John's Church, Decatur, the Rev. S. A. Macdonell, rector. Here the Rev. McV. Harrison held helpful meditations, giving addresses and preaching sermons as well as having celebrations of the Holy Communion. In preparing for the Crusade in this Diocese, the local committee took into consideration the location of the various parishes and missions. It was found that the only practicable way to reach many people would be to take the Crusade to them, rather than to expect the people to come in any great numbers to the "center". So, to carry this plan out, while all the people were urged to go to Decatur, other services were held in various parishes and missions, and these were all ministered to by the Rev. Thomas F. Opie, D. D., Crusader from the Diocese of North Carolina. Dr. Opie's words and Mr. Harrison's reached many people and in not a few instances, definite decisions to reconsecrate their lives to God, were made by the people. Both Crusaders appeared at Decatur on "All Parish Day", which was Wednesday, and throughout the day there were to be found at the church a goodly number of people from parishes and missions in the northern half of the Diocese. Mr. Harrison's work with the children seemed to be especially fruitful of results. On the opening day of the Crusade Mr. Harrison was at Decatur, while Dr. Opie spoke to the congregations of the four churches in Springfield city.

Sunday, January 30, the Crusade moved to the southern end of the Diocese, with East St. Louis as the "center", and the Crusader, the Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, D. D., of Spartanburg, S. C.

The Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Dean of the Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Virginia, is rapidly improving from a long illness, and is spending a few weeks in Orlando, Florida.

The Rev. J. H. A. Bomberger, formerly assistant in Epiphany Church, Washington, D. C., took charge of St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, W. Va., on the first Sunday in February. His address is 13 Walnut Avenue, Woodlawn, Wheeling, W. Va.

The Rev. J. H. Gibboney, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, Richmond, Virginia, after a year's leave of absence on account of ill health, returned to his work on February 1, greatly improved in health.

The Rev. William E. Glanville, Ph. D., non-parochial priest of Maryland, entered upon his work as rector of Sion and Lingamore Parishes, Howard County, Maryland, on January 22.

The Rev. William H. Aulenbach, formerly vicar of St. Andrew's Church, Philadelphia, Pa., has accepted a call to be assistant at St. Pul's Church, Flint, Mich.

The Rev. Jackson L. Cole, has resigned as rector of St. Matthew's Church, Enosburg Falls, Vt., and should now be addressed Theological Seminary of Virginia, Alexandria, Va.

The Rev. W. J. Page, has resigned as rector of Holy Apostles' Church, St. Clair, Pa., and after May 1, may be addressed at Charlottesville, Va.

At a recent meeting of the Board of Trustees of the University of Richmond, Richmond, Virginia, it was decided to confer the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity upon the Rev. R. Cary Montague, City Missionary of Richmond. The degree will be conferred at the annual commencement of the University in Richmond.

ORDINATIONS.

At the Theological Seminary of Virginia, Alexandria, Sunday, January 30, the fourth Sunday after Epiphany, the Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop of Southern Virginia, ordained to the Diaconate Watkins Leigh Ribble. The Rev. W. E. Rollins, D. D., presented the candidate, and Dr. Thomas K. Nelson preached the sermon.

Mr. Ribble has offered for missionary work in Brazil, where his father, the Rev. Wallace G. Ribble, served for many years.

On Sunday, December 19, in Trinity Church, Monrovia, Liberia, the Bishop of the District ordained to the diaconate J. D. K. Baker and Joseph T. Weaver, and advanced to the priesthood the Rev. W. D. Jones. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Joseph F. Dunbar, D. D., rector of Grace Church, Clay Ashland. The candidates were presented by the Rev. G. W. Gibson, D. D., of Trinity Church, Monrovia. The Rev. D. S. G. Priddy, rector of Christ Church, Crozierville, read the litany, and various others of the local clergy attended and took part in the service. The new deacons have been assigned to Trinity Church, Monrovia, while the Rev. Mr. Jones will be vicar of St. Michael's, Gbaigbon, and priest in charge of St. Paul's, Royesville.

DEATHS.

On the eve of his retirement, on the night before his successor was to be instituted, the Rev. Theodore Clinton Foote, Ph. D., rector of St. David's Church, Roland Park, died at his home in Baltimore, January 22. He had been ill with an affection of the heart since October 25.

The funeral service was held at St. David's Church, January 24 by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Murray, Bishop of the Diocese, assisted by the Rt. Rev. Dr. Helfenstein, Bishop Coadjutor, the Rev. S. Tagart Steele, newly instituted rector, and the Rev. Dr. Wyllys Rede. Members of the junior vestry were active pall-bearers, and members of the senior vestry honorary pall-bearers. Interment was in Druid Hill Cemetery.

Confidence in God.

God is not only directing history to an end which He contemplates, and which will be the explanation and justification of His slow and sometimes hard dealings with us now, He is altering the very nature of man's experience. This is to be borne in mind. History is not the gradual unfolding of the implications of natural life; the future is not to be measured by the powers and forces implicit in the world at the present moment. God is at work upon the world. The hope of men lies in Him. The world is spiritually controlled. He can give us power of which we had not reckoned. He can bring new factors to bear upon our situation, and discover to us forces which we did not know. Such a new factor was Christ Himself. The essential difference between Christian hopefulness and ordinary optimism is that Christian hope can give an adequate account of itself. It believes from its experience of what God has done that He can do still more. --Exchange.

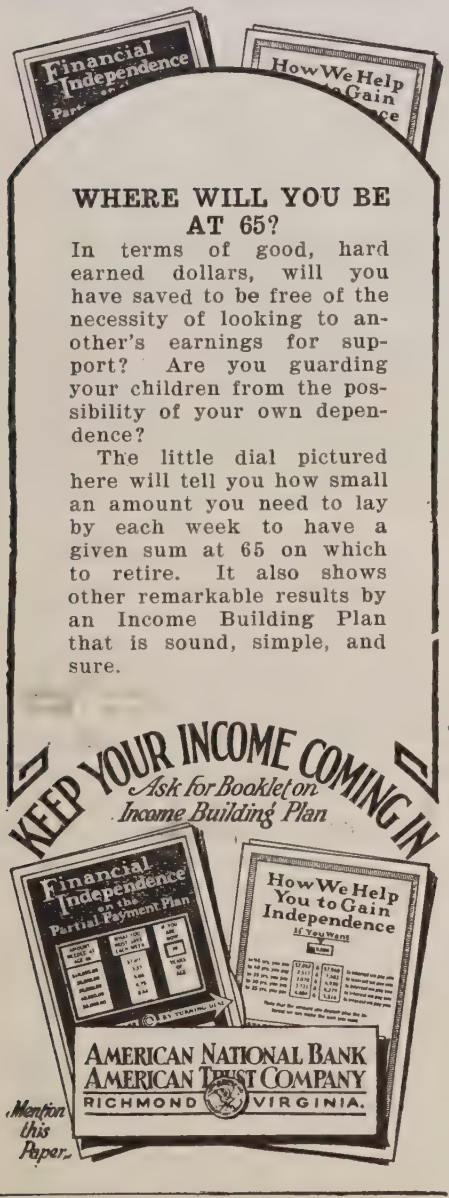
The Last Day.

Were this the last of earth,
  This very day,
How should I think and act?
  What should I say?
Would I not guard my heart
  With earnest prayer?
Would I not serve my friends
  With loving care?

How tender every word
  As the hours wane?
"Like this we shall not sit
  And talk again."
How soft the beating heart
  That soon must cease!
What glances carry love—
  What heavenly peace!

And yet this fleeting life
  Is one last day;
How long so e'er its hours,
They will not stay.
O heart, be soft and true
  While thou dost beat;
O hands, be swift to do;
  O lips, be sweet!

—Selected.



God As a Father.

I was once, many years ago, disputing with an atheist lecturer in the Town Hall Square, in Leeds. The man said that if God were truly a heavenly Father He would "treat us all alike". I exclaimed: "Surely not. Surely you are thinking of a heavenly police magistrate, not of a Father. The glory of a father is that he can treat all his children differently. He will encourage the timid and backward; and check the forward and self-confident; and punish the naughty and unruly; and do it all in love and love all equally." Was I right? And which is the nobler conception? I have nothing to say against police magistrates, among whom I have found many of my kindest friends, and for whose noble work I have the greatest admiration. But they themselves would be the first to say that they often find themselves bound by rules, and that the more nearly they can attain to the ideal of treating each case differently, on its merits, the more successful their work will be. My two favorite texts when I wish to think of the nature of God are—"Thou art My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased", and "I know thee by name, and thou hast also found grace in My sight". I believe one of the greatest dangers to which religion is exposed at the present day, and perhaps has always been exposed, is the danger of thinking of God as a force, a law, an energy, and not as a Person. But, when we have a direct experience of God, it is always experience of a Person.—Canon Green.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Deliberation is often only dishonesty. —F. W. Robertson.

Christ's mission was to save men—to save them from littleness, selfishness, sin and death.

Truth is one;
And, in all lands beneath the sun,
Whoso hath eyes to see may see
The token of its unity.—
—Whittier.

"There is so-called goodness so cold that it repels the sinner, but the goodness of Jesus was so warm, sympathetic and kind that it attracted."

After all, the question of organic ecclesiastical unity is set forth in 1 Corinthians 13. It is a matter of emphasis: "Many waters cannot quench Love."

Thy lips be touched with fire divine
To speak of grace to dying men;
To win the lost the task be thine;
To guide them, lest they stray again.

Beauty in later life, in either man or woman, is dependent upon character far more than upon form or color. Unselfishness, sincerity, thoughtfulness, refinement lend their charm to those who have consistently cherished them, until in old age they may really become beautiful.

"Give me the power to feel
For hearts that I would heal;
Give me the power to see
With sight like Thine.
But most of all give me
The power to love like Thee,
O Love Divine."

"Prayer is a privilege, like friendship, family love and laughter, great books, great music and great art. It is one of life's opportunities to be grasped thankfully and used gladly. The man who misses the deep meaning of prayer has not so much refused an obligation; he has robbed himself of life's supreme privilege—friendship with God.

Men say that they do not pray because God to them is not real, but a truer statement generally would be that God is not real because they do not pray. Granted a belief that God is, the practice of prayer is necessary to make God not merely an idea held in the mind, but a Presence recognized in the life."

Men seek in vain some charm whereby to flee
Mortality—
Some magic potion which to them shall give
The power to live;
Yet still One Voice sounds above the strife,
"I am the Life".

Vol. 92. RICHMOND, VA., FEBRUARY 19, 1927. No. 8.

CURRENT CHRISTIANITY

A SMALL BALANCE INSTEAD OF A LARGE DEFICIT IS THE FINANCIAL RESULT of the first year for the General Church operating on its new program known as the "Pay-As-You-Go-Plan". At the last General Convention in 1925 it was decided that the time had come for the Church to stop spending money that she did not have, and to try to do like other business institutions, making her expenses fit her income. It was asked that every Diocese should state by January 15th of each year the amount it expected to be able to pay to the National Council. This body was then instructed to adjust its appropriations to a total within the sum thus pledged. Heretofore the plan has been to work from the top down, instead of from the bottom up. In other words, the General Church has decided what it wanted to do, and has gone ahead, hoping to get the necessary funds, with the frequent result that large deficits have occurred, creating heavy interest liabilities. Now, instead of depending upon an arbitrary assessment levied on the Diocese and Missionary Districts, the basis of appropriation is made upon what each one of these divisions of the Church say that they expect to pay. The quota is still levied, but only the amount pledged is counted upon. Out of the ninety-seven Dioceses and Missionary Districts to which portions of the necessary funds were allotted, forty-seven have paid the full apportionment and seventy-four have paid the amount they told the National Council to expect. It is impossible to ascertain the exact balance as yet, because all the returns have not come in from the mission fields. It is certain, however, that the new plan will be more satisfactory than the old one, and that under the efficient guidance of Lewis B. Franklin, the Treasurer of the National Council, it will prove eminently successful.

ANTI-LYNCHING LEGISLATION IN THE TIME OF MOSES seems a little far-fetched, but if we turn to the second verse of the twenty-third chapter of the Book of Exodus we find this law, "Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil". That is certainly as direct a command against mob violence as can be found anywhere. Perhaps there is no country in the world where it is so necessary to lay to heart these words as in the United States. Our attitude toward law and order is most lamentable. On the one hand, the upper and respectable classes seem to feel that certain laws do not apply to them and do not require their respect or obedience. On the other hand, upon special occasions the lower and disreputable class assume that the enforcement of the law is their duty, and they form themselves into lynching mobs to hasten and brutalize the regular course of justice.

A bill now pending in the Legislature of South Carolina offers one of the most effective remedies against lynching that we have yet seen. It gives the Governor of the State the power to remove the peace officials in whose jurisdiction a lynching occurs. In most cases the local authorities holding elective positions are afraid to take the necessary steps to protect the alleged criminal from the mob, for fear they may shoot or wound some loyal supporters who have helped to elect them to office; but if they know that the Governor can summarily remove them from office if they fail to do their duty, it will have great weight in urging them to exercise the necessary vigor and vigilance to protect the criminal.

HE COUNTY SUNDAY-SCHOOL ASSOCIATION is usually a well-known organization to all of our rural clergy. Considering the smallness of our numbers, it is surprising how often Episcopal clergymen are chosen as officials in this group, which includes representatives from all the Protestant churches. The plan of its system is similar to that of the government, the aim being to have a State, county, city and district organization, with a national body of which Arthur N. Harris, of New York, is at present chairman, also being chairman of the World's Sunday-School Association Executive Committee.

In this capacity he recently attended a Sunday-school rally in Assiut, Egypt, where there were no less than three thousand scholars and teachers present.

It is a striking evidence of the present smallness of the largeness of the Christian message to realize that the "County Association", which is generally held in some little country church, is an active part of a great body that reaches even to far-away Egypt. It brings home to us St. Paul's illustration that Christ is the body of which we are all members in particular.

THE GOOD SAMARITAN IS THE BUSIEST MAN IN THIS COUNTRY TODAY, through his modern representative, the Travelers' Aid Society. December 17th was selected as a day on which to sum up the number and types of services rendered by this organization in a single twenty-four hours. As a result, it was shown that in 1,815 cities and towns 2,238 travelers were assisted in various ways. Of these, two hundred and fifty-three were children traveling alone. There were forty-four cases of "runaways". Eighteen persons had lost their tickets or money, and one hundred and thirty-five could not speak the English language.

This organization now carries its Christlike administration into every State of the Union except five—New Hampshire, Vermont, South Dakota, Wyoming and Nevada. It is possible for a child to start from New York and travel to San Francisco, being met, transferred and cared for at every junction by Travelers' Aid agents. Surely this is fulfilling the Saviour's command to go and do likewise.

A HUNDRED YEARS OF SERVICE has been faithfully rendered by our esteemed contemporary, The Presbyterian of the South, which is this week publishing a centennial number in celebration of that fact. The Southern Churchman extends its heartiest congratulations, and its best wishes for another century to this journal, that serves a very similar constituency to our own; in fact, in many homes these two papers are read by families having members both in the Episcopal and the Presbyterian Church.

THE NATIONAL CATHEDRAL AT WASHINGTON has recently made three additions to its staff by appointment of Bishop Freeman. They are the Rev. Edward Slater Dunlap, to act as Field Secretary, the Rev. Robert Lee Lewis, as Curator, and the Rev. Edwin N. Lewis, as Executive Secretary. The expenditures of large sums of money in Cathedral building throughout the country is not wise, in our opinion, but we do feel that there are two cities in which buildings are justified. New York, the largest metropolis, and the gate-way to the United States, has good reason to feel the need of such an edifice. The Capital of the country, also, we believe to be a place where such a building will strengthen the life of the Church, and be an uplifting power in the country at large. Under the broad-minded and efficient leadership of Bishop James E. Freeman, we hope to see the completion of this work pushed to a successful conclusion, feeling, as we do, that under his leadership it will become a busy center of Church activities, and prove itself to be useful, as well as ornamental.

PRAYER BOOK REVISION IN ENGLAND

According to newspaper reports, the much-talked of revision of the Prayer Book in England, is not so startling as might have been expected from recent accounts of marching crowds to petition the Bishops to retain the Protestant character of the Church of England, on the one hand, and the threats of the secession of large numbers to the Roman Church on the other hand.

The proposals which are put forward by the Bishops, and which must be ratified by the assembly, the two Convocations of York and Canterbury, and finally by Parliament, contain two suggestions, that are of special interest to us in the United States.

The first of these is that the elements of the Holy Communion may be "reserved for the sick only". This proposal is reasonable, and if properly adhered to, is in keeping with at least one clause of our present consecration prayer, when we include "All others who shall be partakers of this Holy Communion". The fact that the reservation is definitely restricted for the use of the sick should prevent its use for adoration on the altars, which is now so often practiced.

The second innovation is the introduction into the burial service of prayers, "For those whom we love but see no longer". The use of these prayers is optional, as is the case in the proposed revisions in our own Prayer Book.

The other changes reported are not of any great importance, and apply mostly to those places where the Church of England's Prayer Book differs from our own, particularly in the marriage service. Here the statements and promises made by the bride and groom are identical.

The use of any of the new suggestions is at the discretion of the clergyman in charge of the congregation, and he may incorporate all or part of them into the old service at his discretion.

While this plan, both in England and America of making changes optional, breaks up to some extent the old uniformity of the services of the Episcopal Church, it is, nevertheless, more in keeping with the modern idea of "self-determination", which gives a parish the right of choice. The danger is, however, that this choice is too often exercised by the clergy, without due regard to the wishes of the people, thereby opening the way to all sorts of contentions in the congregation. It is frequently the case, that a new rector will undertake to force his views upon the people, rather than endeavor to comply with their wishes. The new conditions, however, should awaken a greater interest among the laity and make them more vigilant.

In the matter of the reservation of the Sacrament, we hope that the American revisers will not permit reservation for the sick, but will introduce a short consecration service to be used in emergencies. Even in this enlightened day recent developments in our own Church have proved that the habit of keeping the consecrated elements, leads to superstitious practices that are neither edifying or inspiring. This is another matter on which it will be well for the laity of the Church to keep a vigilant eye.

THIS WEEK'S CLERGY

THE REVEREND EDMUND PENDLETON DANDRIDGE, D. D., was born in Flushing, New York. He graduated at the University of Virginia in 1902, going from there to the Theological Seminary of Virginia, where he graduated in 1906. Before taking up parochial work, he studied at Oxford and received a B. A. degree from that University in 1908. His first charge was Greenbrier Parish, West Virginia, which included the whole of the county, almost as big as the State of Rhode Island. (Here, the writer was his Junior Warden.) He served in this large field with great energy and faithfulness, and we believe made a record in church building at Emmanuel Church, White Sulphur Springs, where he started to collect funds for this church in February, and had it built, paid for, and consecrated before the end of the following October. In 1911 he accepted a call to St. Paul's Church, Petersburg, Va., where he served for twelve years, going from there to Christ Church, Nashville, Tenn., in 1923. Every rector of this church has been elected a Bishop, and Dr. Dandridge is no exception; for he was chosen as Bishop of Idaho in 1924, but felt that his work at Christ Church, so recently begun, was more important, and he is still serving this noted parish.

THE REVEREND KIMBER H. K. DEN was born in a non-Christian family in 1895. He graduated in the School of Theology and in the School of Arts of St. John's University, Shanghai, China, 1917. Ordained to the diaconate by Bishop D. T. Huntington, of Anking, in 1917, he was then associated with the Rev. E. J. Lee in the Cathedral of Anking for three years. From 1920-1926 he became a Chinese priest in charge of St. Matthew's Church, Nanchang, China, where the Rev. L. R. Craighill is now a resident American missionary. He is now taking one year's post-graduate work in the Theological Seminary, Alexandria, Va. Mr. Den has a great many interesting views of Chinese buildings and scenes, with which he will be glad to give lectures for Church organizations on week-ends. He is thoroughly familiar with the English language, and an attractive and interesting speaker.

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

THE HEROISM OF SELF-DENIAL

By the Reverend Edmund P. Dandridge, D. D.

"Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me." St Mark 8:34.

OUR Lord must have spoken these words often. They occur five times in the first three Gospels. The truth they express lies at the foundation of real Christian living.

We miss their force if we think of Jesus as a pale ascetic. He never sought discomfort and privation as ends. He didn't think a long-face virtuous, "When thou fastest anoint thy head and wash thy face". He loved nature and flowers and children, and entered into the joys of people. His first recorded miracle was turning water into wine in order that the festivities of a wedding might not be spoiled. One of the constant miracles of His life is the power He had of finding a way to the hearts of others, discovering the buried good which most people never suspected—and discovering, also, the meanness disguised under the forms of respectability and piety. He was the one perfectly normal man—perfect in sympathy and joy and radiant faith—perfect also in the divine intensity of His earnestness, His complete self-mastery, the utter self-sacrifice of His love. And He came on earth to share that life with men: "I am come that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly." He made the one supreme sacrifice, not to save us from the necessity of self-sacrifice, but that being redeemed by His cross, taught by His revelation and inspired by His Spirit, we might share His life—now and eternally.

Therefore, "He who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame", did not hesitate to challenge those who would be His disciples, to an intensity of devotion like unto His own: "Whosoever will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me."

I. It means saying No to one's self.

Like all great ideas, it has been cheapened in our common thought and speech. We speak of abstaining from butter or cigarettes in Lent as self-denial. Such abstinence may be useful—often is useful—but it is at best but a petty part of what denying one's self means.

It means saying No to one's lower nature; to all the impulses which may be natural and useful enough when they are kept under control by a central and worthy purpose, but which continually clamor against such control; all the things in ourselves which are not in harmony with the mind of Christ.

Perhaps this has been too exclusively emphasized at times, but the danger, at least in America today, is definitely the other way. Christianity does not consist of negations, but there can be no real Christian living, or any other worth-while living, without negations, any more than there can be developed the physique of an athlete without training regulations. The Church wisely sets this in the forefront. She asks every one who is baptized: "Dost thou renounce the devil and all his works, the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same and the sinful desires of the flesh, so that thou wilt not follow nor be led by them?"

"The devil and all his works." That means the sins of the spiritual life—the mind and heart—especially pride and untruthfulness and hatred. It is pride which makes a man exalt himself above his fellows and set up his whim against God's will. 'Till a man can say No to his pride, he can neither learn anything, nor get into right relations with other people, or with God.

Christ joins falsehood and hatred together and says of Satan: "He was a murderer from the beginning and abode not in the truth. When he speaketh a lie he speaketh of his own, for he is a liar and the father of it." We may pass by as beneath notice, malicious lies about other people and the not less contemptible second-hand retailing of lies that some one else has invented. But how about clever lies in business? They get the trade, and the liar is proud of it. Christ calls on a man to say No! How about the easy lies a fellow tells to avoid trouble? Christ calls on a man to say No—to face facts, to take his own responsibility like a man.

Lying is linked with hatred. The whole world today is infected with hatred—race hatred, national hatred, class hatred, denominational hatred, individual hatred. Some years ago I asked a great alienist why in these days it was so hard for people to keep in a good humor with each other. He recognized the fact, but could give no reason for it. The Bible gives us a reason; the Bible says it is the devil. The only alternative to accepting that explanation is to attribute it to your own nature. In either case Christ bids you and me say No to the envy, hatred and malice we find in ourselves.

The pomps and vanities of this wicked world: Of course that doesn't mean joy in life and wholesome amusement. Play is essential to wholesome living. No life can run smoothly without a fairly liberal supply of the oil of joy. Yet the early Christians had to refuse to take part in public amusements because all these amusements were either brutal or idolatrous. They were called "kill-joys" by their neighbors because they said No to the very natural impulse in themselves to take part in these things.

Who that knows anything of modern life would dare say that the same spirit is not needed now? Here is a man so eager to keep the pace with a certain social set that he cannot bring himself to live simply within his means. Pretty soon there is a financial wreck and a moral wreck and misery, all because a man had not said No to himself in relation to pomps and vanities.

There are few things more disgusting to really well-bred people than ostentation, whether it be ostentation of wealth or learning or social position.

In this land, and in this time of amazing wealth and comfort, it is perilously easy for us all to put wealth and comfort first. The Eternal Truth comes to us and says: "Say No to the self that proposes this inversion of values."

Renounce that slavery to things which a weak-kneed selfishness imposes, in order that your primary loyalty to Christ and His Truth and Righteousness may be real.

Every one who will be his own master and keep a decent self-respect, sooner or later finds that he has to resist "the sinful lusts of the flesh". Some of them, like intemperance and lust, soon bring their own manifest penalty. There are others like sloth and indolence which less dramatically, but no less certainly, destroy the higher life.

It is very popular today to clamor against repression, to demand self-expression unrestrained, and to dress up the old devils of License and Lust in the high-sounding terms of modern psychology. The result is degrading people to a state of having no real selves to express. We need to learn over again that self-discipline and self-control are just as essential to real manhood and womanhood as they have always been.

God made our bodies and every power and capacity has a holy use, but my business is to control my body, not to let my body control me. We need to say No to our unruly impulses, to have some iron in character.

This sort of self-denial is essential to self-development and joy in life. No musician is ever free in the exercise of his genius, until by long self-discipline he has become a master. No man can enter fully and permanently into the joy of his Lord except in proportion as his personality becomes unified under the control of a will which is devoted to Christ.

And a man has to say No to the self which wants to worship the world, the flesh and the devil, because these things spoil his work. It is not many years since millions of the young men of America left their homes and their loved ones to take their part on the battlefields of France. Didn't those men, marching away regiment by regiment, love their homes and their families? Didn't they have a right to live their own lives by their own firesides, to have their children on their knees? Of course they did! But above the love of all these things had come the high call of Country and of Duty, and men turned their backs on all else to answer that call. Put over against that Christ's call: "Whosoever will come after Me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow Me."

"But," some one says, "He makes no such demands on us today." Oh, yes, He does, and the failure to realize it is the weakness of the Church and of our Christian living.

He gives the Church unparalleled opportunity now in this day of the remaking of civilization, but the opportunity demands a lot—money, time, prayer, study, lives. That these may be forthcoming, a man has to say No to other things.

A young missionary was home from China on furlough. He had been working in a desperately poor suburb of Wuchang, practically without equipment. He was trying to secure equipment. He met an old college friend on the street in New York, and the old college friend, after most affectionate greetings, asked him about his work and expressed a great interest in it. He wound up by saying: "It is great to be giving yourself to work like that. I wish that I could help you, but I am dead broke. I have just bought a new car and I haven't finished paying for it, and it takes everything I can rake and scrape to pay the expense of keeping a car in this town." "That's easy," said the missionary, "I will take the car off your hands and you save the expense and put the proceeds into the work." "No, of course I can't do that," said his friend, "but do come and have dinner with us, just a little party at the ———— Hotel, and some of them your old friends. They will be delighted to see you." So they went in and sat down—sixteen people at seven or eight dollars a plate—as the guests of the young Christian gentleman who was tremendously interested in his friend's work in China, but hadn't a dollar to give to it.

The pitiful part of it is that most Protestant Episcopal Americans would not regard such an incident as either shocking or unusual. Surely we need to deny ourselves if the work Christ has given us to do is to be set forward.

How much time, how much energy, how much thought do we give—how much do we sacrifice—to hasten the time when the kingdom of this world will become the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ, and every child that is born will have a decent chance, because the Christ has been made really the King of the thoughts and lives of men?

Thank God for the self-denials in every congregation of Christian people; but is real self-denial a part of the life of us all? Have any of us yet come to "count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord"? That is the expression of St. Paul's maturity, but it is a goal towards which all Christians ought to be growing.

The demand cuts deep. Say No to every weakness and frailty and selfish purpose, that the whole life may be devoted to Christ and His service. Put into every-day Christianity something of the spirit of the man who is glad to have given three sons to the work in the Orient. Or of Bishop Rowe, declining a Diocese in the United States to carry on his taxing work in Alaska. Or of the women who have given themselves to lonely work in the mountains.

II. "And follow Me"—that is the demand for faith.

Real Christianity requires one to violate the dictates of worldly prudence. Formal Christianity does not. Therefore there are lots of formal Christians—lots of unconscious hypocrisy. It is all mighty easy—and futile. In the end —in the long run—the Christianity of Christ will always prove to be good sense, but this is not always apparent and it does demand putting unseen values above the seen, the ideal above the material—following the unseen Lord known only by faith. Thank God, there is in us all that which responds in thought and emotion, but it needs also to be by deliberate choice and action.

That is why the Church puts the second question: "Dost thou believe?" Without faith no one would have the courage to begin. The Creed is our banner, the banner which the Church has always carried before her advancing hosts. It is also a brief declaration of what He is, in the following of Whom one may dare. I don't believe the Church intends to refuse Baptism and Confirmation to one who is puzzled and uncertain about some of the Creed's declarations. She does mean to set before us the truth of what He is, that we may have courage and love enough to pay the price.

He Whom we are called to follow is the ultimate truth of human life, Who gave His life for us. He is the same of whom St. Paul spoke: "The love of Christ constraineth us, because we thus judge that if one died for all, then all died, and that He died for all that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him who died for them and rose again."

To follow Him is to serve men, for He went about doing good and He has made this the test of our discipleship. "In as much as ye did it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye did it unto Me."

There are two kinds of discipline recognized in the world's armies. One is iron discipline. The officer remains behind and sends his men into action. He enforces his will from above. The other is leadership discipline. The officer leads his men into action and leads them in everything that makes a good soldier. Christ relies on leadership discipline. He never asks one of us to do anything, in the doing of which He has not already led the way, and our response to His leadership is the clear test of what sort of people we are.

No field of human helpfulness is alien to His service. Every man has something he can use, provided our self-denial and our taking the cross and our following are real. And it is in this sort of following that men come to know Him and to share His life. There are two ways in which men come really to know God and to develop spiritually; one is mystic communion, the other is loving service. Christ calls us to both.

And His call, like all calls for volunteers, is always a call to the individual. The one question that every man has to settle is not, "What is somebody else going to do about it", but "What am I going to do about it"?

EXTRACTS FROM BISHOP HARRIS' CONVENTION ADDRESS

The forward looking leaders of the Church wish to keep the Church free—modern—virile and independent, and the organization of the Church sufficiently constitutional and flexible to meet new conditions, so that the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America may always be ready and always be free to voice clearly the spiritual aspirations of this nation still in the making.

They believe the Holy Spirit is still alive and is still speaking to men and to nations in a language they can understand. They believe America needs no Latin pageantry to express its spiritual genius. As America seems destined to play a world part in humanity's development they would keep our Church vitally alert and responsive to the voice of the Holy Spirit in the twentieth century. They would have her express fearlessly, vigorously and clearly for America the nation's highest spiritual aspirations, and portray God's eternal truth in terms of twentieth century American life.

On the other hand, there is a minority party, thoroughly organized and thoroughly determined, aggressively fighting day and night to thrust the Protestant Episcopal Church back into the Middle Ages. They mock at the term "Protestant". They would discard as worthless all the liberty, freedom, and truth won by the martyrs of the Reformation.

They would attire the clergy in the gorgeous robes of the past. Some would add mediaeval services to our American Prayer Book. They would, in dress and ceremonials, reproduce the Middle Ages and revive the very Roman usages which the enlightened nations of the world discarded during the period of the Reformation.

They would push the thinking of the Church back into the dark ages. Some even proclaim the dark ages were the ages of enlightenment, and that the Protestant Reformation was an unmitigated evil, a religious calamity and that the Church must forget the Reformation and go back to the fourteenth century and start over on the old track, repudiating the Reformation completely.

They, like old men, glory in the past, and believe the golden age lies behind. They distrust the present and the future. They would attire modern, alert America in the ceremonial and dress of the Middle Ages—feed it only on the theology of the Middle Ages—and then they tell us all would be well.

Either "The Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America", as our fathers gave it to us, free, constitutional, American—or a mediaeval Church, mediaeval in spirit, foreign in flavor and theology, unprogressive in thought, tied with dead men's hands, muttering mediaeval masses with intercessions to the Saints, and worship of the Virgin Mary.

This party, seemingly, would make of our American Protestant Episcopal Church a pale and anaemic imitation of the Roman Church. I can not see why extremists bewitched by the claims of Rome, do not courageously and manfully march to Rome in a body instead of dropping in one by one. Perhaps they have work to do in our Church before they go. We are conscious of the activities of a minority party organized completely, compactly, effectively. They exercise an influence out of all proportion to their number on account of their organization. They have become extremely aggressive and are forcing an issue in a Church that loves peace, good manners, courtesy and freedom.

THE ANTI-CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT IN CHINA

By the Reverend Kimber H. K. Den

IT is rather unfortunate that Christianity should become one of the objects of the nationwide attack in China as a result of the recently growing spirit of nationalism. When we examine closely the different charges as made by the Anti-Christian agitators against Christianity, we will know that this movement is not against Christianity itself, but against the different organized forms of Christianity; not against Christ, but against certain unworthy representatives of Christ, in whose lives they find no manifestation of the Spirit of the Master of whom they preach. It is not against the truths of Christianity, but against the wrong policy and unwise methods by which the Christian Church advances its cause. Most of the handbills posted on the walls, and the tracts circulated by these Anti-Christian agitators among Chinese students, as we see, bear almost the same tone in their accusations of Christianity, such as "Christianity is a foreign religion", "Christianity has been the forerunner of foreign political and economical aggression", "The Christian missionaries are the forerunners of Western imperialism and the hounds of foreign capitalism, and Christianity is an instrument of the ruling classes and nations to oppress weaker classes or nations, and so forth".

The charge against Christianity as a "foreign religion" rises from the misunderstanding that Christianity is a form of Western civilization. Hence any resentment of things foreign and of the Western civilization on the part of the Nationalistic party causes the same feeling toward Christianity. It is rather sad to say that Christianity in the last cenury has come to China with a great deal of Western coloring and atmosphere. The early missionaries, while bringing to the people the gospel of salvation, have, at the same time, unconsciously brought with them much of the thought, manners, customs and temperament of the West; some of which do not seem to be quite suitable to the taste of the native people. Even up to the present day, it is still said that Christianity in China has been feeding with "Western butter and bread" and not with "Chinese rice". And Christianity will not cease to be called a "foreign religion" until she has succeeded in adapting herself to the life of the new home where she intends to reside permanently. But in recent years the Chinese Church, through the effort of her many thoughtful Christians, is trying to develop herself in an indigenous way. She is beginning to view the Christian message through her Oriental eyes and to interpret it on the basis of her own Oriental culture and thought. In many places in China nowadays churches have already been put up with Chinese architecture and Chinese designs. Some of the Church rituals are so adopted as an expression of Chinese thought and taste. Of course, we know that the assimilation of any religion to the life of a new land is always a slow and gradual process. It has taken Buddhism more than one thousand years in China before she ceased to be persecuted as a foreign religion. It will be naturally the same outcome of Christianity if she is allowed to stay in the new home a little longer than she has been.

Besides the charge of Christianity as a "foreign religion", it stands next the most cogent accusation of Christianity as the "forerunner of Western imperialism and the hounds of foreign capitalism". It is said from the historical point of view that missionary enterprise has been used by imperialism. Though it is untrue to say that missions and imperialism work together consciously, but unfortunately it so happened that, from the historical point of view, the troubles arising between early missionaries and the Chinese were always made use of by their governments to put forth their aggressive policy and to expand their political and economic influences in China. Although many missionaries are quite innocent and pure in their motives, they are sometimes utilized unconsciously by their governments as a tool of imperialism, for which any loss of life and property were always compensated with large sums of indemnity, concession of territory, and the signing of unequal treaties. For instance, when in November, 1897, two of the German Catholic priests were murdered in Kianchwang, Shantung, Germany took the opportunity immediately to seize Kiaochow Bay, and demanded its lease for ninety-nine years, besides redress for the murder. As a result, the Kiaochow lease Convention was signed on March 6, 1898. Then the other imperialistic powers followed suit. Forts Arthur and Talienwan were seized by Russia and subsequently leased to her on March 27, 1898. Kwangchowwan was leased to France for ninety-nine years in the same year. In addition to many other privileges, Great Britain obtained, by the Convention of July 1, 1898, the lease of Weiheiwei. So in this connection the whole trouble was started by the pretense that China had killed two German missionaries in Shantung. How can the Chinese people distinguish between imperialism and missions, when the two things—religious trouble and concessions, etc.—link to each other as "cause and effect". Strangest of all is the fact that all the treaties signed by China to the Allied powers—Great Britain, France, Russia and the United States—as a result of her defeat in the War of 1858-1860, contained a guarantee of toleration for the propagation of the Christian gospel and a promise of protection for the safety of the lives of missionaries. That imperialism uses missions as a tool is explicitly shown in the Japanese missionary policy. Right after the Boxer uprising, the Japanese Government, while realizing that the Western powers had been profited by their different missions in securing a strongbold on China, also demanded that the Japanese Buddhist missionaries be granted freedom to preach Buddhism in China. Again in Japan's Ultimatum to China in 1915, we also find a similar demand for China to grant Japanese subjects the right of preaching in China. With reference to the demand by Japan that Japanese subjects should have the rights to carry on religious propaganda in China, the Chinese Government, in its "Official History", said "that this would, in the opinion of the Chinese Government, have presented great obstacles to the consolidation of the friendly feeling subsisting between the two peoples". "The religions of the two countries are so identical and, therefore, the need for a missionary propaganda to be carried on in China by Japanese does not exist". Hence we see Japan is but imitating the Western powers.

Although most of the missionaries may be pure and innocent in their motives, the fact that their trust of safety is upon the military protection of their governments has unconsciously given an opening for the expansion of the aggressive policy of their government. Thus it is frequently said "that business follows missions and the national flag follows business". The missionaries first opened the way in a new land and then the imperialistic government under certain pretenses took them over. When the Chinese people think of the history of the so-called concessions, and unequal treaties in China, they cannot help looking at the missionary work as a tool of imperialism, and therefore their reaction in 1900 took the form of the Boxer uprising, and now takes the form of the Anti-Christian movement, alongside of the "down with imperialism movement", as agitated by the Nationalistic party.

In spite of the bitter opposition against Christianity on the part of certain groups in the Nationalistic party, it should be remembered that the thoughtful and responsible Chinese Christian leaders are constantly expressing their sense of continued need for the whole-hearted cooperation of their Western missionary friends in the evangelization of their country. Missionaries, who can inspire men to base their entire lives upon a daring faith in the God of Jesus, and who can create in their friends a universal love for one's fellowmen of whatever class or nation, creed or color, will be needed and wanted in China for a long, long time. Nothing less than reality, however, can accomplish these things. The non-Christian Chinese can hardly see why the Christian leaders and messengers of the "Prince of Peace", for example, who are there to preach about the all-powerful, all-loving Father, and then, when a crisis comes, sanction and bless war with its heart of hatred, and illustrate the emptiness of what they preach. For "the greatest truths", as Gandhi of India says, "are not spoken truths, but acted truths". It is, therefore, inconceivable for the missionaries who are to preach the gospel of peace and love, to sanction the use of a weapon for their safety, whereas the spirit of love and sympathy could really conquer hatred and win the hearts of men. Such a reliance for their safety on military protection, instead of on the loving mercy of God, is indeed not in harmony with the spirit of the Master whom they proclaim. Remember that Christ, with His purposes rooted in the mercy of God, came to become the Saviour of mankind. Although there was never a day nor an hour when He was not riding on perilous water, although He faced death on the cross, yet He was meek and lowly like a lamb; and never because He was the Son of God did He refuse to conform to the laws of the country in which He was living, nor by calling upon His Father to supply Him with ten myriads of angel soldiers, did He seek special powers to protect Himself from danger. We are profoundly convinced that Christianity is what China solely needs today. In spite of the present opposition to certain organized forms of Christianity, there is found still in the hearts of many people a burning zeal for a spiritual salvation in Christ, whom they wish to receive in His pure and naked form, rather than with a Western cloak on Him. Hence, to remove the cause of the present antagonism, it is necessary that those who proclaim the Christian message must use enlightened methods and live in a true Christlike life.

There are now only two types of missionaries who are greatly needed and who are really useful in the Church in China today, namely: (1) a group of men who have greater faith in Christ for their protection rather than reliance on the military force of their government. It is a group of men who should have a living conception of world fellowship in its deepest meanings. They need to be filled with buoyant courage to speak out plainly in matters of international justice. They also need to have adequate knowledge of the historical background of the land where they preach, and a whole-hearted sympathy with the aspirations and lives of the people whom they wish to convert. For, as we understand, it is the failure of many new foreign missionaries to understand Chinese civilization with its riches of history, poetry, philosophy and art, that breeds an attitude of racial pride and an atmosphere of Western superiority. Secondly, we need that group of men who have exceptional ability in training up native leadership and have the attitude of John the Baptist, who was glad when he saw a young man become more popular than himself; who could stand when his own disciples forsook him and said rejoicing, "He shall increase; I shall decrease".

When this vision is realized, may we see a new epoch of Christianity in China? Hence we can see that this present movement of opposition does not appear so much as a stumbling block to the Christian cause in China, but would rather, by the grace of God, serve as stepping stones to a fuller development of a healthy and strong native Church in that part of the world.

A QUESTION FOR MR. MINNIGERODE AND FATHER JOHNSTON.

Mr. Editor:

In your Christmas issue there was a statement that the most probable meaning of the Hebrew word, Missah, is sacrifice. Will you not give the writer, Mr. Minnigerode (or Father Johnston, from whom he quotes), the opportunity to point out a single passage in the Old Testament where this word means sacrifice or is so translated?

Again, I should like to have the name of some reputable scholar who derives the word Missah from the Hebrew word Mas.

GEORGE C. ABBITT.

Hopkinsville, K., Jan. 27, 1927.

POLITE REJOINDER.

Mr. Editor:

The criticism of Mr. Thom Williamson, Jr., directed at the article appearing in your issue of January 29, "The Dangers of Ignorance", evinces a most commendable and kindly spirit.

May it not be courteously suggested, however, that Mr. Williamson, as well as many others charitably inclined, is possibly not aware of what is transpiring in the Church and is not advised of the conditions to which the article related.

Had the notice issued by "The Living Rosary of Our Lady and St. Dominic" emanated from a society affiliated with the Roman Catholic Church, it would have attracted no attention, because that Church has the right to preach and teach as it pleases.

What the article was dealing with was a notice issued by a society existing in the Protestant Episcopal Church.

This Church has very definitely, plainly and unmistakably set out in its Constitution, in its Prayer Book and in the Articles of Religion what it teaches with respect to the Mass, Reservation and Adoration of the Sacrament, Invocation of Saints, Worship of Images and Relics, etc., and declares that none of these things shall be taught in this Church. This is its doctrinal law.

Notwithstanding this, the "Catholic" Party states, in open defiance of that law, that it has the right to teach all of these prohibited doctrines in the Church, and that it is doing so in more than three hundred parishes (see Travelers' Guide to Mass, issued by the O. H. C.).

Not only this, the "Catholic" Party has brought about the passage, in the General Convention, of a resolution to so alter the Constitution of the Church as to abrogate the Articles of Religion; and, in addition, through its publications and the utterances of its leaders, it has served notice that, when the Articles shall have been repealed, it intends to substitute for the present Doctrine, Discipline and Worship of the Church "the full 'Catholic' faith", viz: Mass, Reservation of the Sacrament, Virgin Worship, the Rosary and all that goes with it. It has gone even farther than this; it has announced that when this shall have been accomplished, there is to be no place in the Church for Protestants, that is, those who decline to yield to its dictates.

If, therefore, the article had been directed against those who are exercising their manifest right merely to a difference of opinion, few would be found to differ with Mr. Williamson. But that is not the situation. There can be no honest difference of opinion as to where this Church stands with respect to the doctrines promulgated at the Reformation, as set out in the Articles of Religion, because, in simple words, it has declined to accept the Mass, Reservation, Invocation of Saints, etc.

Let us endeavor to think in a straight line. The article was directed at those who daily and openly defy the law of the Church, who plainly say that they intend to overturn that law, and who publicly declare their intention to substitute for its present doctrine that which the Church has repudiated, and not at persons who entertain a difference of opinion.

When those who are loyal to the Church and its doctrine are told, as they were recently in the "American Church Monthly", one of the leading organs of the "Catholic" Party, that Protestant-Episcopalians are afflicted with "an inferiority complex", it is time to sit up and take notice of what is transpiring in the Church; and then act.

KINDLY CRITICISM.

Mr. Editor:

I wish to add a hearty second to the letter in your correspondence columns in the issue of February 5, commenting on the article that appeared on page 8 of your issue of January 29. I am especially glad that it came from one whose Churchmanship is apparently that of the Southern Churchman. Letters in the vein of that article have appeared frequently in your correspondence columns, but in that position they represent only the individual opinion of the writer. When, however, the paper prints such communications as special articles, they are supposed to represent the editorial policy of the paper, and the article that you published does not seem to me to agree at all with the spirit of Evangelical Churchmanship that you so admirably defined in your editorial in the issue of February 5.

Certainly we do not differ so much. I call myself an Anglo-Catholic, although I suppose I do not belong to the so-called "Latinizing" group, and yet I find that my own Churchmanship agrees entirely with yours as it is defined in your editorial. And long association has led me to love and admire Evangelical Churchmanship as it has always been expressed in Virginia. I respectfully submit that the article in question certainly does not represent the true spirit of Virginia Evangelical Churchmanship as I learned it during four years as a parishioner of old St. George's, Fredericksburg, and three years as a student at the Virginia Seminary.

"A distinguished and venerable painter was aasked whether he waited for the 'happy mood' to come to him before he began to paint. He replied: 'Never! I always keep at work, and when the impulse comes it finds me ready and obedient'.

"We train for service through serving. Training is getting ready for opportunity, which is never grasped save by the man who is ready and obedient.

"Thou our daily task shall give;
Day by day to Thee we live;
So shall added years fulfil
Not our own, our Father's will.
Whoever keeps the will of the Father
Need have no fear when service calls him."

THE CHURCH AND THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S WORK

Edited by the Reverend Karl Morgan Block, D. D.

WHEN DOUBTS COME.

AMONG those who have written in the interests of Religious Education, none has made a greater contribution than Dr. Luther A. Weigle, of Yale University. In these days when parents are tried and anxious over the attitude of adolescents toward the Faith and when some of our younger groups find a questioning attitude on the part of their fellows, we can well lay to heart the earnest and carefully written words of this great teacher. Although this article was written for teachers, it faces the problem of doubt so clearly that it may well be quoted in full, viz.:

"We all begin life upon a borrowed basis. Our moral and religious ideas are at first, matters of hearsay. As children, we believe in God and in right because father and mother, teacher or friend, have told us so. But we do not remain children all our days. At some time or other, it is one's privilege and duty to pass from dependence to independence and self-reliance, from childhood to manhood, from beliefs borrowed at hearsay to convictions that are grounded in personal insight and choice.

"Most of us make this change in the late teens or early twenties. It is not wrought in a night. We pass more or less gradually from the borrowed to the personal basis. Individuals differ greatly, however. Some make the transition early, others later; some rapidly, others more slowly; some with even pace in all-round harmonious development, others oddly lagging in some aspects of character or belief while precocious in other respects.

"In some the transition involves no doubts. Experience confirms for them the precepts of childhood, and establishes the truth of their fathers' faith. Their new insights compel no contradiction of old principles, no break with early teaching. Their intellectual and moral development is continuous and straightforward. This happens more often perhaps, than we think. The gaining of personal convictions no more necessarily involves a wandering for a time in doubt than does the gaining of character involve a sojourn in the far country of sin. Doubting Castle is no more inevitable than the Slough of Despond.

"Yet to doubt is easy and natural at this time of life. Doubt comes because of youth's very vitality and earnestness, coupled with its intellectual self-confidence. Reason and will are maturing, and the young man is facing real and practical problems as he begins life for himself. He is eager to be doing, impatient with doddering ways, idealistic, sure of himself and sure of reason. No problem but has its one, and one only solution, he believes; and I need but think the thing through to find it. There is no issue upon which men cannot come to agreement, he holds, if they will only be reasonable enough. He is, in short, credulous of reason. His world must be logical; if not, so much the worse for the world. He has not yet been baffled by unreason as older men have been; he has not sensed, as they have, the complexity of most of life's motives and situations. His thinking and speech are full of disjunctions; his favorite argument is the dilemma. Things are either this or that for him; he is not likely to realize that they may be a little of both this and that with an admixture of several elses as well.

"Little wonder, therefore, that the young man of the early twenties is a creed-maker of definitely pragmatic temper, and inclined to question many of the old dogmas. He is but bringing to religion the same confident powers of mind with which he approaches everything else.

"His mind is filled, moreover, with new ideas. At no time of life, perhaps, does so much new knowledge pour in upon one as in these years of high school, college, and first vocation experience. William James once said that most men gain practically all the ideas they will ever have, outside of their own business, before they are twenty-five. Yes, and they gain most of these after they are eighteen. From eighteen to twenty-five is life's intellectual expansion-time.

"The youth's religion should expand with the rest of his mental outfit. But often this does not take place at home. The new ideas gained in other fields operate to the discredit of his older religious conceptions, but do not replace them with others more adequate. In the name of geology he questions Genesis, and in the name of biology is moved to deny, not simply the doctrine of special creation, but the whole idea of divine purpose and providence. Physics starts him upon a mechanical conception of the universe, and introduces him to the ether which Haeckel thought would make a better god than the One whom Christians worship. He studies a psychology which has long since lost the soul, and which is in danger, in these latter days, of forgetting that there is such a thing as mind. Philosophy, to which he turns for help on ultimate problems, only mixes him up. He gets an inkling of modern views of the Bible, and decides that nobody can know what parts of it to believe.

"Difficulties of this sort are not limited to students in high school and college. The youth who left school to go to work gets new ideas too—from the popular science of the magazines and Sunday supplements, from the "uplift" editorials in yellow newspapers, from soap-box orators and labor agitators; and the result is likely to be more disastrous because the ideas are poorer on the one hand and his mind less trained on the other.

Even that student who has rightly grasped the science, has understood his philosophy courses, and has been led by them and by his study of Biblical literature to adequate and true religious conceptions—the student whose religious ideas are keeping pace with the rest of his moral and intellectual development—is likely to doubt the teaching of his elders. His new ideas will not own the old. His mind dwells upon the difference between what he now believes and what was taught him in childhood. In many cases, eof course, this difference is real; he was wrongly taught, for not all parents and teachers know the truth or how to teach it to children. But even if he was rightly taught, he was able to get but a child's understanding of the matter. And it is this child's understanding of it that he now doubts. The difference that he feels so keenly is probably not, as he thinks it is, a difference between the old and the new generations; it is rather the difference between the child that was and the man that has come to be. His doubt is the measure, not of the world's advance, but of his own development.

"How shall we deal with the doubts of later adolescence?

First: By recognizing their naturalness. Doubt in these years is no sin; neither is it evidence of some moral perversity. It is incidental to the transition from borrowed beliefs to personal convictions.

Second: By knowing enough to meet and answer them, and to guide young people to the truth they seek. Natural as it is, doubt is no mere disease which everybody is sure to have some time and which one cannot do much for except to wait until the patient gets over it—somewhat as people used to regard mumps and measles. Neither is it to be repressed and stifled. Better far to give it opportunity to realize and express itself, then meet it with knowledge —open-minded, reasonable, adequate, true. That above all else is what the doubting youth wanths and needs—not so much sympathy or authority, or even leadership, as knowledge.

"Third: By ourselves realizing and helping young people to understand the place that will has in determining our most fundamental convictions. These are seldom matters of coercive knowledge; they are the fruit of action and of faith as well as of intellect. Every teacher of young people in the doubting years should be familiar with William James' great essay on—'The Will to Believe".

"Fourth: By remembering and helping young people to see that eccentricity is in itself no virtue. Individuality is precious, and personal convictions are worth the travail they cost. But individuality can be fully realized only in social relation; and one may base upon grounds that are personal, convictions that are the common heritage of the race. Youth, not fully understanding this, is sometimes tempted to mistake individualistic self-will for individuality, eccentricity for independence. Edward Rowland Sill put the truth of the matter in verses that should be better known:

" 'Doubting Thomas and loving John Behind the others walking on:—

" 'Tell me now, John, dare you be
One of the minority?
To be lonely in your thought,

Never visited or sought,
Shunned with secret shrug, to go
Through the world esteemed its foe:
To be singled out and hissed,
Pointed at as one unblessed,
Warned against in whispers faint
Lest the children catch a taint:
To bear off your titles well—
Heretic and infidel?
If you dare, come now with me,
Fearless, confident, and free.

" 'Thomas, do you dare to be
Of the great majority?
To be only, as the rest,
With Heaven's common comforts blessed:
To accept, in humble part,
Truth that shines in every heart:
Never to be set on high
Where the envious curses fly:
Never name or fame to find,
Still outstripped in soul and mind,
To be hid, unless to God,
As one grass-blade in the sod
Underfoot with millions trod?
If you dare, come with us, be Lost in love's great unity'."

CHRISTIANITY AND THE COMMUNITY

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

A BISHOP STANDING FOR HIS CONVICTIONS.

New York seems to be a center for very diverse opinion on the subject of prohibition. At the same time that Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler is vociferously proclaiming against it, and trying to make the Republican party stand upon a wet platform, Bishop Manning comes out squarely in favor of law enforcement, and has given the following statement to the Universal Press, which appeared in the Richmond Times-Dispatch and other daily papers throughout the country. We congratulate the Bishop of New York upon the position he takes, and recognize his courage in doing so, for it is by no means the popular part in the Euiscopal Church in his Diocese at this time.

This is his statement:

"In its effort for prohibition our country is engaged in one of the greatest experiments towards social advance ever attempted, one which holds vast possibilities for good and which should have fair and full trial.

"It is much too soon to say that an effort of this magnitude and importance has failed. We may, I think, rather be encouraged at the extent to which it has succeeded.

"I recognize the truth of much that is said as to the increase of drinking among certain groups and classes of people, the lowering of standards, the flask carrying and other disgusting and degrading practices which have been introduced among those who ought to know better and to have nobler ideals of life. I recognize the evil and corruption connected with boot-legging.

"We must remember, however, that the pictures of these conditions are drawn usually and often overdrawn by those who wish to use them as arguments for the repeal, or modification, of the law.

"We must consider this law not in its effect upon certain groups, or communities, which wilfully choose to defy, or evade it, but in its effect upon the life of our country as a whole and, so considered, there is, in my judgment, no room for doubt as to its beneficial effects. I believe that the lives and homes of our wage earners and our plain people are immeasurably benefited by it.

"I have before me a letter, typical of many others, from a clergyman in a manufacturing city whose parish includes hundreds of families, all of them working people. This clergyman writes me that since prohibition drunkenness has almost ceased to be a problem, with the poverty and misery which it caused.

"I do not hold that to drink wine, or other intoxicants, in moderation is in itself a sin, but I believe that the prohibition law properly enforced will make us a healthier, happier and better people and I believe that the law can be, and ought to be enforced. Whatever our opinion of the law, we have no right to break it, or to encourage others to do so. But this question should be looked at from the high level of mere law enforcement. It should be looked at from the higher level of free, voluntary, willing support of law for the sake of the common good. This is the appeal which it should make to the idealism of our people.

"In view of what our race has suffered through the evils of strong drink, in view of the misery which it has brought to fathers, mothers, and children, in view of the fact that its suppression means the reduction of poverty, sorrow, disease and crime, should we not all of us be willing, and glad, to make our surrender of our personal liberties, or our tastes, as this law calls for, and to see prohibition fully and fairly tried?"

COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING.

By Mary Evelyn Brydon, M. D.

Article VII.—The Ten Commandments.

Every child, without exception, should be taught the principles of law as laid down in the Ten Commandments. Whether or not we have chosen the one word that will cover the essential principle in each Commandment must in the circumstances be a matter of individual interpretation. All I ask is that you in some manner recognize that each Commandment holds an especial lesson for your child's guidance in his future conduct of life, and that you make it your business to learn what that lesson is and start as soon as possible to teach it to him.

Remember we have taken these Commandments for the purpose of this study, in a literal sense. Later we will study them in the light of Christ's interpretation, teaching and example. You, as a mother, will not thus analyze them when you come to teach them to your child. You will actually teach a few principles drawn from your spiritual, mental, social, physical and moral resources.

Let us then take up each Commandment as represented by the word we have chosen and discuss it from the standpoint of the home training of the child:

The First Commandment—Belief.

Teach your child to believe in God. All life and the laws governing life are based on the fact that behind the Universe is a Creator, Master Builder and Supreme Governor—God. From the earliest infancy this fact should be inculcated in your child's mind. When you kneel down nightly by his cradle, take his tiny hand in yours and ask God to take care of your little one, in time, although not at first, he will come to grasp subconsciously the fact that "Mother is asking somebody for something". He hears your whispered request, but he sees nobody to ask. I cannot tell you the methods you will employ to get this idea over to his immature intelligence; this you must work out for yourself. But bear in mind that it will take on your part (a) constant audible repetition; (b) a certain regularity in your own visible (to him) prayer life, and (c) the seizure of every opportunity to bring God to his attention. The inevitable result will be that the day will come when there is fixed in his subconscious mind the fact that there is a God who made the world around him and yet is near enough to protect him and safeguard him from all harm. His entire attitude will be built on the foundation of your attitude toward God. Never forget this. One of the child's earliest responses to his environment is imitation. If you believe in God, he will believe in God. If you do not, he will not. There is no middle ground.

I say there is no middle ground, but is there? What about the child's mind torn between allegiance to diverging decisions of maladjusted father and mother? What a tragedy! What hope is there for a child's unfolding spiritual life being rooted and grounded in love, if he sees evidences of love lacking in the home? It is inevitable that such a child will have a divided mind, and to that extent will his spiritual growth be retarded. The father and mother must bury their differences of opinion. I believe that you will be convinced of this if you will make a careful study of the Bible, the writings of our spiritual leaders in the Church, and the expressed opinions of other deep thinkers in this field, especially of the foremost judges of Juvenile and Domestic Relations Courts all over the country.

I doubt if many divorces or separations would occur if father and mother, together as well as separately, carried their differences of opinion on their knees to God for solution. The father may leave the earliest training of the child to the mother; but nevertheless, he is a big factor in the child's home life and must do his part. To secure harmony in the home, he and the mother must agree on certain essential principles in their child training, and with God's guidance present to the child a united front.

Where is belief in God best taught to little children? Your child is born in the home; therefore, his development begins and his training starts in the home. Although it will continue there throughout his early life, to attain its fullest fruition it cannot be confined to that one place. You have three principal places in which to teach him about God:

1. The home
2. The Church
3. Outdoors.

The Home: You, his mother, will have the inestimable privilege of first teaching your baby that God is. Your face is the first he clearly recognizes. Is it any wonder that since he sees you as the center of his universe, he early comes to see God in you, and through you? If, therefore, God is a living Presence to you in your home life, He will inevitably become a living Presence to your child in his home life.

The Church: A Church is "A building used for divine worship"—Webster. It is a place where we go to meet with God, pray to Him, hear about Him; where we assemble ourselves together to praise Him and give Him thanks for His many blessings; where we go to be comforted in trouble; where we go to learn His will concerning our mutual interests; where we may always find those who love God. The teachings and the feeling of reverence that can come only from such an atmosphere, from our joint responses, chants, hymns, and prayers; from the Scripture readings and instructions from the pulpit—even though at first a little child does not understand every word—these can be imbibed, absorbed, learned in church, and to the same degree nowhere else.

We Episcopal Mothers believe that our child will get these in fullest measure only by going regularly to our Episcopal Church service. Let me repeat: he can get just this kind of influence and instruction nowhere else. The home and Church should supplement each other's teachings; from the two together, our child learns about God.

The Sunday School has its place in our religious life, but I say emphatically, it can never take the place of morning or evening Church service.

Outdoors: All in nature; flowers, trees, mountains, sea, sky, stars, sun, etc., are the handiwork of God. Much can be taught to your child about God from them. Here undoubtedly, even as in his closet and in church, can he find God. But don't make the mistake that many make of thinking that only in nature can one see God.

God took the nature of man and came and dwelt among men; therefore, it is not alone in nature, but among men in the home and in the Church that you must teach your child to study the First Commandment. You would be wise if you recognized that the belief in God cannot be taught to your child in any one place alone; that the home, the Church, and nature all teach about God; that to learn about Him in fullest measure you and your child must go to all three.

MEETING OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL

This meeting of the National Council, held in New York February 8 to 10, 1927, was the annual meeting. Seventeen members were present. This was a small attendance compared with the average for the last six years, which has been nineteen out of twenty-six delegates. Four of the members were detained on account of the Bishops' Crusade, and two are abroad.

The President, in his statement, referred to the busy time at the office, due to the closing of the year 1926, and the opening of the new year 1927. He stated that this had been an exceedingly trying and anxious time for the Department of Missions, because of the situation in China and Mexico, and the anxiety of relatives and friends of missionaries abroad as to their safety.

This being the annual meeting, he took pleasure in reappointing Mr. Lewis B. Franklin as Vice-President, which appointment was unanimously confirmed by the Council. The Rev. F. J. Clark, the present Secretary of the Council, was nominated for that office, and unanimously elected.

At the beginning of the meetings of the Presiding Bishop and Council, after its organization by the General Convention of 1919, a vote had been taken that the sessions of the Council should be private. The Council felt that the time had come to rescind this action, which was done, and a resolution was adopted providing that the Council shall sit with open doors, all publicity to be given the meetings to be cared for through the Department of Publicity, reaffirming its previous actions giving seats and voices in its sessions (except during executive sessions), but without vote, to the Executive Secretaries of the several departments of the Council and the Executive Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The Publicity Department has received from time to time references to the large amount of printed and mimeographed matter being sent from the Mission House to the clergy. This was brought to the attention of the Council at its last meeting and the officers were asked to investigate and report a definite plan for regulating the volume of such material. In order to check up on the quantity of material sent out, it was ordered that a report should be made each week to the Executive Officers of all printed and mimeographed matter mailed and to be mailed. It was found from these reports that six the Church Missions Houseom-owokwo pieces of literature had been mailed from the Church Missions House in the last two months to the parochial clergy.

Among the many matters reported by the Treasurer was the progress of the payments on the old deficit.

It was gratifying to the Council to have Bishop Lawrence take the floor at this time and urge that a very definite effort be made before the next General Convention, and, indeed, as soon as possible, to close up the former deficit. The planning of this effort was left to the Presiding Bishop and the officers of the Council.

A letter was read from the Diocesan Council of the Diocese of Ohio, in which it was reported that the Diocese proposed to give five per cent of the amount over and above the budget of the General Church plus the budget of the Diocese to the Advance Work in the General Church, and stating that at the last meeting of the Diocesan Council $1,582, being five per cent of the budget for 1926, as above, had been reported, and that the Diocesan Council asked that this be given to Advance Work in the Missionary Jurisdiction of Idaho. The National Council approved this request.

Among the communications received was one from the Primus of the Scottish Episcopal Church in reference to the projected visit to America of the Bishop of Aberdeen and Provost Erskine Hill, of St. Andrew's Cathedral, Aberdeen, the purpose of this visit being to try to interest the brethren of the American Church in a Seabury Memorial in Aberdeen, the scene of the consecration of Bishop Seabury. Bishop Deane and Provost Hill expect to arrive in New York September 15 and remain for two months.

The Council expressed its hearty welcome to the Bishop and Provost, and commended to the favorable consideration of all American Churchmen the proposed Seabury Memorial.

From the meeting of the Field Department, and also from the meeting of the Council, the Executive Secretary of the Field Department, the Rev. R. Bland Mitchell, was absent on account of a major operation and was still confined to his home as a result of it. Mr. J. M. Miller, one of the General Secretaries, took charge of the department meeting and made the report also for the Department to the Council.

At the request of Mr. Mitchell, the Executive Secretary, the Presiding Bishop appointed Mr. Miller as Corresponding Secretary in place of the Rev. A. R. McKinstry, who resigned to assume the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Albany. Mr. Miller will still keep oversight of the Speakers' Bureau until other arrangements are made.

An interesting proposal was received from a firm of printers asking the Council to supply it with different messages for each week to be printed on the back of the duplex envelopes, the printing firm offering to furnish these envelopes at a lower rate than any firm is now offering them to the Church. The Council voted favorably on the proposition that the material for the back of these envelopes should be furnished yearly until further action is taken, and gave permission to the firm to advertise the fact that the National Council is preparing this material for the firm. These weekly messages will strike the keynote of the particular Sunday and at the same time give a definite suggestion of the desirability of using the envelope as it is intended to be used in support of the Church's General Program as well as the work of the local parish and diocese.

Department of Publicity reports covered The Spirit of Missions, The Church at Work, printing and publishing for the National Council and its departments, and other service features, together with the work of the National News Bureau, intermediary between the Church and the secular press. The circulation of The Spirit of Missions has reached 42,500, a gain of 7,500 subscribers during the year. In the past three years a deficit of $10,000 in the manufacturing cost of the magazine has been wiped out and this year for the first time in the history of the magazine a cash balance of $1,910 is recorded. The total of costs in the editing and publishing of the magazine, in addition to the manufacturing and distribution costs, is $14,000. This less $1,910 cash the magazine for 1926, a figure vastly exceeded by cash contributions made in response to presentation of missionary needs in its columns.

In 1926 there were four issues, a total of 2,320,000 copies, of The Church at Work. Of these 231,000 copies of each issue were distributed by mail to particular destinations within the Dioceses, while 349,000 were delivered by parcel post or express in bulk. There was a gain of one hundred and fifty parishes and missions which receive the paper. A total of 5,899 parishes and missions, a nearly complete coverage of active units, now receive this organ of the National Council. The Department of Publicity reported a gain of six Dioceses using the pledge card plan, a total of sixty-six Dioceses now insuring effective distribution. It was reported that twenty-six Dioceses use the direct mailing plan, the ideal mode of distribution by which the publication goes directly to the homes of communicants.

The Department of Religious Education asked for confirmation by the Council of the Rev. Dr. George Craig Stewart as Chairman of the Commission on Worship, of the Department of Religious Education, which was unanimously done.

The report of the Department of Christian Social Service was made by the Bishop of Georgia in the absence of the Executive Secretary, the Rev. Charles L. Lathrop, on account of illness.

The Department of Missions reported to the Council that on the death of the Emperor of Japan a cable had been sent to Bishop McKim expressing the heartfelt sympathy of the Bishops and congregations of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, to the Emperor, the Empress, the Empress Dowager, the Royal Family, and the people of the Empire of Japan, in the great loss sustained by them in the death of the Emperor Taiko. This was communicated through the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Baron Kijuro Shidehara, and graciously acknowledged by him, stating that His Majesty, the Emperor, deeply appreciated the condolence and had ordered him to convey his appreciation to the National Council.

Word was received of the impaired health of the Bishop of Southern Brazil, and the Department of Missions, as well as the National Council, expressed its sincere regret at hearing this news and urged the Bishop to follow the advice of his physician in the matter of a prolonged rest.

The Department of Missions in considering the very serious condition in China thought it fitting to ask the Presiding Bishop to request the bishops, clergy and lay people of the Church to offer united intercessions at this time that the Spirit of God may guide the people of China in their efforts to find a way to national life and unity, and may also guide other nations in their dealings with China to the end that God's will for China may be realized.

Bishop Darst made a brief report on the Bishops' Crusade, stressing the success which has attended the efforts of the Crusaders in all parts of the country. As a result of the Crusade in Charleston, S. C., one of the best young ministers of that city offered himself for service in the mission field. A resolution of the Convention of the Diocese was read, expressing the great appreciation of the Diocese for the splendid service rendered by the Crusaders, calling upon the Council to provide for a continuance of the work during years to come and pledging to the member of its own clergy volunteering for the mission field the prayers of the people of the Diocese.

Bishop Darst stressed particularly the necessity for the right kind of follow-up to conserve the splendid work done by the Crusaders.

After benediction the Council adjourned to meet again April 27 and 28.

Meeting of the Department of Missions

FEBRUARY 8, 1927.

The Department of Missions gave much time to the consideration of the very serious situation in China today. Bishop Roots, of Hankow, who recently visited Changsha, finds that the Kuomingtang or Nationalist Party, which controls China south of the Yangtse River, has made it a stronghold of revolutionary propaganda. "Anti-Imperialism" and "anti-capitalism" are the chief slogans. The radical wing of the Nationalist Party is in control and has organized the administration of the city on a communistic program. There are many evidences of Russian influence. For instance, the Bishop found the walls of the city placarded with posters, "Long live the October Revolution", referring to the Russian revolution of 1917.

Partly growing out of this condition there has come about a state of unrest among teachers and students in the mission schools. The Bishop found they desired to set aside the methods under which the Church has developed its educational system in China and substitute regulations put out by the Cantonese government. This would make impossible any Christian teaching as a part of the curriculum or any required attendance at religious services as part of the school routine. In place of the usual brief religious service with which the Church Schools in China have been accustomed to open, it was proposed that our schools should in future begin the day's work with an assembly at which patriotic songs would be sung, announcements made, with, on occasions, a brief address. Once a week the assembly would become a patriotic meeting and have the following additional features: Three bows to the national flag and the portrait of Dr. Sun Yat Sen, repetition by the school of Dr. Sun's will, and two or three minutes of silent meditation.

Dr. Sun's will reads as follows: "For forty years I have devoted my life to the cause of the People's Revolution with the object of securing freedom and equality for China. My experience, accumulated in these forty years, has fully convinced me that to attain our object we must arouse the people and fight side by side with such races of the world as have accorded us equal treatment. As the Revolution has not yet come to a complete success, my compatriots must continue to strive according to the teachings in my books, namely, 'The Plans for National Reconstruction', and 'The Three Principles of the People', and in my proclamation made during the first National Representative Convention, until our cherished aims have been completely achieved. The recently proposed People's Assembly and the abrogation of unequal treaties, especially, should be pressed to their realization at the earliest possible date."

The Department of Missions gave careful consideration to these proposals as interpreted by Bishop Gilman, Suffragan Bishop of Hankow. Its conclusion is embodied in the following statement, which was laid before the National Council and ratified by it:

Resolved, That the Department of Missions considers that there is nothing fundamentally inconsistent between the Christian character of a school and the conduct of a school on the basis of voluntary worship and instruction. The Department recognizes the desirability of a national system of education in China directed by Chinese authorities. The Church in the United States desires to do everything it conscientiously and properly can to adjust its educational work to such a system. Meanwhile, without attempting at this time to establish a permanent policy with regard to the conduct of schools in China, the Department of Missions, in view of the present attempts of military duress to enforce upon schools certain political regulations, considers that it is not practicable to conduct our Church Schools in accordance with the plans outlined in Bishop Roots' letter of December 24, and his cable of February 1. The Department takes this action with deep regret and will be ready at any time to consider plans for the conduct of the schools upon which the Bishops in China agree.

An interesting suggestion was received from Berkeley Divinity School, which is contemplating moving to New Haven in 1928. The proposal is to build a hostel in connection with the school in which apartments could be rented to missionaries home on furlough and opening to them the advantages of courses at Yale University as well as at the Divinity School, and also giving opportunity for the students at the Divinity School to hear of the work of the missionaries through special courses which the missionaries might give. The Department adopted a resolution stating that it looked with favor upon the proposal and would try to bring its facilities to the attention of its missionaries.

A proposal was received from the Bishop of Liberia, supported by the Rev. W. J. Reed, missionary at Bendoo, as to the use of the $5,000 from the Sunday-school Birthday Thank Offering which had been assigned to Liberia. The proposal was to put new buildings at the Bendoo station to be used as residences and for school purposes, which can be done for that sum of money and thus give a properly equipped station to the Church in Liberia. The Department approved the plan so clearly set forth by the Bishop and Mr. Reed and rejoiced that the money given by the children of our Church might be used in this very splendid way for the young people of Liberia.

On December 16, 1926, a fire broke out in St. Agnes' Hospital, in connection with St. Augustine's School for Negroes at Raleigh, N. C. While the building was insured, as is generally the case, the insurance will not cover the replacement, and an additional $10,000 will be needed to refit St. Agnes' Hospital to go on with its work. The Department of Missions and the Field Department authorized Bishop Cheshire and the Rev. E. H. Gould, President of St. Augustine's School, to make a special appeal in the amount of $10,000 for this work.

The Rev. W. O. D. Bright, who for the past fourteen years has served as Business Agent for the Montserrado District in Liberia, terminated his service with the Mission on January 1, 1927.

The Department learned with regret of the return to the United States of Dr. Theodore M. Bliss, for some time in charge of the Men's Section of the Church General Hospital in Wuchang, China, in the District of Hankow Dr. Bliss asked for indefinite leave of absence without salary. The Men's Department has been closed.

Provision was made for the rapid development taking place in that part of Kyoto called Shimogamo. It seemed necessary to Bishop Nichols to make provision for the services of the Church. No suitable building could be found, and a member of St. John's congregation agreed to purchase land, erect a building and rent it to us for this purpose. It seemed desirable to Bishop Nichols to purchase this land and building, especially as it occupies a splendid location and the money, therefore, could be taken from a Loan Fund in the District of Kyoto. The approval of the Department was given to this arrangement, the amount to be returned to the Loan Fund through a monthly rental payment.

The Department appointed eleven missionaries to fill vacancies, five to the Foreign, three to the Latin American, and three to the Domestic Field. Two were also employed in the field.

The Deficit.

Since our last detailed report on the deficit the following Dioceses and Districts have reached the one hundred per cent mark:

Delaware and Pennsylvania.

This makes sixty-eight Dioceses and Districts which have completed their work, out of eighty making definite pledges.

The situation as of February 7, 1927, was:

Deficit as of December 31, 1925	$1,534,303.99
Assumed by Dioceses and Districts	1,406,650.00
Subscriptions and definite assurances	1,305,611.00
Of which there has been paid in cash	1,268,838.00

Bishop Brent Will Preach Opening Sermon at Lausanne Conference.

The program for the World Conference on Faith and Order is approaching completion. At the last meeting of the Business Committee held in New York, Corresponding Secretary Ralph W. Brown reported the action taken by the special committee on the selection of speakers held at New College, London, on December 15 and attended by the Rev. Alfred E. Garvie, D. D., Chairman; the Most Rev. Metropolitan Germanos, and the Rev. A. O. T. Hellerstrom (for the Most Rev. Nathan Soderblom, D. D.). The Rev. Canon H. N. Bate was also present by invitation and Mr. Brown was there as the representative of Bishop Charles H. Brent, Chairman of the Continuation Committee.

In harmony with the recommendations of the London meeting, the Business Committee decided that the opening date of the conference should be Wednesday, August 3. The conference will begin with a service in the Lausanne Cathedral and Bishop Brent has been invited to preach the opening sermon that morning.

The sessions of the conference will be held at Lausanne University. On the afternoon of August 3, Dr. Garvie will present the program and suggestions as to procedure; Canon Bate will speak on the questions to be considered, and their relation to the program, and there will also be one speaker on behalf of the Business Committee.

Morning sessions of the full conference will begin at 9:40 A. M. with devotions which will last for fifteen minutes. After the two main subjects of the morning, there will be a hymn and a brief prayer.

On account of the size of the conference, the large number of interests represented and the diverse nature of the program, it has been decided to divide the representatives into sections, each of which will discuss one subject only. In making up these sections, the preferences of the individual representatives will be considered. Each section will appoint its own findings committee, who will report first to the section and subsequently to the conference itself upon the subject assigned to it. Should two or more sections be dealing with the same subject, it will be necessary to appoint one committee, with representatives of each section, to draft a common report. The section charged to deal with a given subject will include those persons invited to open the discussion of that subject in the conference. A member of one section who desires to speak upon another subject in the meeting of another section will be allowed to do so at the beginning of a sitting upon the invitation of the chairman of that section.

Statements prepared by these sections will be brought before the entire conference. If alterations are proposed, the conference may refer them to the Drafting Committee for consideration and report. The following paragraph has been inserted in the rules of procedure:

"No statement shall be declared to be adopted unless it be accepted either unanimously or nemine contradicente. In case a statement does not gain this measure of acceptance, the Conference shall determine what further steps, if any, shall be taken on that subject."

The Business Committee has issued a statement emphasizing the need of preliminary meetings to be attended by groups of representatives from each country in Europe for the purpose of considering the material proposed for discussion. In the United States it has been suggested that sectional meetings of Lausanne representatives be held during the next few months wherever such meetings can be organized. The American Committee, under the chairmanship of Charles E. Hughes, which is engaged in raising funds to finance the conference, reports that more than half of the $200,000 needed has been paid in or pledged. A number of the local committees organized to raise funds in various large cities have not yet made their final reports.

Rt. Rev. H. St. G. Tucker, D. D., Coadjutor

The Crusade In Alexandria.

In many ways the Bishops' Crusade in Alexandria, February 6 to 11, went far beyond the hopes of its promoters. Thoroughly representative congregations each night filled St. Paul's Church to its capacity. From fifty to eighty vested singers rendered the music, and twenty-four clergymen were in the chancel and pews. The Crusaders, the Rev. K. B. O'Ferrell, of Cleveland, Ohio, and the Rev. Floyd Rogers, of Asheville, N. C., delighted every one by their constructive sermons and addresses. Two conferences for the clergy and two for women proved unusually worth while. The daily services for children were held in Christ Church. The Crusaders were entertaining as well as instructive, and the services were well attended, the church being filled the last two days.

Bishop Tucker presided Wednesday and Thursday evenings, and Bishop Darst presided on Friday evening, when the clergy (vested) renewed their ordination vows, and the congregation renewed their baptismal promises.

The foundation of the Crusade's success was in the genuine and wholehearted cooperation of the rectors, vestries and women of the four churches in Alexandria, which has surely laid a foundation for better work in the future. The people heard sane and searching messages, free from sensationalism or eccentricity, sermons tending to make people uncomfortable, yet always showing in Jesus Christ the sure way of redeeming human life. The clergy present planned with Bishop Tucker's counsel, the continuance of the Crusade in their various parishes. It is generally realized that the work is now only begun.

The Crusade Proceeds.

A number of splendid missions have recently been held at various points in the Diocese.

At Christ Church, Martinsville, which is at present without a rector, the Rev. Beverley M. Boyd, of Abingdon, and the Rev. John S. Wellford, of Norton, were the Crusaders during the week beginning January 30. The mission began with a sermon by Mr. Boyd on Sunday morning, on the subject of Christian Discipleship, following which Mr. Boyd and Mr. Wellford celebrated the Holy Communion. From Monday to Friday there were afternoon conferences and evening services. The attendance at balance, leaves $12,090 total cost of all of the services was splendid, and indicated especially the fine way in which the congregation has held together, even in the absence of a rector. Especially worthy of appreciation was the splendid cooperation given to the mission by the other Christian denominations in Martinsville, whose members attended in large numbers.

At St. Thomas' Church, Christiansburg, the Rev. James A. Figg, rector, the Rev. John F. Coleman, of Pulaski, gave a fine series of conferences and Crusade sermons from January 16 to 21. The congregation included not only the members of St. Thomas' Church, but of all the other churches in the town as well. On the final night rededication cards were presented; these being signed by nearly every member of the local church.

At Grace Church, Radford, the Rev. Mr. Figg, rector, the Rev. Thomas M. Browne, rector of St. John's Church, Lynchburg, was the Crusader from January 23 to 29, inclusive. This was an unusually successful mission. The congregation filled the church, and the people became so enthused that they were anxious for the Crusade to continue through the second week. Although this was impossible, Mr. Browne did return for the evening service of the twenty-ninth, it having been necessary for him to conduct the morning service on that day in his own church.

At Christ Church, Blacksburg, the Rev. J. Manly Cobb, rector, the Rev. Dr. Churchill J. Gibson, of R. E. Lee Memorial Church, Lexington, held a mission from January 23 to 28. The evening services and three afternoon conferences were held in Christ Church. Also on each evening Dr. Gibson spoke to the students of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute at the Y. M. C. A. Chapel, and during the week he held special children's services, preached at "High Top" Mission, near Blacksburg, and spoke to the High School and the Hi-Y Club. As one of the results of this mission the Rev. Mr. Cobb plans to conduct a special ladies' Bible class during Lent. It was noted that among the number of rededication cards presented at the close of the services several were signed by members of other denominations.

At St Thomas' Church, Abingdon, the Rev. Beverley M. Boyd, rector, the Rev. Alfred Rives Berkeley, of St. John's, Roanoke, was the missioner from January 23 to 28. During the week, in addition to the evening services, he conducted a devotional hour with the Woman's Auxiliary, chapel exercises at Martha Washington College and Stonewall Jackson Institute, and made an address to the Rotary Club, which was enthusiastically received.

At St. Andrew's Church, Clifton Forge, a mission was to have been held from January 31 to February 6, by the Rev. E. H. Ward, D. D., of Hot Springs. A severe cold prevented Dr. Ward from keeping this engagement, and the rector of St. Andrew's, the Rev. Charles F. Magee, held the mission himself. He conducted two afternoon conferences, one on prayer and one on the Sacraments, and preached every evening, but one, at which time the Rev John J. Gravatt, Jr., of Trinity Church, Staunton, made the address. The attendance at the services was excellent and the mission was a great success.

Two Clergymen Improve In Health.

The Rev. Edward W. Hughes, of Christ Church, Pearisburg, who has recently suffered a severe illness, is rapidly recovering his health and strength and has now gone away for a rest, expecting to resume active work in the near future. Soon after his return to his charge he will hold the opening service in the new church at Pearisburg, which was erected to take the place of the church which was destroyed by fire in the spring of 1926.

The many friends of the Rev. G. Otis Mead, whose illness has heretofore been noted in these columns, will be rejoiced to learn that he is rapidly regaining his strength and has been out of the hospital for some time, and is resuming to a certain extent his active work in the parish.

The Gift of King George V to The Cathedral.

The silver alms dish which, as announced in the Church press, the King of England has had made for the Cathedral of St. John, in New York, was presented by the British Ambassador, Sir Esme Howard, at the eleven o'clock service Sunday morning, February 13. The Ambassador was attended by Major W. H. S. Alston, Assistant Military Attache to the British Embassy. Sir Harry Armstrong, the British Consul General, New York, and Lady Armstrong were also present.

The gift was accepted by Bishop Manning in his own name, in the name of the trustees of the Cathedral and of the clergy and laity of the Diocese of New York.

The following description of the gift has been furnished by the British Library of Information, New York:

The alms dish, which His Majesty King George is presenting to the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, is of hand-wrought and chiseled silver mercurial gilt. It has been designed and made by Omar Ramsden in consultation with and under the advice of the Chairman and Council of the British Institute of Industrial Art. It is some sixteen and a half inches in diameter and two inches deep, and it weighs fifty-one ounces troy.

The center is occupied by a boldly designed rendering of the Royal Arms, in repouse and chiselled work. Around this is the inscription: "Ecclesiae. Cathedrali. D. Johannis. Evang. Apud. Novo-Eboracenses. d. d. Georgius V Rex, Imperator. A. S. MDCCCCXXVI."

Translated this means: "To the Cathedral Church of St. John, Evangelist, at New York, from George V, King, Emperor, in the Year of Salvation 1926."

Radiating from this center rondel is a series of eight cavette depressions, separated by sharply defined and expanding flutings. These latter pass under a strengthening moulding and develop themselves into a wide serrated outer flange. This flange bears one ornament only, the Eagle, symbol of St. John. The flange is strengthened by a solid band of mouldings following the outer edge of alternating curved and angular lines.

The New Church of The Heavenly Rest.

Manhattan is to have a new church to cost $3,250,000. It is the Church of the Heavenly Rest, formerly at Fifth Avenue and Forty-Fifth Street, moved north on the same avenue to Ninetieth Street. It was consolidated with the Church of the Beloved Disciple some time since, its property sold, new plans drawn, and now another $1,000,000 is to be asked from the public to create the new plant. The Beloved Disciple Church is retained as a chapel. The rector is the Rev. Dr. Henry Darlington, son of Bishop Darlington, of Harrisburg.

In the main, the new edifice is Gothic, but it follows no school, and copies no other edifice. Some account is taken of the fact that it may in time be surrounded by great apartments or even business houses, and so mass is sought in the outer design, to offset in some degree the mass of buildings that are likely to surround it. At present beautiful homes are all about it, but Fifth Avenue homes, even as far north as Ninetieth Street, are giving place to apartments, owing to the enormous cost of carrying a Fifth Avenue location.

The new plant contains the usual features of Church, Chapel, and Parish House. The church will seat one thousand.

The Crusade In New Orleans.

The Bishops' Crusade in New Orleans began on Sunday, January 23, and extended through the following Friday. Fortunately, the program was launched in connection with the Annual Diocesan Council, thus assuring the attendance of the clerical and lay delegates from the whole Diocese.

From the opening meetings on Sunday to the close, success marked this great spiritual movement. Seldom, if ever, have the people responded with a like enthusiasm. Christ Church Cathedral was crowded to capacity for six successive evenings. On Sunday and Friday several hundred persons were turned away, after all available space, even standing room, had been filled.

The combined choirs of the city, nearly two hundred voices, sang at both the Sunday and Friday mass meetings. For the intervening nights, the choirs rotated in groups of two. One of the musical features which will never be forgotten was the singing of the Crusaders' Hymn in procession (as sung by the English Church on its Cathedral pilgrimage).

A unique feature marked the closing service on Friday evening. Just before Bishop Howden's final sermon, the chairman of the committee summoned all the Diocesan Crusaders, those who will carry on the message, into the chancel of the Cathedral to receive the charge and blessing of the Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D. With the Crusaders before him, Bishop Sessums delivered to them a simple, powerful charge, bidding them carry the all-sufficing Gospel of Christ to the Church people of Louisiana. When this was concluded, all the Crusaders knelt to receive the Episcopal Blessing.

Then, at the conclusion of the service, Bishop Howden called upon the congregation to stand up with him and renew their vows of Baptism. Thus the final note was struck—reconsecration and rededication to the service of the Master.

The immediate success was due, of course, to the consecrated and untiring labors of the National Crusaders, Bishop Howden, of New Mexico; the Rev. Robert Spencer, of Kansas City; Mr. Thomas Dix, of St. Louis.

Bishop Howden preached at all the evening mass meetings. His subjects were: "Man's Quest for God"; "The World's Need of Christ"; "The Formation of Christian Character"; "The Supreme Loyalty"; "The Fellowship of Christ"; "The Supreme Need".

The Rev. Mr. Spencer conducted the afternoon conferences through Wednesday, when he was regretfully recalled to his parish. The conduct of the conference is admittedly a difficult work; he acquitted himself with honor. His talk to the children on "The Cities of Refuge" was notably good.

Mr. Dix made the special addresses to the supper groups, the Church School, the Men's Club, and the Young People. He also assisted with the afternoon conferences. His special theme was the Christian's daily taking up his cross in following the Master.

Teams of clergy and laity are carrying the message to the smallest missions in the Diocese. Then, practically every parish will continue its prayer groups indefinitely.

Crusade Services.

Beginning Sunday, January 23, and ending Friday, January 28, the Rt. Rev. Theodore DuBose Bratton, LL. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Mississippi, and the Rev. Pembroke W. Reed, of Richmond, Va., conducted the mass meeting of the Bishops' Crusade with gratifying results in St. James' Church, Wilmington, N. C.

The Rev. H. F. Kloman, of Cumberland, Md., and the Rev. Pembroke W. Reed, of Richmond, Va., conducted a successful mass meeting as part of the Bishops' Crusade in Christ Church, Elizabeth City, N. C., from January 30 to February 4, inclusive.

The Rt. Rev. Frederick Foote Johnson, D. D., Bishop of Missouri, and the Rev. H. F. Kloman, of Cumberland, Md., brought powerful messages to their congregations during the mass meeting of the Bishops' Crusade in St. Peter's Church, Washington, North Carolina, beginning February 6, and ending February 11.

Beginning Monday, February 14, every clergyman in the Diocese of East Carolina, will go forth as a Diocesan Crusader, carrying the message of the Crusade to the remotest corners of the Diocese. A mission will be conducted in every parish and mission in the Diocese.

Students Serving Missions.

The following students of DuBose Memorial Training School, Monteagle, Tenn., are serving in the Diocese of East Carolina during their vacation period: Mr. William H. R. Jackson has charge of Grace Church, Plymouth, and St. Luke's, Roper; Mr. William A. Smith is working in the Lumberton Field, with the exception of Christ Church, Hope Mills; and Mr. Frederick J. Drew is serving Christ Church, Hope Mills, St. Phillip's, Campbellton, and St. Luke's, Tolar Hart, where he is living. The last two missions belong to St. John's Parish, Fayetteville, and are under the direction of the Rev. Archer Boogher, rector.

The Rev. G. F. Cameron, rector of St. James' Church, Ayden, was elected a member of the Executive Council and made Vice-Chairman of the Diocesan Department of Publicity at the meeting on January 27.

Crusade Services in Greenwood.

In the Church of the Nativity, Greenwood, the Rev. L. W. Rose, rector, the spokesman for the Bishops' Crusade was the Rev. Dr. A. B. Kinsolving, of St. Paul's, Baltimore.

For a week before his coming there were preparatory services held each afternoon in the Rose Community Building. These services were well attended and were deeply devotional.

The Crusade services began with the Holy Communion at 7:30 A. M. on January 30. At eleven o'clock the church was filled to overflowing and the congregation at night was just as good, made up, as it was, not only of our own Church people, but of representative members of other Christian Churches.

Services were held daily at 10 A. M. and 7:30 P. M. In the morning Dr. Kinsolving gave what might be called lecture-sermons on the History of the Church of the First Days. Not many of our parish clergymen are equipped for this sort of work. The average congregation knows nothing and cares less for what comes under the head of Church History. Especially is this the case when the speaker must cover so much space in such a short time. Suffice it to say that Dr. Kinsolving was equal to the occasion and the people showed their interest and appreciation by coming in ever-increasing numbers day by day.

At night the missioner preached on the great central, fundamental doctrines of the Gospel as the Lord hath commanded and as this Church hath received the same. He put first things first. The burden of his message was on the affirmative, the positive, the constructive side of things rather than on the negative, prohibitory, protesting side of things.

On Friday, at 10 A. M., the missioner gave an instructive and devotional address on The Lord's Supper and the benefits received thereby. More than a hundred people gathered about the Table of the Lord, among them a number belonging to other Churches.

The Bishops' Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade began in this Diocese at Salisbury, on Sunday morning, February 6, and was conducted by the Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of West Virginia, and the Rev. Nathaniel B. Groton, rector of St. Thomas' Church, White Marsh, Pa. The congregations filled the church to its capacity. Bishop Strider preached at both services. His theme at the morning service was "Faith", and at the evening service, "Right and Wrong". His eloquent words made a deep impression upon all who heard them. Bishop Strider also preached on Monday and Tuesday evenings to large congregations. Each morning there was an early celebration of the Holy Communion, and each afternoon conferences were conducted by Rev. Mr. Groton at two-thirty and four P. M.

On Wednesday, February 9, the Crusaders began a series of mission services at Christ Church, Cambridge, the Rev. W. D. Gould, rector.

Further plans for the Crusade in this Diocese provide for services by the Crusading Bishop and the Rev. Mr. Groton at Trinity Cathedral, Easton, February 13, 14 and 15; Emmanuel Church, Chestertown, February 16, 17 and 18; and Trinity Church, Elkton, February 20, 21 and 22.

It is planned by the Diocesan Commission to extend the Crusade into every parish and mission throughout the Diocese.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

Crusade Preaching Missions.

The clergy of Long Island, under the leadership of Bishop Stires and the Diocesan Commission on Evangelism, have undertaken a preaching mission in every parish of the Diocese, beginning Septuagesima Sunday evening and concluding the following Friday night. Every clergyman has been assigned as mission preacher to another congregation than his own. Each rector, returning to his own church on Sexagesima, will have a chance to assimilate the results of another's work there before Lent, and endeavor to make this Lent more valuable because of the Bishops' Crusade and the subsequent mission.

Out in the highways,
Out in the byways,
Seek ye the sheep who are going astray;
Out in sin's highways,
Out in sin's byways,
Winning them over to walk in Christ's way.

Out in youth's highways,
Out in youth's byways,
Seek ye the lambs as they frolic and play;
Not in the old ways,
Not in the cold ways,
But through thy loving, ye teach them to pray.

Out in life's highways,
Out in life's byways,
Thither go healing the sick and the blind;
Make them love's highways,
Make them love's byways,
So all the people their Saviour may find.

The Consolations of God.

We must break away from our forms of popular speech which continually misrepresent and dishonor God in His relation to Death: we must teach ourselves to stop saying at the death-beds of our friends: "God is taking them away from us. God hates Death. Death is His enemy as much as ours. Death is a catastrophe and a blot on creation. God's proclamation against Death is explicit and oft repeated. Read it in the magnificent prophecy of Hosea: "I will ransom them from the power of the Grave; I will redeem them from the Death. O Death, I will be thy plagues. O Grave! I will be thy destruction." Death is not the outcome of God's will. Death is the outcome of natural law, the effect of natural causes, in a created order perverted and spoiled by sin. "By man sin entered into the world, and death by sin." Scarlet fever smites the dear child's body and leaves it a ruin. We torture our hearts to make them say this fearful paradox: "God's will has done this, therefore I turn to God to comfort me." How many hearts have bled, blasphemed and broken in the excruciating effort to ask comfort from Him Who killed the child. We try to train ourselves to believe that this is "kissing the rod". We are wrong. "What took this child away?" Shall we say, the will of God? No, let us say the truth; bad drainage and germ-infection. And God sorrows with us as much as any earthly friends, for He no more did it than did they. What does it mean then: "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord?" The Hebrew word is clear: "The Lord gave and the Lord hath received; blessed be His name." Who could bless the Lord for taking away our beloved? But we can bless Him that since the sad and broken natural order of disease and death has conquered our loved one, the Lord has received to His eternal paradise the spirit we loved. Once only in the Bible, so far as I know, is it said of a human being: "God took him away," and that man was Enoch—who did not die. God for some reason made him an exception to the natural order. And to those who believe in the pre-millennial coming of our Lord, one of the bright thoughts about it is that they who are living on the earth when He comes, as His disciples, shall be gathered to Him without death. "They that remain, that are left, unto the coming of the Lord shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord." "We shall not all sleep."

God, then, being not the Author of our troubles, of our sicknesses, of our deaths, but looking upon all these things rather as sad and fearful interruptions of His plan for us, has sought to comfort man by pouring forth consolations into his life. And what are these consolations of God?

The Incarnation is one of God's consolations that into the very midst of this broken order has entered in human form, with human sensibilities and human sympathies, the Lord Jesus Christ, to be tempted like as we are, to bear our griefs, to carry our sorrows, to taste death for every man, to show us in His resurrection that there is victory in store for us; to lift up our eyes toward that new order, which is but the original order brought back across the chaos of sin and made once more the inheritance of redeemed humanity. "I am the Resurrection and the Life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die."

The Divine Word is one of God's consolations. "Are the consolations of God too small for thee and the Word that dealeth gently with thee?" Such is the full reading of that splendid verse in Job. How gently deals the Word of God with all sorrowing hearts that hear and understand its truest meaning! How it urges us, counsels us, pleads with us, not to confuse these agonizing catastrophes of sin and death with the will and the heart of God. How it pleads with us not to mistake the devil's malignant will for God's blessed will; not to load on God the responsibility for sorrows that are the offspring of sin! "This is the will of God," it says, "even your sanctification." And amidst the bitterness of our lot, in sorrow and death, it ever protests: "God has not done this—God is Love. Come to me, ye that are heavy laden—I will give you rest."

The Holy Spirit is one of the consolations of God. The Comforter, the Strength-Maker, the Paraclete, the Advocate is He; the ever-present Friend; Revealer of the presence of the unseen Lord; Creator in our hearts of that vision of things to come, when the new order of redemption shall be consummated in the manifestation of the King, when this corruptible shall put on incorruption and this mortal shall put on immortality, when sorrow and signing shall flee away, when Death shall be swallowed up in victory.—Rev. C. C. Hall in "Does God Send Trouble"?

"Thoughts After Furlough."

About a year ago the Church papers published some "Thoughts Before Furlough", from "V. H. G.", of the Diocese of Anking. V. H. G. has since returned from furlough and writes in the Anking News Letter something that may be called "Thoughts After Furlough". He says:

"We want the definite sympathy and prayers of those who have commissioned us to represent them in China. Missions have so long been the plaything of sentiment, they have been advertised with such fatuous optimism, as though we needed only some automatic turnstile to register the tumbling entries into the kingdom of heaven. . . . No intelligent interest in missions can survive a diet like this. The tragedy, the splendour, the need of missions, are forgotten, our great enterprise reduced to as pallid an imitation of religion as a Hollywood portrayal of Hamlet.

"Until people at home feel that they have more than a monetary part in our work they will never regard us as more than a luxury, a symbol of their benevolence. They will not realize that their own future as Christians is vitally concerned with the successful issue of our mission. We cannot thrill them to a whole-hearted interest until we are honest with them, until we cease lulling them into the belief that our record is one of unretarded progress, that we only need more money, more workers, to gather the harvest.

"I think if we frankly discussed our problems and our mistakes, when we speak to audiences at home, if we admitted that pride in the mere efficiency of secular education too often has usurped the place which religion should occupy in our hearts; if we took into our confidence those many thousands at home who wish us well and made them feel that our fight is their fight, our problems are theirs to share with us, that we are not superior beings suffused in a mist of sentiment nor so much wiser than those we have come to convert, that we, as individuals, possess no native aptitude of race such as will enable us, ipso facto, to do good instead of harm, then the welfare of our mission would come much closer to the conscience of the Church at home.

"I found it so; I found people who were bored by the conventional panegyrics . . . awoke to a new and refreshing interest when they realized that we had great problems, great difficulties, often the result of our equally great mistakes. When they heard of riots in our schools, when they heard of Christian (sic) boys throwing the fragments of Bibles and prayer-books to the winds, when they heard of the dry-rot of a time-serving professionalism among many of our adherents, they were not inclined to be discouraged. They opened their eyes and listened. They felt, perhaps for the first time, that here was a time for them to help with something better than money, here was a time when their prayers were needed.

"The Christian Church has come to China before and has disappeared utterly, and it can disappear again, despite our pretentious buildings and the parliamentary rectitude of our organizations, unless we can enlist this spirit. . . . Unless we do this, until we arouse the whole Church by the frank discussion of mistakes, by an open-minded discernment of evil stir them to put in God the trust they put in organization and to use the sacraments as effective means of His power, we shall not be able to sing 'Onward, Christian Soldiers', without the shaming sense that our actions make parody of the words."

Big Moments in Little Lives.

Too often the big moment in a small child's life is wholly overlooked, not even recognized many times, by the parents. These moments are very important and really need watching for.

When Bobby was taken out for the first time on a star-lit night, he wondered at the glory of the heavens. In his early-to-bed regime he had never stood under a sky with twinkling stars, and as he looked he marveled, and suddenly tightening his grip on his mother's hand, he said joyously: "Why, mother, I fink I almost seed God." This was indeed a big moment. Fortunately for Bobby, he had a mother who understood; she knew that her child had visualized God in His power more than he had ever done in his baby life before. This moment needed her attention.

Billy, who was a sadly wilful child and was always being checked or chided on account of some misdemeanor, quite unaccountably did an unusually kind, self-sacrificing act. When he realized that he had been responsible for this voluntary goodness, he said in great surprise: "Why, muvver, I isn't all bads, is I?" This was a big moment in his life, and his mother, recognizing the truth of his statement, began at once to take a different course in her training of Billy. Today Billy and she have found out that her small son has many more "goods" than "bads", and they are both enjoying the quest for them. Billy has to be punished only rarely now because in a moment when his own self awakened to his actions his mother awakened also.

Little Betty, who sat upon the floor with a large family of dolls surrounding her, said with quiet decision: "I want to be real mother to real children some day, mother." She wasn't laughed at nor told not to be thinking such silly things, yet she was helped in her awakening moment. Taking her on her lap, her mother told her that to be a mother was one of the most wonderful things on earth, and that both she and Betty were already interested in just that thing. Then the mother told her that each day she would try to help her in the things that went to make for lovely motherhood.

Can any parent afford to miss these moments?—moments when the soul of the child begins to be felt by itself; moments when some divine touch reaches the child and opens up the future pathway of life; moments that need the companionship of a true comrade.—Margaret C. Rhoads.

"The object of scholarship, the object of all knowledge is to understand; is to comprehend; is to know what the need of mankind is. This is the reason why scholarship has usually been more fruitful when associated with religion, and scholarship has never, so far as I can at this moment recollect, been associated with any religion, except the religion of Jesus Christ."—Woodrow Wilson.

For the Young Folks

An Early Hymn.

Shepherd of tender youth,
Guiding in love and truth
Through devious ways.
Christ, our triumphant King,
Welcome thy Name to sing;
Hither our children bring
To shout Thy praise.

Thou art our Holy Lord,
The all-subduing word,
Healer of strife.
Thou didst Thyself abase,
That from sin's deep disgrace
Thou mightest save our race,
And give us life.

Thou art the great High Priest,
Thou hast prepared the Feast
Of Heavenly Love;
While in our mortal pain
None calls on Thee in vain;
Help Thou dost not disdain,
Help from above.

Ever be Thou our Guide,
Our Shepherd and our pride,
Our staff and song;
Jesu, thou Christ of God,
By Thy perennial Word,
Lead us where Thou has trod,
Make our faith strong.

So now and till we die,
Sound we our praises high,
And joyful song;
Infants and the glad throng
Who to Thy church belong
Unite to swell the song
To Christ our King.

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

The Strength of Jesus.

M. L. G.

Do you remember the story of St. Christopher, children? At first his name was Offero, and he started out to serve the strongest king in all the world. From one to another kingdom he went, seeking the strongest king. One king was kindly, but afraid of his neighbor king. The neighbor king was strong, but used his strength cruelly, so that Offero knew there was weakness back of it. Nowhere could he find the king he dreamed of serving, until one day, as Offero came to the bank of a rushing river, an old man asked what he sought. "The strongest king in all the world, that I may serve him," replied Offero. The old man answered, "The strongest King is the Lord Christ"; and he told Offero how, if he would stay there at the riverside, bearing the travelers over in his strong arms, he would be doing service to the strongest King. This Offero did, and one day he had the joy of bearing over the river the Christ-Child Himself.

It is true as the old man said to Offero, "The strongest King is the Lord Christ". Jesus was for many years a carpenter. He could hammer straight and lift heavy beams. He could walk all day and spend the night wherever it found Him, under the stars. He drove men and cattle out of the temple, single-handed, and overturned their tables. He went without food for forty days. And at the end He spent a night offering, both of body and soul, beyond our power to imagine, before He fell under the cruel cross on the road to Calvary.

But Jesus had another kind of strength. It was this higher strength, which we call moral strength, that enabled Him to make His way from crowds that would make Him a King, or stone Him. He did not use physical force; but the crowds fell back and let Him through. Greater than all was the strength of His Spirit; for in that strength He let Himself be bound, struck, scourged, mocked, crucified.

Are you strong, boys and girls? Be glad, for Christ needs strong friends. But never forget how He spent His strength only for others. And how in Him the higher strength of the Spirit held in check the physical. Not only strength we must have, but self-control. Not only self-control, but self-giving. So, like St. Christopher, we, too, shall serve

The Strongest King in All the World.

The Shoemaker, the Miser and the Golden Slippers.

Once upon a time there was a little old man who would not walk downstairs, but when he wanted to go from the second to the first floor of his house slid down the banisters. He did not put his foot over the railing and slide down on his tummy, as you would, because the banisters of his house were not built so that he could. His house was very old, and the stairs were very narrow and steep, almost like a ladder. They were built into the wall, and on either side of the stairs was a smooth round railing, like a long curtain pole, to take hold of as you walked up and down. When the little old man wished to come downstairs, he grasped the railing with his two hands. Then he lifted his two feet and fft—in half a minute less than no time he was at the bottom of the stairs!

He had always lived in that house; and he had started to go downstairs in that way when he was a little boy. Day after day he kept it up; he grew to be a man, and married, and brought his wife to live with him in the old house, and still he kept it up. And then he grew to be very old, and white-haired, and stoop-shouldered; and still he slid down the banisters, and not even his wife could stop him.

And she tried to stop him; yes, she tried very hard indeed. For at the foot of the stairs was a little hall, and directly opposite the stairs was the front door. The hall was so small that when the front door was opened it almost touched the bottom step. The wife was always afraid that her husband would come sliding down the banisters just as some one came in at the front door, and that, if that person should happen to be a customer, he would tell other customers how badly he had been startled, which of course would ruin the trade.

The little old man was a shoemaker. There was a big room to the right of the front hall; and that was his shop and workroom. On the left of the little front hall was another big room; and there the shoemaker and his wife ate and lived. They slept upstairs.

"Husband," said the wife, "do you not think that today you could walk downstairs on your two feet, the way other people do? For see, the Princess might come to try on her wedding slippers; and the moment she opened the door you would be sliding down the stairs, and she would be frightened into a faint; and that would be the ruin of both of us."

"But I will not be sliding down the stairs when the Princess comes," replied the shoemaker. "I will be working in my shop. For forty years I have been making shoes; for forty years you have told me that some day I will frighten a customer and ruin the trade. But in all that time, wife, not a single customer has seen me slide down the stairs; and as for the trade, why, we are better known and more prosperous now than ever before. For who of all the shoemakers was chosen to make the Princess' wedding slippers? Put yourself at ease, wife; though I slide down the stairs, the Princess shall never see me."

He had spoken the truth; although so little and old and bent, he was the most skilful shoemaker in the land, and for that reason he had been chosen to make the Princess' wedding slippers. And beautiful slippers they were, white with little red heels, and embroidered all over in gold. The shoemaker worked on them behind the window of his shop; and crowds gathered outside the window to watch him. And at night the slippers stood in the window, for those to see who had not been able to look in during the day. The shoemaker was not in the least afraid the shop would be broken into and the slippers stolen. For, although the slippers were covered with gold thread worked in an exquisite pattern, and were very valuable indeed, the people of that town were known far and wide for their honesty; there was not a thief or robber for miles about; and the shoemaker might have put the slippers on his doorstep at night, and there he would have found them next morning.

No, there was not a thief in the land, but there was a miser. The miser was an old, thin man with crafty eyes always alert for the glitter of gold. The miser had never stolen anything in his life, for he had never seen anything he wanted, except gold pieces, and of these he had such a quantity that he was wholly unable to count them, although he spent all day long and every day trying to do so. But when the miser chanced to pass the shoemaker's window, and saw the Princess' slippers worked all over in their delicate pattern of gold he made up his mind that those slippers he must have, if he had to turn robber to get them.

At length the slippers were finished. They stood side by side in their delicate golden splendor, in a rosewood case lined with white satin. And the people who passed looked at them for the last time; for the next day the Princess would come for them, and then she was to be married.

Very late that night pit-pat, pit-pat came the miser to the shoemaker's house, with a sack to carry away the slippers in. The shoemaker's door was not locked, for no doors in that village were ever locked at night. The miser walked into the little hall, and into the workshop to the right of the hall. He walked on tiptoe and tried to be as quiet as a mouse; but he had never stolen anything before, and did not quite know how to proceed. In his own ears his steps sounded as loud as if he had been walking with hobnailed boots on a stone floor. He started when the boards creaked under his feet and almost turned and ran when a mouse scurried away from him. But those slippers he must have; and he tiptoed up to the show window and took the slippers from their case and put them in his sack and tiptoed back into the hall with the sack in his hand. He took long steps and nearly lost his balance trying to be quiet. And he was as frightened and nervous and jumpy as if the walls had been full of eyes.

The miser was not the only nervous person in the house that night. The little old shoemaker had worked so long and so hard to finish the slippers for the Princess' wedding day that he was too tired now to sleep. He lay awake worrying. He did not worry lest the slippers be stolen, but he was afraid that a mouse might find and gnaw them and undo all his labor, and then he any his wife would be ruined indeed. He turned cold and trembling when he thought what might happen if any ill befell the slippers.

"I should not have gone to bed," said the shoemaker. "I should have watched by the slippers all night. What's that?"

The shoemaker sat up in bed. Surely he heard something; surely a board was creaking. He put one foot out of bed, then the other, and crept to the top of the stairs and listened. No, his ears had not deceived him; something was moving about below. He would just go down and take the slippers up with him, and then the mice might scamper as much as they pleased, and the shoemaker would have a wink of sleep before morning.

He grasped the railing on either side of the stairs as his habit was, put his feet out before him, and fft—down he went to the bottom of the stairs just as the miser stepped into the hall with his sack in his hand.

The miser uttered a screech, and without waiting to see what it was that had dropped on him from above, he threw up his hands, let fall the bag and bolted through the door into the street. He ran away from the shop as fast as his long legs could carry him; and where he stopped I do not know.—Beatrice Brown in Youth's Companion.

Jonah.

Louis Tucker.

It could only have happened on the Spanish Main. There is no other place where the sea is deep enough, at least in monkey latitudes.

The tree was magnificent, a Ceiba, a cubic acre of flowers. It grew on the edge of a cliff and half of its great branches stretched out over the waves, a hundred feet above the blue. Great lianas, vines as thick as cables, hung almost to the water, which here was deeper than easy sounding. Down and down the blue abyss sinks, half a mile or more, till in the flat ooze at the roots of the eternal hills the deep-sea squid find feeding-ground and refuge.

Because of squid the sperm whale use the place, and more than once, when they came up to blow, I heard and saw them. Looking down from above it was like watching blimps in air or giant tadpoles in an aquarium. Sea-water, seen from above, is like fine glass for clearness; but now and then the setting sun dazzles along the deep until the water is like glass, indeed, but looking-class, and none can see below it.

On such an afternoon Leviathan lay dreaming, idly digesting squid, his hump above the ripples. Two monkeys chased each other through the Ceiba in fright and frolic, and one, a long-tailed lunatic, slid chattering down a long liana, the others following. They fought a moment, but the end of the liana, where the salt water sometimes touches, was spray-killed and rotted. It gave. The lowest monkey leapt for the only solid thing in sight and landed on Leviathan as on an island.

It took him for an island. It stood up and chattered back defiance. It danced on two legs and raced all about the waters' edge on four. It squatted and scratched fleas upon the hump as on a hillock. I hardly think Leviathan noticed. But just then a power launch came round the point, and so he sank, soft as a lover's sigh, and left poor Jonah squattering in the water.

I craned over the cliff at risk of falling and shouted to the pilot to save Jonah; a necessary thing, for a tiger shark was nosing in; and Jonah ran up an oar, into the boat, with the loss of more than an inch of his tail. The boatman sold him to me for a dollar—he was more than half mine by right of discovery anyhow—and I restored him to his enemies in the Ceiba. Often, as I have seen him since, I always know him and he knows me, for when he sees me he sits on a branch and takes in his hand, and chattering, shows to me the missing tip of his tail.

"Come."

Come unto Me! the Saviour saith:
And I will give thee joy for tears;
I'll pour My spirit in thy life
And that shall still thy doubts and fears.
Oft when thy heart unquiet lies,
And burdens seem too hard to bear,
My grace shall all-sufficient prove
To lighten every cross and care.

Be not afraid to trust My love;
The world will wane, ere long decline,
But changeless is the love I give—
Eternal as the years in Mine.
Before thy life has longer grown
Make Me thy Shepherd, no more roam;
Yea, take My hand and share at last
The blessings of My Father's Home.

Some True Stories About George Washington.

When George Washington was a thirteen-year-old boy in the new country of America he wrote for his own personal guidance the following: "To labor to keep alive in my breast that little spark of celestial fire called conscience." All through his life George Washington kept true to that boyhood guide.

Washington was a great believer in God. During the terrible winter at Valley Forge a man was one day walking over his estate when, in the woods by the stream, he heard a very solemn voice. He approached the spot, and there discovered Washington's horse tied to a tree. At a little distance in a thicket he saw Washington on his knees in the snow in prayer. Reverently the man turned away, and as he returned to the house he burst into tears, saying to his wife, "If there is any one of this earth that the Lord will listen to, it is George Washington".

This fine faith of Washington's was the direct result of the training which he had received from his mother. And all during the years he loved his mother and respected her for the fine things she had taught him.

One day word arrived at Mount Vernon that Washington had been unanimously elected the first President of the United States, and his presence was urgently requested at the seat of government. Hastily Washington put his own affairs in order and then, just at nightfall, mounting his fleetest horse, he set out, not for the seat of government, but to say good-bye to his aged mother. All through the hours of the night he rode and the next morning appeared unannounced at his mother's door. He enjoyed a brief visit with her, said farewell, and was on his way back to Mount Vernon. By nightfall he was again at home, having ridden more than eighty miles for the sake of a last farewell with the mother to whom he owed so much. The next morning he was ready to start on his journey of two hundred and fifty miles to New York City.

Not far from New York there lived a little boy who wanted a Bible very much indeed, wanted it more than anything else he could think of, but he was poor and could not afford to buy one, for then Bibles cost more than they do now. One day two strange gentlemen came to his house and asked his mother for something to eat. Although she had only plain food, she gave them a welcome to what she had. As they ate they saw the little boy looking sad. They asked him what he wanted, and he told them a Bible. His mother said, "Never mind; don't fret about that. I'll take you to see General Washington next week."

"But I'd rather have a Bible than to go to see General Washington," the boy said. One of the gentlemen seemed very much pleased with this, and told him that he hoped he would always be as fond of the Bible as he was then.

The next day the little boy received a beautiful Bible, and on the fly-leaf was written, "From George Washington". The little boy did not know it, but he had been talking to General Washington himself the day before.—Selected.

"What shall I care where these poor timbers are!
What though the crumbling walls turn to dust and loam!
I shall have left them for a larger home,
What though the rafters break, the stanchions rot,
When earth has dwindled to a glimmer spot!

This body is my house—it is not I,
Triumphant in this faith I live and die."

A Great City of Small Town Homes

THE pendulum IS SWINGING BACK!

RELIGIOUS PRESS ASSOCIATION — TELL THE BEST PEOPLE — 1882 — PHILADELPHIA

MANY national advertisers and progressive advertising agencies are looking longingly toward the small towns as the future increase of their business and a virgin field for their clients.

The secular publications of big circulation have long been recognized as having the greater part of their distribution in metropolitan centers. Now we have a new medium of long established publications that binds together those substantial, well-to-do small town homes with their gardens, big roomy, airy houses and families that live life together.

These families if brought within one geographical bound would make up a great city. And one in which only a small part of the accepted advertising mediums of today are circulating.

This new medium is the Religious Home Weeklies Combination — 18 of among the finest and strongest journals in their sphere. They have no duplication and make available to worthy advertisers reader confidence at its zenith. It all has:

HELP WANTED

THE REV. ALFRED R. BERKELEY, RECtor of St. John's Church, Roanoke, desires to have some one assist him in the work of his parish, during Lent and perhaps permanently. He will be glad to communicate with any clergyman who may be interested in this matter. Box 1057, Roanoke, Virginia.

Deaths

SYDNOR: MR. ABRAM SYDNOR, of Darlington, S. C., died suddenly in Washington, D. C., December 27, 1926. He was a native of Halifax County and went to Darlington in 1892. His wife was Miss Kate R. Ruffin, of Wilson, N. C. He was a member of the Episcopal Church, and prominent in Church circles.

MRS. ELEANOR LACKLAND BRAXTON.

Entered Life Eternal, Sunday morning, January 2, 1927, after a short illness from pneumonia at the home of a daughter in Atlanta, Georgia, ELEANOR LACKLAND BRAXTON, widow of Frank C. Braxton, and daughter of the late Thomas and M. Ellen Willis Lackland, of Jefferson County, West Virginia. Mrs. Braxton was buried by the side of her husband in Hollywood Cemetery, Richmond, Virginia. She leaves four daughters.

"Her children arise and call her blessed."

EWING WATERS LAWSON.

Entered into the joy of his Lord from Emergency Hospital on January 11, 1927, EWING WATERS LAWSON. He was the son of Robert M. and Grace Waters Lawson, of Burke's Garden, Va. We asked for him life, and He gave "Eternal Life".

"There in my Father's Home
Safe and at rest;
There in my Saviour's love
Perfectly blest.
Age after age to be Near my God to Thee,
Nearer to Thee."

MRS. ARTHUR S. JOHNS.

Entered into Life Eternal on the morning of the Sunday after Christmas, MRS. HELEN LANE JOHNS, wife of the Rev. Arthur S. Johns, D. D. She had been in ill health for some time, and her death brought relief from suffering; as well as "the rest that remaineth".

It brought to a close also, what had been a very active life, ever interested in "doing good", as manifold opportunities filled life's pathway; and as a wise and loving "help-meet" of her husband in his parochial life. The rectory became, in her use of it, a home of hospitality, dispensed with friendly generosity and consistent courtesy. Her many friends were attracted to her by her sterling qualities of character, unselfishness, and uniform cheerfulness.

Called to the Presence of the Saviour, she loved and served, we think of her as in the brightness of Paradise; reunited in the ties of the Life there to the husband and son she loved so here. May the thought of her happiness reconcile those left behind to their loss, and her life bring an abiding influence for good on all who knew her.

IN MEMORIAM.

Mrs. Sallie Falkner Hawkins.

Entered into Life Eternal at her home in Winona, Mississippi, February 3, 1927, MRS. SALLIE FALKNER HAWKINS, in her eighty-ninth year. She was born in Warrenton, North Carolina, in 1838, and married John D. Hawkins, of Mississippi, and came with him to Mississippi, as a bride when she was nineteen years of age. She was a devoted Churchwoman and, although there was no Episcopal Church in the community into which she had moved, she remained loyal to its teachings and was instrumental in establishing the Episcopal Church in Winona. She was a faithful member of the Woman's Auxiliary and was always present at its meetings until ill health prevented her from attending, but even then, she took a great interest in every phase of the work and contributed to the same.

Whereas, It has pleased Almighty God in His Infinite Wisdom to call her from the Church Militant to the Church Triumphant; therefore, be it

Resolved, First, That we, the members of the Woman's Auxiliary, though our hearts are saddened, bow in meek submission to His Will and give thanks for her beautiful life. May the memory of this life be an inspiration to us and keep us ever true and loyal to our faith as she was to hers.

Second, That to her son and grandsons, we extend our heartfelt sympathy and pray God to bless and comfort them.

Third, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the Minutes of the Auxiliary, a copy sent to her son, Mr. F. R. Hawkins, a copy sent to the Winona Times, the Church News, and Southern Churchman.

"Father, in Thy gracious keeping, leave we now Thy servant sleeping."

Respectfully submitted,
MRS. J. B. CAUGHEY,
MRS. T. J. WHITEHEAD,
MRS. F. WRIGHT,
MISS JENNIE PURNELL,
Committee.

MRS. BEVERLEY D. TUCKER.

Resolutions.

The members of the First Circle of the Woman's Auxiliary of St. Paul's Church, Norfolk, Va., wish to express to our beloved Bishop, and his family, our deep sympathy in the loss of our fellow worker, in the Master's great cause, MRS. MARIA WASHINGTON TUCKER. Faithful in attendance, wise in counsel and of unbounding faith, she was an inspiration in the past, and will be in the future to all who were privileged to have known her.

Praying God's blessings on the work so dear to Him, and which she loved, we humbly hope to follow her example, and, through His help, strive to bring nearer His Kingdom on earth. We wish this slight appreciation of Mrs. Beverley D. Tucker to be printed in the Diocesan Journal and Southern Churchman, and sent to the family.

BY ORDER OF THE AUXILIARY.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

The Crusade was very successful in Long Island. At the seven centers selected for the Crusade in the Diocese, the total attendance for the six successive nights, and the noon-day service at Albee's Theatre in Brooklyn for five days, was just under thirty thousand. The largest gatherings were those in Albee's Theatre, where Bishop Stires was the preacher. Beginning with thirteen hundred the first day, the number steadily increased to more than twenty-six hundred the last day.

A Unique Institution.

The Church Charity Foundation of Long Island has published its director's annual report. This institution is probably unique in its scope, embracing in a single organization a Home for the Aged, a Home for Children, a Home for the Blind, and a General Hospital (St. John's, Brooklyn), with a School of Nursing. The year just ended was the seventy-fifth year of its operation. During the year it cared for seventy-seven aged people, seventeen blind people, thirty children, and a daily average of seventy-three hospital patients. The service of the hospital was forty-one per cent free.

The total receipts for the year were over $800,000, including about $450,000 turned over by the Committee of Fifty, the sum which was raised by a campaign to celebrate the semi-centennial of the Diocese, and which has been paid in during a five-year period. This sum is to be used for new buildings, some of which are now under construction. Bequests amounting to $72,000 were added to the endowment during the year. The operating expenses of the various departments for 1926 aggregated more than $224,000, the bulk of which, $151,000, was the cost of maintaining St. John's Hospital—an average cost of $5.62 per patient per day.

An interesting feature of the report is the description of the Children's Cottage, at Sayville, L. I., replacing the former Orphan Home in Brooklyn, which burned several years ago. The new department for children is on the "cottage plan" and in the country. The cottages house twenty children each. The children attend public school and the parish church. Two cottages are now operating, and there is room on the property for more, if they should be needed.

A Notable Attainment.

Bishop Stires has sent a personal letter of congratulation to each clergyman in the Diocese, because their efforts throughout the year past resulted in a notable increase of missionary giving, largely surpassing the best previous attainment of the Diocese. After the "referendum" of a year ago, Long Island notified the National Council that $125,000 might be expected from Long Island in 1926. This was much more than the Diocese had ever contributed before. Bishop Stires has now notified his clergy that he has the receipt of the National Council for $125,000, and he thanks them heartily for their loyal cooperation, and the people for their support.

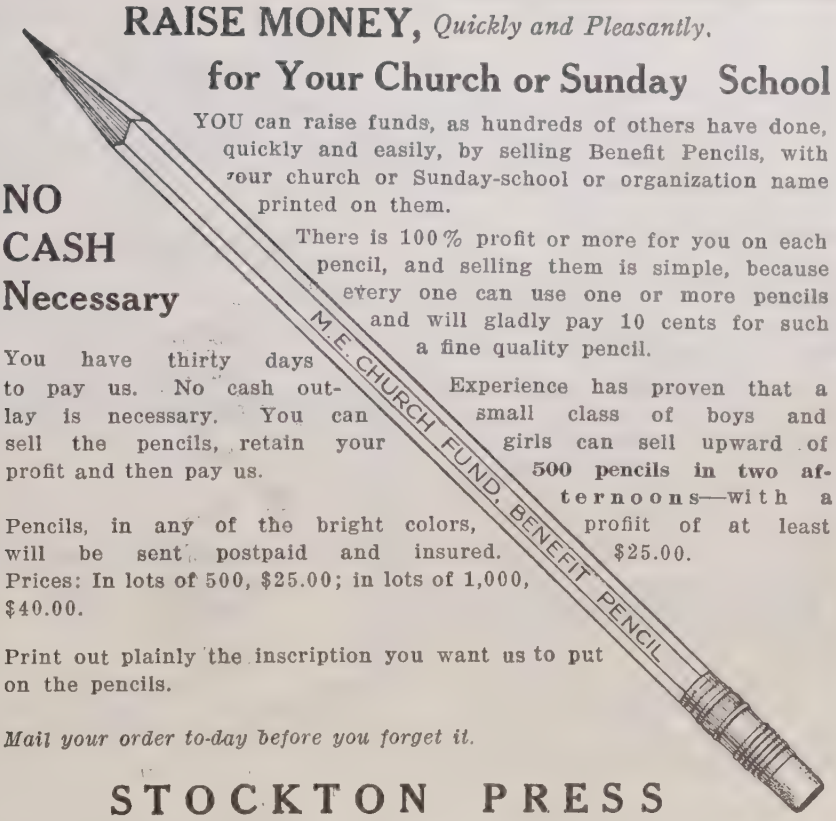
Personal Notes



The Rev. Thomas N. Brincefield resigned the rectorship of the Aurora Field, Diocese of East Carolina, effective February 1, and has taken up work in Como, in the Diocese of Mississippi.

The address of the Rev. Robert A. Mayo, formerly rector of Christ Church, West River, Md., is now Box 355, Alexandria, Va.

The Rev. Alfred D. Kolkebeck, curate of the Church of the Atonement, Chicago, Ill., has accepted a call to Trinity Church, Atchison, Kan.

RAISE MONEY, Quickly and Pleasantly,

for Your Church or Sunday School

YOU can raise funds, as hundreds of others have done, quickly and easily, by selling Benefit Pencils, with your church or Sunday-school or organization name printed on them.

There is 100% profit or more for you on each pencil, and selling them is simple, because every one can use one or more pencils and will gladly pay 10 cents for such a fine quality pencil.

NO CASH Necessary

You have thirty days to pay us. No cash outlay is necessary. You can sell the pencils, retain your profit and then pay us.

Experience has proven that a small class of boys and girls can sell upward of 500 pencils in two afternoons—with a profit of at least $25.00.

Pencils, in any of the bright colors, will be sent postpaid and insured. Prices: In lots of 500, $25.00; in lots of 1,000, $40.00.

Print out plainly the inscription you want us to put on the pencils.

Mail your order to-day before you forget it.

The Rev. James E. W. Cook, rector of St. Paul's, Greenville, N. C., has been appointed Grand Orator of the A. F. A. M., of the Grand Jurisdiction of the State of North Carolina, and will deliver the oration in the Grand Lodge, which meets in January, 1928, in Raleigh, N. C.

The Rt. Rev. John N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop of Western Michigan, has been promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the reserve corps of army chaplains.

The Rev. William H. Nes, of Washington, D. C., will become Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, New Orleans, La., March 1.

The Rev. Walter C. Bihler, formerly curate at St. Thomas' Church, New York City, has entered upon his work as priest-in-charge of Christ Church, River Forest, Ill.

The Rev. Arthur G. Wilson, formerly rector of Holy Trinity Church, Danville, Ill., who has accepted a call to Christ Church, Chattanooga, Tenn., will take charge on March 1.

Effective January 1, 1927, the Rev. Lynne B. Meade accepted the rectorship of Trinity Church at Boonesboro and Ivy Chapel, R. F. D. No. 2, Forest, Va. He took these in addition to his present charge of Emmanuel Church, Madison Heights and Christ Church, Schuyler. His residence will be at Madison Heights, just across the river from Lynchburg, this being the most central location for him to reach all of his churches.

ORDINATIONS.

In St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston, Mass., on Friday morning, January 28, the Rt. Rev. Charles Lewis Slattery, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Massachusetts, ordained to the priesthood the Rev. Williams Cleveland Hicks. The litany was read by the Very Rev. Philemon F. Sturges, D. D., Dean of the Cathedral. The Rev. C. R. Peck, of the Cathedral staff, read the epistles, and the gospel was read by the Rt. Rev. William Lawrence, chaplain to Harvard students, and the sermon was by the Rev. Sammuel Shoemaker, of Calvary Church, New York City. Mr. Hicks has spent his diaconate as assistant to Mr. Lawrence in his work among the students at Harvard, and also as assistant to the Rev. Wolcott Cutler, rector of St. John's Church, Charleston, and he will continue in this joint work.

DEATHS.

The Rev. Percy Stickney Grant, D. D., rector of the Church of the Ascension, New York, from 1893 to 1924, died in a hospital at Mt. Kisco, New York, following an operation for appendicitis, in his sixty-seventh year.

Dr. Grant was born in Boston, and educated at Harvard and the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge. He was ordained deacon in 1886 and priest in 1887 by Bishop Paddock, and his first charge was as assistant at the Church on the Ascension, Fall River, Mass. He was also minister in charge of St. Mark's Church, Fall River, Mass., and of Christ Church, Swansea, Mass., before going to the Church of the Ascension, New York City, in 1893.

The funeral took place from the Parish Church of St. Matthew at Bedford in Westchester County, where he had lived with a sister for the past two years. Dr. Grant never married. The funeral was conducted by former assistants of Dr. Grant at the Ascension, and burial was in Forest Hill, Boston. At the hour of the service in the county a similar service was held at the Ascension Church in this city.

Little Mistakes In English Make Others Judge You Unfairly

YOU are sized up every day by what you say and write. The words you use, how you use them; your spelling, grammar, punctuation—these tell the measure of your ability, your experience, your breeding, more clearly than anything else. Your English says to all the world, "This is what I am!"

SHERWIN CODY

How Poor English Hurts You

English is the advertisement of your ability. Your language determines your position in the social and business scale. Charming personality, fine clothes, wonderful appearance count for little if handicapped by imperfect or "sloppy" English.

People will think you are lacking in education and culture if you spell incorrectly such common words as "business," "abbreviate," etc.; if you say "between you and I" instead of "between you and me"; if you use "who" for "whom" and "shall" for "will." What can you expect people to think if you don't know when to use one or two "c's" or "m's" or "r's" or when to use "ei" or "ie," or if you say "hosPITable" when you should say "HOSpitable." Fairly or unfairly, everybody everywhere judges you the same way. Poor English is an unnecessary handicap.

15 Minutes a Day Perfects Your English

If your English does not make people think the best of you then it must be improved. Extensive tests show that men and women are but 61% efficient in the essential points of English.

But now there is a way to improve your English. Sherwin Cody, perhaps the best known teacher of practical English, has perfected and patented a remarkable device which quickly gives you a commanding mastery of English. The drudgery of rules and tiresome drills is discarded. Each evening you are assigned an easy 15-minute lesson. No time is wasted on what you already know. You are quickly shown your mistakes in spelling, punctuation, grammar, and pronunciation, and you concentrate on the points that need attention. By actual use correct English soon becomes a habit.

Astonishing Book on English—FREE

A new book explaining Mr. Cody's remarkle method is ready. If you are ever embarrassed by mistakes in grammar, spelling, punctuation, pronunciation, or if you can not instantly command the exact words with which to express your ideas, this new free book, "How to Speak and Write Masterly English," will prove a revelation to you. Send the coupon or a letter or postal card for it now.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Enlarge my heart so that I may have room for my brother.—Jowett.

"Christ grew weary in His work, but not of it."

An unevangelized world is the price we pay for a divided church.—John R. Mott.

If we want Christ to enter our homes, let us give Him a warm invitation! Let us constrain Him to come in!—D. L. Moody.

No thinking, reverent man can read the Sermon on the Mount or the Life of Christ without knowing that here is truth.

Work hard for God, and let no pride blow upon it when you have done! It is difficult for a man to do much and not value himself too much for it.—Flavel.

Differences of opinion in theology among us is such that these would be no greater in a unified church than they are now in every one of our denominations.—P. Marion Simms.

No man ever yet asked to be, as the days pass by, more and more noble and sweet and pure and heavenly-minded, without his petition being granted to the letter.—Dean Farrar.

Christianity was not a revolution, but an evolution. It did not destroy Judaism any more than the flower destroys the root when it blooms; it superseded it only as noonday splendor supersedes morning twilight.

Keep in the background of your work. People are quite willing to give you credit for the fine things you do, but they do not want to be reminded of you all the time. The world does not require that work shall be anonymous, but it is well pleased when it is modest.

FAR AND NEAR

CONVERSION, CONSECRATION and CHURCHMANSHIP are the three words for which the Church Army stands. It is an organization in the Church of England, with a branch in this country that carries on work similar to that of the Salvation Army, except that its officers are all Churchmen, and have membership in the Church of England or the Episcopal Church. As an objective in their work, although this objective does not mean that their efforts are confined to bringing people into the Episcopal Church—their great object being to bring people to God and into the Church as a means of finding God. They have already made a number of engagements for Preaching Missions throughout the North, and rectors who think their services would be valuable in the Bishops' Crusade should write to Captain B. F. Mountford, Diocesan House, 416 Lafayette Street, New York.

A PANORAMIC VIEW OF JERUSALEM'S SACRED PLACES will be the unusual sight to greet eyes of visitors who go to the new Y. M. C. A. building in that city. Five hundred thousand dollars has been given to the Association by a person who insists that his name be kept secret, for the erection of a centre in the sacred city. A feature of the new building is to be a tall tower surmounted by a golden dome, from which will be visible at a single glance the Mount of Olives, the Garden of Gethsemane, Mount Moriah and many other famous and holy places.

The buildings are to be constructed of native stone, more or less of which is actually quarried on the property—very hard limestone, running from cream to light pink in color. Considerable use will also be made of a softer white limestone which comes from Solomon's ancient quarries and of which Solomon's Temple is believed to have been built.

One of the side buildings will contain the first public auditorium in Jerusalem and will have seats for 800 people.

Other structures will house trade and vocational schools, the Bible school, the gymnasium and swimming pool and indoor athletic facilities. A considerable area of the property will be devoted to athletic fields. There will be a football gridiron, a baseball diamond, running track, tennis courts, a squash court and a handball court, with space for field events.

The buildings will be lighted by electricity, which the British introduced into Jerusalem since the World War.

All races and creeds will be welcomed, as they are now in the rented quarters occupied by the organization. There are even Mohammedans on its Board of Trustees.

"THE LABORER IS WORTHY OF HIS HIRE," so runs the ancient maxim, but for many years the hire of the laborer was not sufficient to be of much importance in the economic world. Today, however, times have changed, and the laborer is a person of some prominence whose hire, when properly conserved, is a financial item worthy of real consideration. In the past few years what are known as "labor banks" have sprung up, and there are now thirty-two of these institutions in operation throughout the country, having on deposit no less than $109,181,906. This means that the working people of the United States have resources of more than a hundred million dollars, which is a great bulwark against want and misery in the event of a cessation of the present prosperous business conditions, and this should be a great comfort to all Christian people.

CONTRIBUTORS FROM THE NORTH AND SOUTH

THE RIGHT REVEREND CHARLES FISKE, D. D., Bishop of Central New York, was born in New Brunswick, N. J., did his college work at St. Stephen's. After taking his theological course at the General Seminary, New York, he began his ministry at Trenton, N. J., and after serving as rector at St. Paul's Church, Westfield, N. J., he held parishes in Pennsylvania, and accepted a call to St. Michael and All Angels' in Baltimore in 1910. After five years of efficient and successful service in this noted parish, he followed in the footsteps of all their other rectors, leaving them to enter the Episcopate. He was consecrated Bishop-Coadjutor of Central New York in 1915, and succeeded to the Bishopric in 1924. He is a forceful and popular preacher, a man of great energy. Of recent years he has been prominent in the Anglo-Catholic movement. He is in great demand as a special preacher throughout the country.

THE REVEREND THOMAS KINLOCH NELSON, D. D., who this week continues the series of articles on "The Boy and His Church", was born in Alexandria, Va. After obtaining B. A. and M. A. degrees at the University of Virginia he studied theology at the Seminary at Alexandria, taking his B. D. degree there in 1911. After becoming a deacon in 1910 he went as a missionary to China, and was ordained to the priesthood there by Bishop Graves in 1911. After remaining in China for four years, as Professor at St. John's University and Chaplain of St. John's Pro-Cathedral, Shanghai, he returned to this country and was for a short time rector of Salem Parish, in the Diocese of Southern Virginia. He has been a teacher practically all his life, holding positions in this capacity in four Church institutions, at the present time being Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature in the Theological Seminary of Virginia.

INFORMATION---BUT NOT CONTROVERSY

No doubt our readers will be surprised, perhaps startled, by the cuts displayed on this page, and will wonder if we have suddenly been employed by the Sacred Heart Cathedral, of the Roman Catholic Church.

We, ourselves, were indeed amazed when an eight-page booklet came to our office with the cover that is pictured at the right and the inside page that is pictured below. Our surprise is all the greater when we realize that the "Holy Cross Press, West Park, N. Y.", is operated by a group of clergymen, who belong to the Order of the Holy Cross, each of whom, in his ordination vows, has assumed the solemn obligation "to administer the Doctrine and Sacraments and Discipline of Christ, as the Lord hath commanded, and as this Church hath received the same". "This Church" being the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

Among these "Rosary Devotions" we find this one:

"She who called herself 'the handmaid (literally slave-made) of the Lord', now exalted as Queen of Heaven. That holy, undefiled flesh from which God the Son took His Human Body could not see corruption. Although without sin, she died the death common to all; but her divine Son would not permit death to hold her, but 'in the beloved city He gave her rest, and in Jerusalem was her power'. Raised up to reign with Christ in glory, she shares His work of intercession. O happy thought! The Mother of God prays for me!

Resolution: To try to be worthy of Mary's love."

It is not our purpose at this time to be controversial, but only informative; therefore, for the present, we shall only pause to enquire when the Virgin Mary became "without sin", as sinlessness is an attribute that we had supposed was only possessed by our Saviour.

According to a statement by the Rev. John A. Staunton in an open letter to Bishop Seaman, the Order of the Holy Cross "for half a century has taught the whole Catholic faith, and largely been instrumental in bringing back the Mass, Confession, Prayers for the Dead, Invocation of Saints, the Hail Mary and use of the Rosary; indeed, everything which pertains to the practice of the whole Catholic religion".

The Rev. S. C. Hughson, also a member of the Order of the Holy Cross, preached a sermon last summer, which was afterwards published, explaining that it was not the elements of bread and wine that were worshipped in the adoration of the Reserved Sacrament, but merely the presence of God in those elements. It is significant that he should feel it necessary to make this distinction. He then continued as follows: "But let us not be misunderstood. With all our hearts and wills we accept and follow these practices, and we emphatically urge them as the ordinary expression of the faith and worship of a Christian. We desire to see the Holy Sacrifice of the Eucharist offered every day on every altar, and to this end we unceasingly labor and pray. On every Sunday and greater festival we wish to see this service made the great central act of worship, accompanied by all the splendor and beauty of holiness. Also, we contend for the Presence of Jesus Christ in His Sacrament on the altars of our churches, and, with all charity, we decline to accept any compromise or accommodation regarding this practice. And we earnestly believe, and on all occasions teach and insist, that the position of Catholics regarding the Holy Dead and the saints is an element necessary to the fulness and integrity of the faith which we profess whenever we say in the Apostles' Creed, "I believe in the Communion of Saints".

Purely as a matter of information, we believe that our readers and the Church at large should know the kind of practices that are advocated by the Order of the Holy Cross, and especially should note Mr. Hughson's statement that "we decline to accept any compromise or accommodation".

Furthermore, we believe that Church people should know that, besides the Order of the Holy Cross, there are now no less than forty-five similar organizations engaged in spreading such pamphlets as the "Devotions of the Rosary" throughout the Protestant Episcopal Church.

QUESTION: IS IT THE DESIRE OF THE LAITY OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH THAT THESE PRACTICES SHOULD BECOME UNIVERSAL IN THE CHURCH?

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

ALONE IN THE WILDERNESS

By the Right Reverend Charles Fiske, D. D.

St. Luke 4:1-2. And Jesus . . . was led by the Spirit into the wilderness; being forty days tempted.

TO many of us the story of the Temptation may seem unreal and unnatural. It is, we should remember, a dramatic picture—the story of an actual experience, but clothed in picturesque and vivid symbolism. That is not the special difficulty I have in mind. Nor am I thinking of the problem of how one who is the Son of God could be tempted. Was it because, though He was divine, all knowledge must come to Him filtering through His human consciousness, and so the presence and appeal of evil were actual? Was it because He chose to use only the weapons which He puts into our hands, and so the struggle was real and agonizing? We do not know. This, again, is not the problem I have in mind.

What I am thinking of is a practical question: Why was Christ "driven into the wilderness"? What does His presence there mean? How does the story touch my life? How does it fit in with my experiences? Can I find in the story anything that corresponds to the record of my own struggles? Let us see.

Why was He in the wilderness? If we read the story carefully, we note that Christ had just come from His baptism. On the banks of the Jordan He had been publicly acknowledged by John, His forerunner, as the promised Messiah. There He had received from the Father, in the voice from heaven, the assurance of His own unique personality and power. That sense of the difference between Himself and other men had always been with Him, but now He had new evidence of it. And there He stood, also, at the threshold of His life work and facing His life mission. He was the destined reconciler of men to God, the founder of the new kingdom. Now all the long years of preparation were over and He must begn His ministry. Is it any wonder that He sought the desert? He simply had to be alone. He must have time to think, to formulate His plan; rather, to receive His Father's message and learn what the Father's plan was. He must map out His work and learn how the Father would have Him use His powers. He must go away, and be quiet, and face it all alone.

The threefold temptation, if you read the story with all this in mind, is the record of the way in which the Prince of Evil sought to divert Him from the path of duty which the Father had marked out, and induce Him to take some short cut to success. He might win His way by cultivating the crowd and riding into power on a wave of popularity. He might look at His life's vocation as the world would view such service, and think of the influence He could gain and the kingdoms He could win. Meanwhile, He had great powers, and it might be perfectly lawful to use them to make His task easier. Why not? Why suffer needlessly? Why struggle handicapped by unnecessary inconveniences and hindrances?

All these temptations are incident to the flight into the wilderness, not the essential part of it. They are the same temptations that recur throughout His whole life when Peter sought to stay the journey to Jerusalem; when the Pharisees asked of Him a sign; when the taunting watchers on Calvary bade Him come down from the cross if He would have them believe. They are temptations such as come to every man who knows himself to be endowed with great gifts, understands that he should use them for God, and yet feels himself constantly lured from the heights and bidden to seek the easier road and walk the smoother path.

Compare the story of the wilderness temptation with the record of Peter's remonstrance with Him on the last journey to Jerusalem. By this time it was plain, even to the dull disciples, that there lay before Him no easy road to victory. They knew that if He persisted in going up to Jerusalem there was bound to be trouble and conflict. Why, then, must He go, just now, to face that bitter opposition? Why not stay away from the capital and wait till times were more hopeful? Up in Galilee He had been hailed as a national deliverer and His progress had been a veritable triumph; why not go back there and bide His time and wait till the trouble could blow over; strengthen the fellowship of His followers and form a party and go back to the city with the crowd behind Him? The rebuke of Christ, so personal and so severe, seems absolutely unwarranted, unless we understand how keen was the appeal made by the apostle's argument.

The whole force of that appeal lay in the echo it finds in every human heart—and Christ was perfectly human—in the natural desire to take the easier course and avoid difficult obstacles. Had Christ listened to Peter He would have utterly failed in His mission. That is the reason He says to the apostle, "Get thee behind Me, Satan". The temptation is the old suggestion of the wilderness days to take some other road than God's path and use some other method than that of God's choosing. When He set His face steadfastly to go to Jerusalem, He was repeating in action what He had said more than three years before in the desert. It was as if He were saying that it matters not when we leave this life; what really matters is how we leave it. The only thing that really counts in this life is character, because character is the only thing we take with us when life ends. It is as if He were saying, God never meant to make life easy; He meant to make men great; He wants men of tremendous determination, of unflinching persistence in living true to all that God requires; men who will do just what truth and honor demand, and close their ears against any suggestion of compromise with God's purposes.

I may have seemed to wander away from my point, but I have said all this, so that you may see that all His life long Christ was facing the very same temptations which were pressed upon Him in the wilderness; only that there, back at the beginning of His ministry, He was forced to face them for the first time, in the opening crisis of His career, when He was engaged in resolving what to do with His life and how to do it, listening to the voice of God and harmonizing it with the movements of His own soul.

Remembering all this, back again, then, we go now to the desert, to ask why Christ was there. Not, of course, because He wanted to do something dramatic and picturesque that would print the story on men's memories. No, He was in the wilderness by a kind of moral necessity. He was there, in order to be alone and settle His life's work. Resolutely putting into the background any thought of personal discomfort, He bent Himself to the task of translating the message He knew God would give Him. He would think and think hard till He knew just what was God's purpose for Him; think and think hard, alone, lest the spell of the experience should pass away. It was not so much that He deliberately fasted—the fasting, you remember, has always loomed so large in our understanding of the scene—as that His emotion was so great as to transcend all common interruptions, His concentration so strong and steady and the current of His thought so deep as to make Him wholly oblivious of everything else.

I am sure I have not been overbold in speculation when I put it this way. I only wish to make it clear to you, as it is to myself, that it was perfectly natural for Christ to go into the wilderness, because when He came to wrestle with His life's problem He must wrestle alone, face to face with the Father whom He was to serve.

It is an experience of His—this wilderness watching—common with men who do great tasks.

John the Baptist went into the desert for the very same reason. He came as the immediate forerunner of Christ, charged with all that his nation had dreamed of during long centuries of alternate hope and despair. He, too, might have sought his following in Jerusalem, and begun his work at once, but he, too, had to be alone, to brood and ponder and weigh the message he was to deliver; he must not have his mind distracted by one thought from without; he must catch every word and lose not a single syllable of the story he was soon to tell of the Christ who was so near.

It was the same with St. Paul. The great apostle writes that immediately after his conversion he went into Arabia to stay for the best part of three years. Why, but because he must find time for adjustment and see how he was to lay the foundations of the kingdom and proclaim the faith of Christ its King? It is reasonable to suppose that the rule of Arabia was the custom of the apostle's whole ministry. At stated times he went apart to renew and replenish the Christ-life within.

It is doubly reasonable to suppose that he did this, because this, too, was the rule of Christ Himself. The wilderness of temptation was not His only retreat. Before every great crisis in His life, we find Him seeking solitude. Before He chose His apostles; when He was about to ask the momentous question of St. Peter; when the crowds began to press Him and He had not so much as time to eat and sleep; during all the great Holy Week, when "in the daytime He was teaching in the temple, and at night He went out and abode in the Mount that is called the Mount of Olives"—always quiet thought and prayer strengthened Him for action. Gethsemane itself was His last solemn retreat, which gave Him strength to face Herod and Pilate and the Sanhedrin, with perfect self-mastery and unmatched bravery, with determination to stand firm for principle and with utter scorn of all dubious ways of escape.

I think all this may show us something of the purpose and privilege of Lent. To the shallow and careless Christian it may be merely a substitute, in religious disguise, for real spiritual effort. The newspaper humorist pokes fun at it as a diversion for the socially weary. Christians of other communions may look at those who keep it and find good reason for supposing that somehow we fancy we can atone for a year of indifference by a busy round of church services and be saved by much preaching.

Of course Lent is not any of these things. It is just the Church's answer to a human need; the Church's way of thrusting spiritual opportunity upon us. It is the Christian rule by which she calls to our recollection the obligation to do our part to make God a great reality. You remember how Elijah taunted the prophets of Baal. "Where is your god?" he asked. "Is he asleep and must he be awaked? Is he on a journey, and must you call him back?" Our God is not talking, nor pursuing, nor on a journey, nor asleep. It is we who are so. We have only to stop awhile our running after we know not what, or hush our clamorous voices, or arouse ourselves from sluggish spiritual slumber, and we shall find God at our side. Lent, if kept aright, must be kept in quietness, with much time to ourselves, with fully as much of private prayer as there is of public services, with more listening to God than attendance at formal preaching.

Have you ever considered how little we are alone? Most of our hours are necessarily spent in the companionship of others, and even when the opportunity for privacy comes, we run away from it. Seemingly we shrink from the experience of being alone with our own thoughts. "Watch a man of business in a railroad station, about to board his train for a journey, long or short," says a layman—not a clergyman. "With feverish haste he is laying in a stock of newspapers which will keep him from thinking until he has reached his destination. If you will observe him in his place in the car, you will see him making his way quickly but thoroughly from one end of a newspaper to the other. As fast as he finishes one he throws it upon the floor, seizes another and with unabated zest devours a slightly different version of the same events, always treating the important and the trivial with strict impartiality. Such people cannot possibly know the refreshment of communion with the Unseen. They have no reservoir of spiritual power upon which to draw in time of need."

No reservoir of spiritual power! That is the point. If God's companionship is to be realized, we must clear the way for His approach; we must make our wilderness where we can be alone with Him. Our thoughts must be banished, that this one great thought may possess us, and fill us and charge us with its power. Prayer comes afterward. Prayer indeed is useless unless it be addressed to God after we have tried to realize that God is near.

No reservoir of spiritual power! Why, the principle is so plain that we use it even in daily business. The practical problems of everyday life demand quiet and intense thought—a mind so concentrated that it finally seizes upon the core of the subject, and looks around it and through it, and sets it by itself and images it forth. "It was in this way," says Robertson, "that one of the greatest of English engineers is said to have accomplished his most remarkable triumphs. Sometimes a difficulty brought all his work to a pause. Then he would shut himself up in his room, abandon himself intensely to the contemplation of that on which his heart was set, and at the end of two or three days would come forth serene and calm and walk to the spot and quietly give orders which seemed the result of superhuman intuition."

This is the only way in which we shall learn, not simply how to do our work, but how to do it as God would have us. Do we give much thought to what God wants us to do, or what He wants us to be? The measure of a man's power is his depth, and the quality of depth comes only by going apart, that truth may be taken into the soul. Most of us, when on occasion we do give some slight thought to God's purpose for us and God's use of us, somehow expect God to tell us everything, whether we listen or not. "Now let God speak, and speak quickly, for I haven't much time." It is my own conviction that the only way to have light upon your difficulties or guidance in your life, is to wait quietly upon God, to wait and wait, until finally you hear Him speak, or at least feel the message.

And surely, if you want not simply God's guidance, but His companionship—this is the only way you can realize it. "When you're with other people you feel sometimes as if you were alone," said a young man at a mission, "but as soon as you're alone, then you begin to feel that you're not alone." Dr. Mason tells of an elderly man, a laborer, who came to see him one morning after a mission service and sermon, and sat down, his quaintly chiseled face twitching with smiles. "I asked him," said the missioner, "if there was anything I could do for him, but he said 'no'. Presently, with hesitation, he said, 'I did what you told us to do last night'. (I had been speaking about Jacob when he was alone, and wrestled.) 'And you found what you wanted, did you, John?' I asked. He only burst out into a long peal of laughter and answered, 'Yes, I did'. I saw him again, some ten years after, and he had not lost the mirth which the finding of Christ had brought him, though of course it had become deeper and more quiet."

There are so many men and women—you and I among them—whose lives lack that depth which solitude and silence alone can give. Nothing will take root in a soil that is constantly being turned over, and nothing will find rest in a life that has no quiet depths. It was not by an accident that Jesus went into the wilderness; it was in obedience to one of the laws of life. That is the way He learned what His Father wished Him to do, and that is the way He gained strength to do it. Indeed, if it be true that He was so human that He did all things with only man's powers, that is the way He learned that He was never alone—because the Father was with Him. If the wilderness and the mountain-top and the garden were necessary for Him, surely they are necessary also for us.

ALL GIFTS COME FROM GOD.

"Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, coming from the Father."

God gives so many lovely things,
He gives the bird its feathery wings,
The butterfly its colors fair,
The bee a velvet coat to wear.
He gives the garden all its flowers,
And sun to make them grow, and showers;
Red apples for the old bent tree,
Wheat in the meadow blowing free;
Cool grass upon the summer hills,
And silvery streams to turn the mills.
He gives the shining day, and then
The quiet, starry night again.
He gives my home—a place to stay,
And laugh, and dream, and work, and play,
With pleasant rooms and windows wide,
And cozy, rosy fireside;
And books to read and folks to love me,
And His good care to watch above me.
It's like a song a person sings—
God gives so many happy things!

—Nancy Byrd Turner.

There is but one way of proving the apostolicity of the Church; we must go forth as a Church and do the works of the Apostles. There is but one way of proving her Catholicity; we must bring her treasure to men of all races and nations, types, and classes. There is but one way of proving her sanctity; we must demonstrate her power to produce saints in the twentieth century.—E. Herman.

THE BOY AND HIS CHURCH

READING THE BIBLE

By the Reverend Thomas K. Nelson, D. D,

WHEN I was a boy I had a friend who used to chin six times and read three verses of the Bible every night before going to bed. Both were good for him, but it is doubtful whether he got a very good idea of what the Bible was all about. I want to suggest to you a few ideas which will make the Bible a real live book to you. Boys do not, I fear, read the Bible very much, and this is because they find it either uninteresting or unintelligible—it really is neither.

I. Read Intelligently.

In the first place, the Bible should be read intelligently. In order to do this you must treat it like any other book. That is, you must try to find out what were the conditions under which the author wrote and what he was trying to say. Now the Bible is not one book by one author written in one age; it is a collection of a great many books by many authors, and its writing took at least nine hundred years. It follows that one of the first rules is this—read the Bible not by verses or chapters, but by books. Take some one book and find out just who the author was, when he lived, what problems he had to solve, and how he solved them. With some books this is very difficult, with some almost impossible, but with others it is not difficult, and with some whose author is not known it is still possible to discover the period in which he wrote and the purpose for which he wrote. As examples, I would suggest Amos or Ezekiel in the Old Testament; Acts or one of St. Paul's shorter epistles in the New Testament.

Again, you will find it helpful to take stock of the chief difficulties you find in reading the Bible, face them frankly and see if you cannot find out how to overcome them.

First, there is the difficulty that you meet with words and phrases which you do not understand. There are two ways of meeting this difficulty; the first is to use a commentary or dictionary of the Bible; the second is to read the Bible in a modern translation. Very good are Kent's Shorter Old Testament and Moffatt's or Goodspeed's New Testament.

In the second place, there is the difficulty that there are long passages which are uninteresting and tiresome such as genealogies. The best thing to do with these is to leave them out. There is nothing to be gotten by ploughing through them as though the Bible were a collection of magic words, all of which must be read in order to make the charm work.

The third and more serious difficulty is that some statements seem to contradict the facts of nature as scientifically demonstrated as, for example, the story of creation in Genesis. 1 and 2: Two things are to be said about this—first, there are really very few such passages, none, so far as I remember, in the New Testament and a very small number in the Old. If they disturb you leave them out—or, better still, get rid of the comparatively modern idea that every word of the Bible is true, and learn once for all that the Bible grew just like any other literature and represents not the work of God revealing infallible words to men, but the Pilgrim's Progress of a race, the long search of man for truth, and that it contains the results of man's early and unscientific attempts to explain the universe—explanations which we no longer hold.

A fourth and still more serious difficulty is this—that we find ideas about God which are opposed to the character of God as revealed in Christ, as, for example, that God is the God of Jews alone, caring nothing for other nations; that He is a God of vengeance who practically delights in bloodshed so that when Achan sinned, not only he, but his whole family, must be stoned to death.

I am certain that many boys reading such passages feel that they cannot worship such a God, and they are right. Again, such ideas occur only in the Old Testament; and again, the solution to the difficulty lies in remembering that the Bible records the religious ideas of a race extending over many centuries, and that these ideas rose gradually to a higher plane. Our Lord Himself saw and taught this. When John and James wished to call down fire on the village which would not receive them as the prophets of old might have done, He said, ye know not what spirit ye are of.

Test every idea of God in the Old Testament by the character of Christ. Any idea which is opposed to His character is not true of God. For God is like Christ, and God's character has not changed. He always has been like Christ. My first main suggestion, then, is that you face quite frankly the difficulties you may meet and read your Bible intelligently, remembering that Christ said you must love God with your mind.

II. My second suggestion is that you read your Bible with a definite purpose, and it seems to me that there are two purposes worth setting before you. The first is to study the Bible historically—to watch in the Old Testament the development of the Hebrew nation as a nation and of the Hebrew religion as a religion, and in the New Testament the development of the Christian Church and the religion of Jesus. These are fascinating stories and well worth the trouble of some real work. This kind of work can perhaps best be done in organized classes under trained leaders, but it is not beyond the power of any intelligent boy, especially if he will get a few good books on the subject. (On the Old Testament you would find Ottley's short history of the Hebrews and Ottley's Hebrew Religion useful.)

The second and more important purpose is to read your Bible in order to get the best out of it. Now that best is not, after all, either scientific or historical truth, but religious truth, the truth about the nature of God, the nature of man and the relation between the two. The Bible is not the only book which contains these truths, yet there is no other book in all literature that declares them as profoundly and as clearly as the Bible. Read it with your heart and mind keenly alert to find these truths. A man who had in his hand a heap of pebbles, some of which were of great value, would not throw them all away because some were of no value; he would search through them until he found the valuable ones, and those he would hold on to as a great possession.

So with the Bible many parts may seem useless to you—yet some are of priceless value. As one example take the book of Deuteronomy. There are in it many laws useless to us, but there are also some statements of eternal and priceless truth, such as: Thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind.

This is the highest aim a man can put before himself.

III. My third suggestion is that you make a habit of giving some of your best time each day to reading your Bible. By your best time I mean the time when your mind is fresh and keen. I believe in the custom of reading a little of the Bible every night before going to bed, because it puts good thoughts in your mind to spend the night there and that is a fine thing to have; but I do not think that the last few moments at night are a time when the mind or heart is very keen, and I do not think it is a good time to learn anything. So I would suggest that you give a few moments each day of your best time to the Bible. Notice, too, that I say make a habit of doing this. It is not necessary to dwell on the value of habit; it must have been drilled into you; but you might notice that the power of habit, which is very great and very harmful when the habit is bad, is just as great and correspondingly helpful when the habit is good. So I say, make a habit of giving some of your best time every day to your Bible, and do not let anything interfere with it or push it aside.

IV. My fourth chief suggestion is that you read your Bible practically. You remember in Nicholas Nickleby, Mr. Squeers' method of teaching. First, the boy learned to spell horse, then he went out and combed the horse, or he spelled window, then he went out and washed the window. Mr. Squeers was a bad man, but he had gotten hold of a good method. You may well apply it to your Bibles. First, search them for some practical truth, then go out and practice it. It is perfectly useless to read, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, and then go out and either forget it or do somebody a mean trick. You must go out and try to do it. It is useless to read, Blessed are the pure in heart, and then go out and forget it or be impure in thought or deed. You must practice it. You must be absolutely and chivalrously pure yourself and help others to be pure. The Bible is first and foremost a practical book; it teaches you what you must do. The traveler who studies his map, but does not follow it, will get lost; the pilot who pores over his chart and does not follow it will wreck his boat; the man who learns the laws and then disobeys them is liable to land in jail. The Bible is all of these: a map for the traveler by land, a chart for the sailor, a book of rules for the player of life's game. Read it and then obey it.

This is the point that Jesus insisted on in the great parable in the seventh chapter of St. Matthew: There were two men who built each a house. One house fell, the other stood. The difference was that one man obeyed the word, the other did not.

VI. My fifth and last suggestion is that you read your Bible with the help of prayer. Prayer for wisdom to understand; for as St. James says, "If any of you lacketh wisdom let him ask of God, who giveth to all and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him". Never forget that Christ Himself said, "The Spirit of God shall lead you into all truth". You may be sure that if you pray to God His Spirit will show you more and moer clearly the truth about Him, and illuminate for you the dark places in His Word. And pray for the will and power to obey it. It is much easier to understand God's Word than it is to obey it. There is a dark, mysterious Power striving to pull you down, but there is a greater Power striving to pull you up. Read your Bibles with prayer, and you shall know the truth. You shall learn the will of God, and have grace and power to fulfil the same.

Almighty God, who has caused all Holy Scriptures to be written for our learning, grant that we may so read them that we may both learn Thy will and receive power to obey it. Through Jesus Christ our Lord.

BELIEF IN HEALING.

Mr. Editor:

In the interesting article on "Lourdes, Healer of Bodies", by the Rev. James Sheerin, in your issue of February 5, some things said there make it hard to keep silent, even at the risk of being classed with those who rush in where angels fear to tread.

The writer does not understand just what the following means: "A Christendom that has come to look upon an exceptional wonder or a miraculous event as the preferred method of Church work has tended to push moral service and spiritual development more and more into a background that is half hidden by superstition and fear." The Church that Christ founded was born and cradled amid miracles—the miracles of conversion, of the baptism of the Holy Ghost; the miracles of casting out demons, of healing the sick and raising the dead; the freeing of Peter from Herod's prison in answer to prayer, etc.; and towering above them all, the miracles of Christ's resurrection and ascension, which closed a ministry in which miracles had a daily part. Any church that cuts out the "heavenly intrusion" of conversion, for such intrusions are needed not only to turn men from the grosser sins to the Lord, but to turn others living selfish, worldly lives into disciples who set their Lord first and lay all they possess on His altar. And the churches of today that wish to get back the power of the early Church must seek the "heavenly intrusions" that gave her her power—conversion, the outpouring of the Holy Ghost and the freeing of men's bodies from bondage. When Jesus asked the ruler of the synagogue if the woman whom Satan hath bound, lo, these eighteen years should be set free on the Sabbath, He made it plain for all time that the physical infirmity that bent her over was due to Satan's work, whose work He came to destroy. "And He healed all who were brought to Him." God permits Satan to tempt men and also permits him to attack their bodies, as shown by the Saviour's words above. As sin-sick men must go to Christ to heal their souls, to deliver them from Satan's bondage, why should they not go to the same Lord to heal their bodies when bound by the same enemy as their souls? Jesus came to free the captives. Has He lost His power or has the unchangeable Christ changed His methods?

Mr. Sheerin's closing paragraph suggests the thought that those who seek healing of the Lord are slackers, and therefore those societies and evangelists who teach that the Lord is still interested in men's bodies as well as their souls are breeding a race of slackers. These evangelists urge people to consecrate themselves to the Lord before asking healing of Him, and this consecration is the beginning of a daily warfare against the enemy in which "heavenly intrusions" are needed to help men today to carry out the commands of Jesus.

STATUARY CONTROVERSY, CHRIST CHURCH, NORFOLK.

Mr. Editor:

In dealing with the above matter in your issue of February 12, you say:

"It will save law suits if they (laymen) ascertain the views of prospective rectors about the doctrine of the adoration of the Virgin and like matters before calling them."

Permit me, as a member of the parish conversant with the facts, to state that no question of churchmanship was involved in the controversy which turned solely upon the question of the respective rights of rector and vestry in the control of fixed memorials. The very resolution of the vestry upon which the rector went to court ended as follows:

"Resolved, further, that the rector place, or be authorized to place, the statue of the Virgin Mary in any other part of the church (than the Selden Memorial Chapel) he may see fit."

The resolution quoted was reported in both the Norfolk and the Richmond newspapers.

CITING THE AUTHORITY—OR LACK OF IT.

Mr. Editor:

Mr. Marsilliot is right. More of us should confess our ignorance. It may be logical to say that because we ask our friends to pray for us, ergo, we should invoke the prayer of departed saints who are nearer the mercy seat.

The answer is that the Protestant Episcopal Church has decreed otherwise.

"The Romish Doctrine concerning Invocation of Saints is a fond (foolish) thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God" (see Article XXII).

However, let us not despair. The next General Convention will repeal the "obnoxious" articles, and then we will be free to practice not only the Invocation of Saints, but can pray to the Virgin and Pope as well.

A WORTHY MEMORIAL.

Mr. Editor:

Last year the Diocesan Convention of the Pennsylvania Diocese voted to observe the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Lenten Offering. As I am now rector of the parish in which this offering was begun, the Bishop of the Diocese appointed me as a member of the committee. Immediately upon meeting I suggested to the committee that it was a suitable time to have a national memorial of John Marston, the man who thought of the idea and put it into practice. The committee agreed, and George W. Jacobs made a motion "that all monies received from the Lenten Offering this year over $500,000 be set aside until there came to be $100,000 in the fund, this fund to be held by the National Council as a John Marston Memorial Fund the annual interest of this fund to be used for preparing native men for Holy Orders in the several foreign fields where our Church is working". The idea being expressed by the maker of the motion that should this year fail to secure the full fund, all surplus over the half million mark each succeeding year be added to the fund until it reached the goal, $100,000. This motion was adopted by the Diocesan Committee.

When the National Council appointed its committee to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Lenten Offering, this proposal outlined above was eliminated. As I understand it now, there is not to be any national appeal for a fund to commemorate the memory of John Marston.

As this seems to be the case, I am proposing that there be a voluntary movement among those who desire to commemorate the memory of this thoughtful man. To start it the Sunday school that began the offering fifty years ago, under his leadership, will dedicate its entire offering this year toward a memorial fund to be held and administered by the National Council for the benefit of native men in foreign lands who are preparing for the Christian ministry. Mr. Marston was interested in helping men prepare for the sacred ministry and was for years a trustee of the Philadelphia Divinity School. I would be glad to hear from any schools or persons who would like to join in this commemoration.

CONFERENCE OF LIBERAL CHURCHMEN

By the Reverend James A. Mitchell

THE second yearly Conference of Liberal Churchmen of the Province of Washington and parts adjacent, under the auspices of the Philadelphia Branch of the National Church League, was held in St. Stephen's Community House, Philadelphia, on Tuesday and Wednesday, February 15 and 16. The Rev. Carl Grammar, D. D., rector of St. Stephen's Church, acted as host to the gathering, and together with the Rev. Granville Taylor, President of the Philadelphia Branch of the League, gave the welcome at the opening meeting. A large and representative group of clergy and laymen attended.

The Conference was conducted by the method of carefully prepared papers, with the discussion thereof led by competent critics and then thrown open to the registered attendants. Discussion was often interestingly heated, but always open-minded and ultimately relieved by the saving grace of humor. Not until the last paper of the Conference, which dealt with the steps necessary to preserve the comprehensive nature of the Church, did the note change from "liberal" to "party-propaganda". This was partly due to the nature of the subject and partly to the persuasive eloquence of the initial commentator, the Rev. A. G. Cummins, D. D., who disclaimed his introduction as a "roaring lion" and called himself a "suckling dove", but whose roar nevertheless reached the newspapers and thereby branded the Conference in the public press. This was an injustice to the spirit of the gathering, which was essentially liberal and open-minded.

The opening prayer was by the Rev. Walter F. Prince, Ph. D., on the subject, "Has Psychic Research Made Revelation and Miracle More Reasonable"? Dr. Prince's answer to this moot question was an unequivocal "Yes", bolstered up by various modern tales from the experience of himself and his friends as to hallucinations, telepathy, clairvoyance, dreams and the casting out of evil spirits. The atmosphere of the "seance" produced by this flood of interesting psychic phenomena bade fair to turn the hard-boiled Conference into an experience meeting until a serious-faced brother from the South pointed out that his horrible dreams of a sixty-five foot fall from a church tower had as yet been unfulfilled, and that the use of calomel and castor oil was often a preventative for the worst of these psychic experiences.

The Rev. Samuel Shoemaker's paper on "Conversion" turned thoughts in a more serious channel. The recent discussions in the Church press of the movement known as "Buchmanism" made this paper most pertinent and interesting, for Mr. Shoemaker took occasion to acknowledge his own debt to Mr. Buchman and to point out how, in his opinion, the movement had been maligned. Any such free-lance, truly evangelistic movement, said he, is opposed by two types: the Pharisees, who control established religion, and the sinners, who are afraid to face the Christ. He admitted the mistakes of "Buchmanism", but said some were inevitable in any such dangerous business. He pointed out that St. Paul caused a riot or a conversion wherever he went. The question is, do we? He closed with the conviction that a Church which really believed in conversion could turn the restlessness and license of this generation into allegiance to Christ. Dr. George C. Foley, in comment, pointed out that the Vulgate and A. V. translation of the term "conversion" and the theological teaching of Augustine had turned the term into a passive concept of something done by God to us. It was, rather, a moral action on our part involving a consciousness of the reality of Christ and a consciousness of our relation to Him. How many of us in the Episcopal Church, he said, can say we are aware of the reality of Christ?

The evening session on Tuesday was opened by a most scholarly paper by the Rev. George A. Barton, Ph. D., LL.D., on "The New Testament Teaching on the Lord's Supper". This was an honest effort to approach a most disputed question without prejudice and bias and to permit the New Testament to speak for itself. The points of view of the Synoptic Gospels, of Paul and of the Fourth Gospel were treated chronologically. The paper was received with much enthusiasm, and publication was advocated and authorized. Comment was in general agreement that Liberals should resist efforts to fasten any one concept of the Lord's Supper on the Church.

The Rev. Beverly Tucker, Jr., D. D., closed the day's proceedings with a discussion on the "Use and Abuse of Ceremonial", wherein with broad-mindedness and sanity he pointed the legitimate use of ceremonial in enhancing worship, beauty and the corporate life of man. The important thing, he concluded, is to follow Christ's command and "worship in spirit and truth".

The sessions on Wednesday were preceded by the service of Holy Communion in St. Stephen's Church, at which time a most able sermon was preached by the Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., D. C. L., Bishop of Pennsylvania. The next paper was perhaps the most remarkable of the entire Conference. It wandered far afield from the announced subject of "Church and State", but with keen insight and dry humor penetrated to the basic problem which lies beneath all such surface situations. The speaker, the Rev. Charles O. Scoville, D. D., due to his close proximity to Yale University, his church being directly on the green, is in close touch with the university thought of the day and has acquired the rare ability of seeing with the eye both of scientist and clergyman. He diagnosed our present troubles as due to two diametrically opposite processes of thought: one the "scientific"—honest, fearless, ruthless in its search for the truth; the other, for want of a name, the "cumberbunce"—which denotes as supernatural all phenomena which cannot be immediately classified and explained as natural. The origin of the term "cumberbunce" well illustrates this method of reasoning. A gentleman walking along the seashore met a very strange animal indeed, unlike anything he had ever beheld. "Ah," said he, "this is a cumberbunce." "How do you know?" said his friend.

Well,

> "I knew it was not a paper doll,
> A pencil or a parasol,
> A tennis racquet or a cheese;
> And since I'm not a perfect dunce
> It had to be a cumberbunce."

The "cumberbunce" type of thought, said Dr. Scoville, is responsible for many of our so-called "Christian" doctrines; it allows errors to creep on from generation to generation; under the guise of a high, holy purpose it fosters anti-social propaganda; it is the fond parent of such sects as the Christian Scientist. And it is, in the last analysis, contrary to the method and spirit of Jesus.

The Rev. C. G. Twombly, in comment, had nothing to say directly on the paper, but much to say regarding the necessity of active participation by the clergy in crusades against community and national vice. A discussion, which promised to become most interesting, was cut short by noonday service.

Luncheon was served to all registered attendants of the Conference as guests of St. Stephen's Church. And when the chairs had been pushed back, the Rt. Rev. Robert L. Harris, D. D., Bishop of Marquette, Mich., read the last paper. The first half was a very sane presentation of the necessity of preserving the comprehensive character of the Church and adapting it to the American scene. "The rank, individualistic Protestant; the black-gowned monk reeking of the Middle Ages; and the go-getter parson with yellow shoes and red tie, each may think he is representative, but the Church must strike some middle course, believing the truth lies there." And the Protestant Episcopal Church, as does no other, represents this sanity. The second half of the paper was in the nature of a tirade against the intrusion of Romanism in the Protestant Episcopal Church. As a practical solution the Bishop presented a proposal of fourteen points, which might be summarized as a program for organizing a definite "Liberal" party in the National Church, Diocese and parish.

The shortness of life . . . spreads the feeling of criticalness all through life, and makes each moment prepare for the next, makes life prepare for life. This is its power. Blessed is he who feels it. Blessed is he whose experience each day and ach hour has all the happiness and all the solemnity of a parent towards the day and the hour to which it gives birth, stands sponsor for it, holds it for baptism at the font of God. Such days are sacred in each other's eyes. The life in which such rays succeed each other is a holy family, with its monuments "bound to each other by natural piety".—Phillips Brooks.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE COMMUNITY

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING—ARTICLE VIII.

The Ten Commandments—Continued.

The SECOND COMMANDMENT—Worship.

The First Commandment is bound to precede the second. The child must be taught belief in God before he can grasp the next step. However, the two properly go hand in hand; naturally, if you believe in a Supreme Lord over all, you give allegiance to that Lord. Teach your child, therefore, to worship God.

What is worship? Let us pause here and discuss this question. It will be helpful for you to know the dictionary meaning of the word, and I give you Webster's; "WORSHIP—v. t. 1. To treat with the reverence due to merit or worth; to respect; honor. 2. To pay divine honors to; to reverence with supreme respect and veneration; to perform religious exercises in honor of; to adore; venerate. Synonyms—Adore, revere, reverence, bow to, honor."

Now, every one of these explanatory words in a religious sense has reference to God. To worship God means that there is something the child must himself do or perform in his relation with God. To gradually lead him to do something in relation to God will eventually cause him, as his mental processes develop, to give some thought to God. That in itself is a very desirable thing for you to bring about in your child's life. If through your efforts God has a place in your child's thought-life, you have done something for your child that will last him into and through eternity something that all the other interests that later come into his life will never crowd out entirely. With the human being, thinking about God carries with it some form of natural expression; this we call worship.

Worship includes two definite activities which the child must be taught to do as a part of his daily life. 1. Prayer. 2. Praise.

1. Prayer. All prayer to God may be divided into three parts:

(a) Petition.
(b) Confession.
(c) Thanksgiving.

I cannot tell you which you will start first; that must be according to your own ideas in this matter. (When I use the word your in these comments I have in mind you and the child's father jointly—yours is the work of early training, but the father must be right with you in mind and spirit.) But I do feel strongly that you will make a serious error if you do not early inculcate in the child's mind the habit of thanking God for His blessings. I understand that "Now I lay me, etc.", is usually the first prayer a child is taught and the Lord's Prayer is the second. It is absolutely necessary that you put in the child's mouth at first some words to say. Therefore you must decide what prayer among the many offered us in the Prayer Book or in other places, you will choose for him. If your selected prayer does not contain an expression of thankfulness, it should be added by you.

Again, it is not enough to teach him one form of prayer and let that suffice for his whole life. As he grows older new prayers must be found or devised for him. I once knew a man who, when suddenly confronted in his agony by the need to pray, went half through "Now I lay me", etc., before he realized that his words failed to express his need. With the sweat pouring from his face he stopped, groaned, and ended with "Lord! if you don't know; I can't tell you". Does this sound like blasphemy? Maybe. But God heard; and relief came. Whoever taught him his first prayer failed to guide him into the next stage. He told me later: "Yes, ma'am, my mother taught me my 'Now I lay me' and I stuck to it for her sake till I kinder lost my bearings. But it wasn't a man's prayer, so I quit."

As soon as a child is old enough to ask things of his human father he is old enough to understand that he may go also to his heavenly Father for what he wants, putting his requests into his own words. He should be taught to use both forms—the written form and his own words.

Where and how shall a child be taught to pray, or to talk to God? Any mother who attempts to teach a child prayer, though she may teach him hundreds of words. I other things will absolutely fail to teach the spirit of to pray with the family sitting about and talking about have repeatedly seen this attempted. Worse than that, I have been invited to come in and "hear little Jack say his prayers; he is so cute". I cannot too emphatically condemn such an attitude towards a child's prayer-life. Try it yourself. Get down on your knees in a room full of people, or even with one person, not in sympathy with your mood of the moment, and see if you can concentrate on God. You will be so self-conscious you will be unable to think of even the words to say, much less of the spirit of your petition. Jesus knew psychology. He said, "Go into your closet and shut the door". Private prayer must be private. If your home is so congested that you can't be alone to pray, get up in the middle of the night; get up half an hour earlier in the morning; go into the fields, or into the woods; go into the nearest church that keeps open on week days. Go, find your own "closet", and take your child with you.

In commenting on how to pray, I should not feel it necessary to mention this to Episcopal mothers did I not observe a growing tendency among us to sit up or half kneel at prayer in church. As far back as I can remember, Episcopalians whom I knew knelt on the floor. Why have we stopped this practice? It is not necessary to kneel to make God hear, but an humble petition to our Lord and Master becomes more humble, if the position is humble. You may not agree with me, but I ask you at least to think about it. In olden times we turned around with our backs to the pulpit and knelt on the floor, resting our arms on the pew seats. Why did we stop that practice? It seems to me a beautiful one; so nice and private. Just God and me; and beside me, my neighbor and God. What could be more convenient and beautiful than when with children to kneel down thus with them and help them to make the responses, pointing to the words with your finger even long before they can read. Perhaps the little ones won't get so tired if they can read along and pray along with mother.

And just one word about the attitude of prayer at the bedside. A number of mothers have told me when questioned on this point: "I think it wicked to teach a child to kneel to me when saying his prayers. No, I kneel beside him and we say our prayers together, and each then says a separate prayer aloud and then a private prayer without words." Many mothers have said that to me. "We kneel together." God cannot help but hear the prayer of a little child and his mother kneeling together!

Recent Events at the Virginia Theological Seminary.

Eight former students of the Virginia Theological Seminary, Alexandria, returned to their alma mater on the night of February 9 to speak to the present student body on what they had found to be the most important aspects of their work in the ministry. All of the alumni were men who had been out of the Seminary not more than two years.

These talks were given at the weekly "faculty meeting", an old tradition of the Virginia Seminary, each man being allowed ten minutes. The program proved to be one of the most stimulating and interesting of the year. The success of the evening has led the Seminary faculty to plan such an "alumni meeting" as a part of each year's schedule from now on.

The men who spoke were: The Rev. Leslie Glenn, of Worcester, Mass.; the Rev. Charles Sheerin, of Fredericksburg, Va.; the Rev. Theodore H. Evans, of Waynesboro, Va.; the Rev. Garrett Stearly, of Jersey City, N. J.; the Rev. George Trowbridge, of New Haven, Conn.; the Rev. Cornelius Trowbridge, of New York City, N. Y.; the Rev. William Laird, of Richmond, Va., and the Rev. Phil Jensen, of Owings Mills, Md.

Another notable recent event in the life of the Virginia Seminary was the "quiet day" held February 8, by the Rev. Robert Wilder, General Secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement. The student body assembled in Prayer Hall for a period of meditation and prayer in the morning, and for a second session in the afternoon.

Dr. Wilder divided his meditations into a study of prayer, a study of missions and a study of the temptations in the life of theological students. The first period, devoted to the personal religious life, was found especially helpful. Dr. Wilder told of the meaning of prayer in his own experience and the steps which he had found useful in keeping up the morning watch, or early morning prayer period. He suggested that this period should include a time of confession, a time of thanksgiving, a time of intercession—with different intercessions for the different days of the week—and a final time of quiet, waiting upon God.

At a special morning watch service held Wednesday morning by Dr. Wilder before he left, the majority of the students were present in Prayer Hall for a final time of meditation under his leadship.

Eight students of the Seminary were selected by Robert J. Plumb, president of the student body, to represent the Seminary at Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Va., February 15-17. The Union Seminary, a Presbyterian institution, invited this delegation from the Virginia Seminary in order to renew the fellowship between the seminaries. The last such meeting was when a group came to Alexandria from Richmond two years ago. The delegates this year lived at Union Seminary, attended classes and became acquainted with the life there.

A New Church School for Boys.

William Oliver Stevens, Ph. D., Litt. D., educator, author and artist, for several years head master of the Roger Ascham School, near White Plains, Westchester County, N. Y., will be head master of the Cranbook School for Boys, which will open its doors to students in the fall at Bloomfield Hills, near Birmingham, Mich.

The school, which is affiliated with the Episcopal Church, is the gift of Mr. and Mrs. George C. Booth and represents an endowment of more than $1,250,000. It will have accommodations for sixty-five boarders and one hundred and thirty-five day students. Registration for the first school year will be limited to the seventh, eighth and ninth grades; thereafter a grade will be added each year until the twelfth grade is included, providing full college preparation.

The Board of Directors of Cranbrook School includes Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, and Dr. S. S. Marquis, rector of Christ Church, Bloomfield Hills. The Advisory Board includes the Rt. Rev. Herman Page, Bishop of Michigan; Dr. Clarence Cook Little, President of the University of Michigan, and George G. Booth.

Mission at Glasgow.

From January 23 to 28 the Rev. Douglas I. Hobbs, rector of Trinity Church, Rocky Mount, conducted a mission at St. John's Church, Glasgow, following up the Bishops' Crusade in the Diocese. Mr. Hobbs made a deep impression, and the attendance increased until the congregations represented the entire community, rather than just the members of St. John's.

St. John's, Glasgow, is one of three churches in Natural Bridge Parish which is at present without a rector, the other two being Christ Church, Buena Vista, and Trinity, at Natural Bridge Station, so that Mr. Hobbs' series of services came as a welcomed treat to the congregation.

The Crusade in Lexington.

At R. E. Lee Memorial Church, Lexington, the Rev. Dr. Churchill J. Gibson, rector, the Crusade was conducted in a splendid way by the Rev. W. A. R. Goodwin, D. D., a member of the faculty of William and Mary College and rector of Bruton Parish, at Williamsburg. The series of services began on Monday, February 7, and continued through the 11th, with splendid congregations, and the Crusade produced a great impression upon the members of other churches as well as the Episcopalians of the town. Dr. Goodwin's general subject was "The Progressive Revelation of God", and it was handled with a scholarly as well as spiritual approach. His conferences were largely attended, and aroused great interest. He was called upon to speak to various civic organizations, and conducted the student Bible classes, which are a part of the curriculum.

Interesting features of the Crusade were the large vested choir, made up, to a considerable extent, of students, who were present at all the services, and the fact that two of the basketball games were postponed until after our services. Dr. Goodwin spoke once at the Virginia Military Institute to a big proportion of the corps, who came voluntarily to hear him. The vestry of the Washington and Lee Church Club has been very active in stimulating interest in Dr. Goodwin's meetings, canvassing the whole of the student body for attendance and stimulating the choir and follow-up work.

The Rev. Mr. Copenhaver, of Baltimore, is conducting the yearly pre-Lenten revival at V. M. I., preaching every night during the week, beginning February 13. Captain Jamerson, the Senior Warden of the Episcopal Club of V. M. I., is leading the services.

The Bishops' Crusade at St. Mark's Church, Shreveport.

National Crusaders were at two points in Louisiana for the Bishops' Crusade. The Crusaders were the Rt. Rev. Frederick B. Howden, D. D., Bishop of New Mexico; the Rev. Mr. Robert N. Spencer, of Kansas City, and Mr. Thomas Q. Dix, of St. Louis.

Preparatory services had been held from time to time, beginning with St. Andrew's Day. The Crusaders came direct from New Orleans. The preparatory services on Sunday, January 30, were the Holy Communion at 7:30 in the morning; children's service, with the Rev. Mr. Spencer as speaker, at 9:30; Morning Prayer at 11 o'clock, with the Bishop of New Mexico as the preacher, and a meeting for men, with Mr. Dix as speaker, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. The Crusade was opened with a mass meeting at 8 o'clock, with the Bishop of New Mexico as the preacher. Services were held daily through Friday as follows: Holy Communion at 7:30, service of intercession at noon, a conference led by the Rev. Mr. Spencer at 3 o'clock, and a mass meeting each evening at 8 o'clock.

Mr. Spencer was peculiarly fitted for the conferences and made a lasting impression on the large congregations that heard him daily. The mass meetings were broadcast and appreciative acknowledgments were received from many points in Missouri, New Mexico, Texas and Louisiana.

Bishop Howden's sermons were unusually forceful and the Crusade was a vital contribution to the work of the Church in Shreveport and the adjacent territory.

Parochial Mission.

The Rev. Dr. Llewellyn N. Caley, rector of St. Martin's Church, Oak Lane, conducted a parochial mission last week in St. Luke's Church, Kensington, the Rev. William J. Hawthorne, rector. There were celebrations of the Holy Communion each morning, Bible instruction at 3 P. M., young people's service at 4:15 P. M., and a mission service at 8 P. M. The mission closed on Friday night with Bishop Garland's visitation and confirmation.

The Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, D. D., rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Philadelphia, celebrated his seventy-seventh birthday anniversary February 7. Dr. Tomkins observed the anniversary by attending several meetings connected with his work as president of the Philadelphia Federation of Churches, and rector of one of the leading parishes of the city. But during his daily conference in the parish house he paused to praise the city with which he has been so closely connected more than a quarter of a century.

Contract Let For Church Building.

Winton is a small mining town about ten miles from Scranton, in which there is no church building of any kind. The rector of St. James' Church, Jermyn, began to call upon the people a few years ago and won their love and confidence. He has baptized more than eighty of their babies and has presented more than thirty in St. James' for Confirmation.

The Diocese is going to erect a parish house and church this spring. The people bought a lot and paid for it; they put a fence around it and are going to do the masonry necessary. Bishop Sterrett has just let a contract for a frame building to be put up in the early spring.

Death of Clergyman's Wife.

Mrs. George Van Fossen, Jr., died on Sunday night, February 6, in her home in Washington, D. C. She was ill only for a few days and her death was unexpected. Mrs. Van Fossen was a Bethlehem girl, a graduate of Bishopthorpe Manor School and she and her husband lived here for some years, when the Rev. Mr. Van Fossen was the first Warden of Leonard Hall. The Van Fossens organized a number of missions in the vicinity of Bethlehem and gave the postulants of the Hall actual experience in parochial work while taking their academic course at Lehigh University.

There survive her husband, her mother, her daughter, Mrs. Edward Schwab, of Washington, D. C., and two grandsons.

The funeral services were held in the Pro-Cathedral of the Nativity on February 9, 1927, Bishop Talbot, Dean Gateson and the Rev. G. P. Briggs officiating. Interment took place in the family plot of Nisky Hill Cemetery.

A Remarkable Mission.

That the average man is still willing to listen to hour and even two-hour sermons, when of the proper sort, was conclusively demonstrated in a remarkable mission, recently conducted by the Rev. Walter E. Bentley, in the Church of the Mediator, Allentown, the Rev. R. N. Merriman, rector. During the eight days of the mission Mr. Bentley preached nine times, and on each occasion to a congregation that filled the church. On the last evening every available space was filled where chairs could be placed, and some stood outside. The sermons, with only one or two exceptions, were doctrinal. The shortest was fifty minutes, and the longest, delivered in two sections, went into the third hour. The congregations, for the most part, were made up of people of intelligence, numbering a large percentage of college graduates, among whom were college professors, professional and business men and women. That the long sermons were not distasteful to them was shown by the fact that in most instances they returned again and again to hear him. Something akin to a religious revival has in consequence been kindled in the parish.

Crusade Preaching Missions.

The Rev. J. J. Lanier, the rector of St. Thomas' Church, Norton, has recently conducted the preaching missions of the Bishops' Crusade at Kinsley and at Dodge City, Kansas. His services at both places were helpful and attracted the attention of the whole community in each case. A deep and lasting impression has been made and an abiding good in the upbuilding of the Church will result from these meetings.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D. Bishop

The Bishops' Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade in the Diocese of Harrisburg combines the initial campaign with the follow-up campaign. The plans of the National Commission on Evangelism suggest holding the initial campaign in two or more strategic centres in the Diocese. In the Diocese of Harrisburg these centres are Altoona in the western section, where the Crusade is being held in St. Luke's Church, the Rev. R. A. Hatch, rector, and at York in the Eastern section at St. John's Church, the Rev. Paul S. Atkins, rector. The dates of the former Crusade were January 23-28, and of the latter January 30-February 4. The Crusaders at Altoona were Bishop Patridge, of Western Missouri; the Rev. W. D. Smith, D. D., of Richmond, Va.; Mrs. C. R. Pancoast, of Philadelphia, and the Rev. J. T. Ogburn, of Harrisburg. At York, Mrs. Pancoast and Bishop Patridge were the Crusaders. Meanwhile in about fifty other parishes and missions in the Diocese the Crusade will be preached at dates ranging from January 9 to April 11. Many of these Crusaders will be held contemporaneously. Thus, the follow-up movement coincides with the initial movement. Many of the Diocesan clergy are taking part in this follow-up movement. In fact, the large majority of the Crusades are in the nature of an exchange of parishes on the part of the local rectors, extending over a period of from three to ten days. Reports thus far indicate that a large and sympathetic interest is being shown by congregations in this great evangelistic movement.

Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese, held in St. Luke's Church, Altoona, on Tuesday and Wednesday, February 1 and 2, Bishop Davenport, of Easton, Md., emphasized the importance of the work in the rural parishes of the church, and the debt that the city parishes owe to the rural parishes. Mrs. Charles Pancoast, of Philadelphia, gave two addresses filled with inspiration and information. Bishop Darlington also alluded to the great and urgent need of giving adequate support to the work of the Church in general, as well as in the Diocese. The meeting opened with a Quiet Hour conducted by the Rev. Edward M. Frear, of State College. On Wednesday morning the Holy Communion was celebrated by the rector, the Rev. R. Allen Hatch. The registration showed one hundred and four women present at the meeting.

The Bishops' Crusade.

Heavy rains did not deter the large congregations which came to hear the message of the Crusade brought to Norfolk by the Rt. Rev. John C. Ward, D. D., Bishop of Erie, and the Rev. John Gass, of Charleston, W. Va.

On Sunday afternoon, February 6, a large and enthusiastic mass meeting of colored people was addressed by the Crusaders. Sunday night the Episcopal congregations of Norfolk and vicinity met in the City Auditorium. Services were held in St. Luke's, Norfolk, during the week, in addition to the early celebrations of the Holy Communion, services of Intercession, and prayer followed by personal conferences.

A deep and lasting impression was made upon all who attended these services. The Crusaders presented most effectively a portrayal of Jesus Christ and His kingdom and pointed out clearly and definitely what must be done in order to become like Him and to establish His kingdom on earth.

From Norfolk, Bishop Ward and the Rev. Mr. Gass have gone to Petersburg, and from there will proceed to Danville.

Following up the Crusade, preaching missions are being held in over a hundred churches in Southern Virginia, each clergyman of the Diocese being assigned to a parish other than his own.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

The Follow-Up Program of the Crusade.

The Maryland Commission on Evangelism was fortunate in being able to secure the Rev. Julius A. Schaad, of Augusta, Ga., in carrying out the follow-up program of the Bishops' Crusade.

Three evenings were devoted to addresses on Lay Evangelism for men and women, the meetings being held in the parish house of Grace and St. Peter's Church, February 9-11. The gathering represented thirty parishes. Three hundred and fifty persons were present through the three evenings. There were many men present at all the sessions and they took an active part in asking questions. These meetings were a success from every point of view, and many gained a loftier vision of what can be done if laymen and laywomen were given a larger share in the responsibility of the spiritual work of the church.

Mr. Schaad addressed the Maryland clericus on Monday, February 14, in St. Paul's Chapel, speaking on the "Prophets and the Times", preparing the way for the three afternoon discussions which followed in the Diocesan House, where the clinic on conducting parish missions was held. Most of the city clergy and some from the rural districts were present. Mr. Schaad took up in detail the technique and machinery of setting up parish missions, the preparation on the part of the missioner and the message most suitable to meet the spiritual needs of the times.

While in Baltimore he also conducted a mission at the Church of the Ascension, beginning Sunday, February 13, giving an opportunity to the clergymen and laymen of the Diocese to see a mission actually at work. Many were inspired by his spiritual addresses and all who came in contact with him felt lifted to a higher plane of church life.

The Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade in the Diocese has met with a response that holds out abundant hope for its ultimate success. The two North Carolina cities visited by the National Crusaders, Raleigh and Charlotte, witnessed an outpouring of clergy and people that is almost unique in the history of the Diocese.

During the week of February 6-11 the Crusaders were in the Convocation of Raleigh, and the following week in Charlotte. The leader, Bishop D. L. Ferris, of Western New York, made a deep impression with his simple, evangelistic sermons at the evening mass meetings, and his daily services of intercessory prayer. The Rev. C. E. McAllister, Executive Secretary of the Diocese of Newark, led the clergy conference and made a number of addresses that were enthusiastically received. The layman, Mr. O. R. Singleton, of Washington, was a great addition to the party of Crusaders. No phase of the Church's life was left untouched, and the program included services and addresses for young and old, men and women.

One feature of the Diocesan conferences were the laymen's banquets, which reached over six hundred men and inspired them to greater usefulness in the Church.

The Crusade in the Diocese reached the parishes on Monday, February 21, when the series of preaching missions began. Every parish and mission will be reached by the clergy who go forth with the spirit of the National Crusaders among them.

Meeting of the Executive Council.

At a meeting of the Executive Council of the Diocese in Greensboro on February 3, Mr. L. C. Burwell, of Charlotte, resigned as Executive Secretary of the Field Department, following a year of great usefulness. Mr. Fred W. Glover, of Charlotte, was elected to the position. Other important action included the revising of the 1927 budget, the decision to make $6,000 the goal for the children's Lenten Offering in 1927, and the passage of a resolution congratulating the congregation of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Rocky Mount, for pledging $1,000 more than its 1927 quota for the Forward Movement. Each department of the Council made its report, showing a healthy condition of the Church and an aroused interest. The absence of the Diocesan, the Rt. Rev. Joseph Blount Cheshire, on account of illness, was regretted. The Bishop Co-adjutor, the Rt. Rev. E. A. Penick, presided, and the Bishop Suffragan was also present.

SPRINGFIELD.

Rt. Rev. John C. White, D. D., Bishop.

New Diocesan Treasurer.

The Rt. Rev. John C. White, D. D., has appointed Mr. Franklin H. Spencer Treasurer of the Diocese of Springfield, in succession to Mr. Dan G. Swannell, who has resigned on account of ill health. Bishop White requests that all monies usually sent to Mr. Swannell be forwarded to Mr. Spencer, St. Paul's Parish House, Second Street and Lawrence Avenue, Springfield, Ill., from now on, as well as all bills to be paid.

Mr. Pascal E. Hatch, Senior Warden of Christ Church, Springfield, has been appointed by the Bishop as Chairman of the Department of Finance, succeeding Mr. Dan G. Swannell, resigned.

The Rev. S. A. Macdonell, rector of St. John's Church, Decatur, has been appointed by the Bishop as Chairman of the Field Department, succeeding the Rev. A. G. Wilson, resigned.

The Advent Offering for 1926, representing the gifts of the boys and girls of the Diocesan Church Schools, amounts to $371.87, the largest total by a third of the three such offerings so far taken by this Diocese.

WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA.

The Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop

The Crusade in a Mountain Diocese.

Western North Carolina, the mountain Diocese of the Church east of the Rockies, has had visits from National Crusaders at two points within the Diocese, Asheville and Hickory, five days each, the last week in January and the first week in February, under the leadership of the Rt. Rev. William T. Capers, D. D., Bishop of West Texas, ably assisted by the Rev. Richard W. Trapnell, of St. Andrew's Church, Wilmington, Del., and Mrs. T. W. Bickett, of Raleigh, N. C., widow of North Carolina's Governor during the war period.

Trinity Church, Asheville, the largest church in the Diocese, the Rev. G. Floyd Rogers, rector, and chairman of the Diocesan Commission, was crowded to capacity at every preaching service, when Bishop Capers presented the message of the Crusade with power and zeal for the things of God and Christ in the day when the Church needs the highest loyalty of her people. Bishop Capers was among his former parishioners at Trinity, and close to his native Diocese of South Carolina. Conferences that were forecasted for small groups became centers of the deepest spiritual interest under the direction of Mr. Trapnell and Mrs. Bickett, and filled the halls provided for them. Clergy and laity from surrounding towns were in constant attendance. The choirs of Trinity, All Soul's and St. Mary's united for the Crusade.

At Hickory, the Rev. S. B. Stroup, rector, the story was repeated, with an overcrowded church and parish hall representing the Diocese in its Morgantown Convocation at every service. The good roads of North Carolina fitted into Crusade plans admirably, as people gathered at Hickory and returned home every evening from towns twenty-five to fifty miles away. Bishop Capers' sermon on the Stewardship of Children went to the heart of the Church's life for all time. Mr. Trapnell brought a wholesome Christian philosophy of life and a new understanding of the spiritual dependency of every life. Mrs. Bickett stirred conviction of duty in many practical ways in the Social Service opportunity of every woman.

The Crusade continues in Western North Carolina at once in sectional Crusades at Gastonia, Lenoir and Hendersonville, the following clergy preaching: The Rev. Messrs. Harold Thomas, Charleston, S. C.; the Rev. Malcolm Taylor, Greenville, S. C., and the Rev. Arthur H. Marshall, Mt. Airy, N. C. This will be followed by special preaching in all the churches and many missions of the Diocese.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishops' Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade in this Diocese was an unqualified success. Because of the weeks of careful preparation by the Diocesan Commission, of which the Rev. C. S. Hale, Ashland, Ky., was chairman, and by the anticipation of every need on the part of the local committees, the externals of the Crusade were executed without friction in each and every point where it has been held.

There was no outward conversion of multitudes, but hundreds of people in the Diocese rededicated themselves to the work of the Church and to personal imitation of their Saviour.

It has been truly said that most of us know God through some one else. This Diocese has been fortunate in its Crusaders, both National and Diocesan. At Lexington and Covington the two most concentrated Episcopal centres, Bishop William Mercer Green, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Mississippi, conducted the Crusade. At Lexington he was assisted by the Rev. John Walker, Jr., Charlotte, N. C., and at Covington by the Rev. Dr. Mercer P. Logan, of the DuBose School. At Maysville and Frankfort the Rev. Mr. Oldham, Martinsburg, W. Va., conducted the Crusade. Mr. Sam H. Seymour, of Chattanooga, Tenn., was the lay helper.

In extension of the National Crusade, the Very Rev. R. K. Massie, D. D., Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, has recently conducted a successful Crusade at Paris, Ky., the Rev. Paul Due, rector. The Rev. W. S. Blackshear, rector of St. John's, Versailles, Ky., was given a splendid response by the congregation of the colored mission in Lexington, St. Andrew's, the Rev. W. P. Stanley, rector. The Rev. C. S. Hale assisted the Rev. Claudius Smith, of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, in a Crusade at Middlesboro, Ky., beginning February 20 and continuing through the following Friday night. At the meeting of the Diocesan Council to be held at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, further plans will be perfected for a continuance of the Crusade until the whole Diocese is reached.

The Rev. J. Howard Gibbons, Frankfort, Ky., the regular correspondent to the National Church papers, is slowly recovering from a serious and dangerous operation and illness.

Rt. Rev. S. C. Partridge, D. D., Bishop.

St. Paul's Church, Kansas City, the Rev. B. M. Washburn, rector, is shortly to be enriched by the placing of a large two-light window, the gift of Mrs. Thomas Cook in memory of her mother. The subject is Christ bearing His cross, with the crucifixion in the circle at the top between two lights.

Mrs. Cook has commissioned Powell's, of Whitefriars, to make a fine example of glass for this memorial.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop

Washington's Birthday Service.

At the request of the Sons of the Revolution of the District of Columbia, the annual service of the society, commemorative of the birth of George Washington was held in Bethlehem Chapel, Washington Cathedral, Sunday afternoon, February 20. Services were conducted by Dr. Thomas Edward Green, chaplain of the society in the District, and also chaplain of the General Society, and the Dean of Washington, the Very Rev. G. C. F. Bratenahl; the Rev. William L. DeVries, D. D., Canon and Chancellor of the Cathedral; the Rev. R. L. Wolven, chaplain to the Bishop of Washington, and the Rt. Rev. P. M. Rhinelander, Canon of Washington. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Washington.

The order of service used was that prepared by the late Rev. Randolph H. McKim, D. D., former chaplain of the Sons of the Revolution, and has been set forth by the Bishop of Washington for that purpose.

Mr. Edward F. Looker, bursar of Washington Cathedral, was chairman of the committee in charge of the service.

The Sunday-School Institute.

A meeting of the Sunday-School Institute of the Diocese was held on February 15 at 8 o'clock in St. John's Parish Hall, Lafayette Square. "The Adult Bible Class: What? Why? How?" was the subject of an address by Mr. Leon C. Palmer, Executive Secretary, National Commission on Evangelism, and chairman of the Church School Commission of the Province of Sewanee; and the Rev. F. Bland Tucker, rector of St. John's Church, Georgetown, delivered an address on the "Promotion of Missions Through the Sunday School".

Death of a Devoted Churchwoman.

St. John's Church, Georgetown, and indeed the whole community of Georgetown has suffered a severe loss in the passing away of one of its devoted Churchwomen, Mrs. Sarah Sophia Maddox Wood, who died at her home on February 6. Mrs. Wood had served continuously at St. John's Church as choir mother and Sunday-school teacher for thirty years, and was always found active in other departments of Church work whenever needed. Private funeral services were conducted at her late residence by her rector, the Rev. F. Bland Tucker, and her former rector, the Rev. Christopher Sparling, of Baltimore, and later funeral services were conducted in St. Mark's Church, Lappans Cross Roads, Washington County, Md., the interment being in St. Mark's Church Cemetery.

Mrs. Wood was the great-granddaughter of the late Bishop Clagett, and was born in Washington County, Md., February 23, 1855. She is survived by her husband and two sisters, Mrs. T. J. C. Williams and Miss A. F. Maddox, both of Baltimore.

The Rev. H. C. Lubeck, Canon of Washington, has suffered a breakdown in health, and under strict orders from his physicians is compelled to cancel all engagements for the next few months. Dr. Lubeck has endeared himself to Church people in Washington since he established his residence here, and is recognized as an outstanding preacher of spiritual power and force. Many prayers will be offered for his permanent and speedy restoration to health and strength.

Rt. Rev. F. A. Juhan, D. D., Bishop.

Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, Plans New Church.

Plans for the erection of a new church at a cost of approximately $200,000, to be located on the corner of Stockton and Park Street, has been announced by the Rev. C. A. Ashby, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville. The church building will be the final unit of a complete church plant construction program started in 1918, representing a total investment of more than $550,000.

The plans and the design for the new church were submitted to the congregation of the parish of the Good Shepherd at the morning service Sunday, February 20, and it was unanimously decided to build now.

Services are now being held in the chapel of the Sunday-school building unit which was erected in 1918. A swimming pool and a parish house were erected in 1921, and the completion of the church building will mark the finish of the church plant building program.

While no definite date of construction was announced, the project will be started within a month's time. A complete plan of financing the new church building has been arranged by the vestry.

The new church building will conform with the English style of architecture followed in the construction of the other buildings of the church plant.

MICHIGAN.

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

The Convention.

The ninety-fourth annual convention of the Diocese, in session at St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, expressed itself as opposed to compulsory military training in public schools and colleges; but supported the proposition that the convention was not opposed to military action in national defense. The winter convention was an experiment in Michigan, but a very successful one, as over two hundred delegates were in attendance from all parts of the Diocese. The convention showed a disposition to economize, and the Executive Council was instructed to fix its appropriations at a sum not to exceed its estimated income for the year. The experimental and research work of the Social Service Department was abandoned, as was also the publication of the Michigan "Churchman". It is understood, however, that through the generosity of Mrs. Henry Ford the publication of the Michigan "Churchman" will be enabled to proceed in even better form than heretofore.

The following officers were elected: Secretary of Convention, Charles O. Ford; Registrar, Rev. A. N. McEvoy.

Standing Committee—The Rev. Messrs. William D. Maxon, D. D., A. S. Gill, R. W. Woodroofe, S. S. Marquis, D. D., Professor George W. Patterson, Mr. Dudley W. Smith, Mr. Sidney T. Miller.

Clerical and Lay Deputies to the Synod of the Province of the Mid-West—The Rev. Messrs. A. S. Gill, R. W. Woodroofe, C. L. Ramsay, Henry Lewis; Messrs. E. E. Piper, Dudley W. Smith, F. B. Joy, W. C. Conover.

Alternates—The Rev. Messrs. H. L. Johnson, B. W. Pullinger, Harold McCausland, William R. Kinder; Mr. F. A. Lake.

MINNESOTA.

Rt. Rev. F. A. McElwain, D. D., Bishop.

Splendid Response to Bishops' Crusade in Minnesota.

The Lyceum in Minneapolis and the auditorium in St. Paul were crowded with members of the Episcopal Church and others for the opening of the Bishops' Crusade in the Diocese, the week beginning January 30.

The Rt. Rev. James M. Maxon, of Tennessee, and the Rev. John S. Bunting, of St. Louis, were preacher and conference leader, respectively, in Minneapolis, and the Rev. Dr. George Craig Stewart, of Evanston, Ill., and the Rev. Thomas Casady, of Omaha, preacher and conference leader in St. Paul. The Rev. Mr. Casady took the place of the Ven. Charles E. Coles, of Kansas, who was prevented by illness from fulfilling his appointment.

Total congregations of nearly nine thousand were present during the week in Minneapolis and nearly twelve thousand were present in the St. Paul Auditorium. On the opening night in St. Paul's the combined parish choirs of the city, more than four hundred in number, marched in processional and the parish choirs of Minneapolis were on the stage at the Lyceum to lead in the singing.

The Rev. Frederick D. Butler, Chairman of the Diocesan Commission on Evangelism, reports that on the Sunday following these mass meetings, there were more communicants receiving the Holy Communion in the Twin City Churches than on any other day since Christmas. This is thought to be distinctly the result of the inspiration gained from the messages of Bishop Maxon and the Rev. Dr. Stewart and their associates.

The clergy of the Diocese were all brought in to the Twin Cities during the week and clergy conferences were held daily by all four of the Crusaders. Two meetings of the laity were addressed by Bishop Maxon in Minneapolis, and Dr. Stewart was the speaker at a layman's dinner in St. Paul. Meetings were held daily for the women in Minneapolis and were adressed by the Rev. Mr. Bunting, while the Rev. Mr. Casady held two such meetings in St. Paul.

Dinners for young people were served in both cities and in St. Paul addresses were made by both the Crusaders, Dr. Stewart and Mr. Casady, and in Minneapolis by Bishop Maxon and Mr. Bunting. More than four hundred young people attended these meetings.

O Lord, Who hast taught us that all our doings without charity are nothing worth; send Thy Holy Ghost, and pour into our hearts that most excellent gift of charity, the very bond of peace and of all virtues, without which whatsoever liveth is counted dead before Thee. Grant this for Thine only Son Jesus Christ's sake. Amen.

Collect for Ash-Wednesday.

Almighty and everlasting God, Who hatest nothing that Thou hast made, and dost forgive the sins of all those who are penitent; create and make in us new and contrite hearts, that we, worthily lamenting our sins and acknowledging our wretchedness, may obtain of Thee the God of all mercy, perfect remission and forgiveness; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Into the Desert With Jesus.

F. B. Stone.

Come into the desert with Jesus!
The wilderness vast and unknown,
Where all that one sees is of God,
And man with his God is alone.

The majesty of the Creator,
Expressed in each object in sight,
And though silence as vast as the heavens
Bears down with an infinite might.

Only those in accord with their Maker,
The grandeur, the silence ,can bear,
Supported by His mighty presence,
The sense of His great, loving care.

'Twas there that our Saviour grew stronger,
Could vision the task that He faced,
And there gathered strength from His Father,
And grace for the path His love traced.

And there with our Christ in the desert,
With the things of the world swept aside,
One sees with a vision unclouded
The things that shall live and abide.

Summer Fallow and Growth.

Rural life provided many parables and happy illustrations of the kingdom of God for Jesus. We like to think that His deep human interest in the common life about Him bore witness to the patient love and care with which the Divine Creator made all things, large and small; painting the glories of His great landscapes and at the same time the wonders which can only be discovered by the microscope. That religion which teaches a Sabbatical God, who created the universe in six days and has been resting ever since, fails to reveal the One about whom Jesus said, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work". The God revealed in Christ is man's Partner in all creative production. This is our modern point of view and it is in accord with the first teachings of Christianity which also were obscured by the influences both of the ascetic life and of Calvinism.

However, the creative activity of God in nature requires change continuously, though it never really rests. The ground lies fallow; it is apparently at rest, but within the bosom of Mother Earth goes on another kind of activity, storing up and recreating new sources of life which make possible the springtime and the harvest. What is true of nature ought to be true of human nature as well. Earth and beasts and men require rest and sleep, which are just other names for a change of activity from the expenditure of energy to its storing up. Man is the only creature who can alter this universal law of rest and change, and he cannot beat it. Many of us try to get along without sufficient sleep or adequate recreation, or times of meditation or quiet, when we are filling up the reservoirs of spiritual strength and moral vigor, but we learn by experience that even the strongest of us cannot keep on expending without accumulating a reserve supply. We break down when we try to beat the universal law.

One day in seven for rest and refreshment is necessary for every man, just as eight hours of sleep every night are desirable for our physical welfare. But there is something more. The end of man's existence is neither physical nor mental activity, but spiritual growth. If we all recognize this fact the way we spend our rest days will change to fit a newly awakened sense of need. The Lord's Day is given to us not only that we may find rest and recreation and refreshment, but also that those dormant possibilities of ours as sons and daughters of God may have a chance to renew themselves in the brightness of a new vision of the Eternal. We question whether modern man is getting a new vision of God while gripping the wheel of an automobile or watching the flight of a golf ball. We admit he is getting refreshment and new health, but we long for the emergence of a new type of man who cares mightily for growth in the stature of the Man Christ Jesus and who is a bit more concerned about the kingdom of God than he is about the business and the pleasures of this earthly life. The main question of our modern world is just this: What is life, and what is its goal? Give a spiritual interpretation to life and what you do with the Lord's Day will take care of itself.

The forty days of Lent come to us in the early spring as a great opportunity to turn away from one kind of activity and examine another. In the larger cities business is interrupted by noon-day services, when the thoughts of men can be directed away from making money to the matter of winning eternal life. Social life, the giving of parties and entertainments, should cease during this season that we may seek the companionship of God and the fellowship of the saints. The value of Lent is not so much what we give up as what we take on. Summer fallow is no good unless we get ready to plant something. We covet greatly a well-kept Lent for all the parishes and missions of Eastern Oregon. In the extra services, in the quiet of that half-hour taken away from business or social activities, God grant to us all a more glorious vision of the King in His beauty, and a deeper sense of our own and humanity's kinship to God.—Oregon Trail Churchman.

A Lenten Call.

As we look forward to the Lenten season and hear the call of the Church —the announcement of additional services—more frequent celebrations of the Holy Communion—special addresses and sermons—time set apart for meditation and prayer—let us remember the whole object of Lent is that in spending forty days with the Master there may be in the days to come a more consistent walk with God, and that our lives may be stirred from within to labor for the upbuilding of Christ's Church.

There is little use in laying down definite rules for withdrawing from the world and its social duties and diversions, but we should at least realize that the fulness of the gifts of God's Spirit must always wait on repentance and amendment of life—that our souls cannot be filled unless we open up the doors and windows that God may enter in.

The history of God's revelation to man bears witness to the fact that God has chosen days and places to be consecrated to His service, and so, before Eastertide the Church has set apart this holy season as a time when in our reading, our prayer, our meditation, we think again of how Christ redeemed man from sin. In the midst of our business we cannot entirely withdraw from the world, but we may come apart for rest, for meditation, for prayer, and we may gain, if we will, a new experience in life, in which God's presence will be felt, our communion with Him become a reality, and the consciousness of the indwelling presence and guidance of His Spirit lead to a reflection of the Master's spirit and a deeper consecration of life.—The Church News, Pennsylvania.

Answering an Attack on Missions.

Speaking in London recently at a meeting of the shareholders of the Peninsular and Oriental Steamship Company, of which he is chairman, Lord Inchcape made a sweeping attack upon missionary work in China. He is credited with saying:

"I believe the antagonism to the British in China is largely due to our sending missionaries to China. Christian missionary efforts among uncivilized peoples are doubtless fully justified, but China's ancient faiths are as sacred to the Chinese as Christianity is to ourselves, and the sooner our well-meaning people give up their crusade in India and China, the better it will be for us all."

Such statements have not been allowed to pass unchallenged. There is a general consensus of opinion in Great Britain that "the revolution in China began with the landing at Canton in 1807 of Robert Morrison, the great pioneer British missionary".

China missionaries who happen to be in Great Britain at this time and missionary secretaries have been amply able to deal with Lord Inchcape's statements from the purely missionary point of view.

It is interesting to find laymen and Chinese, at present living in Great Britain, taking direct issue with the statements. A business man's point of view was represented by Mr. Archibald Rose, formerly of the Legation at Peking and now a prominent business man in London:

"Next to the missionaries themselves I have probably traveled in China as much as any Englishman," he said, "and I have nothing but praise for the work of missions. If we in the West feel that we have a message that is the highest we can imagine for ourselves, it could not be called a waste of money to help those who wish to share it with others to go and impart a knowledge of it to them."

Speaking as a representative of the Chinese students, Mr. G. Y. Oon, ex-chairman of the Chinese Students' Christian Union, frankly said, "Lord Inchcape speaks as a capitalist and only represents those who go to China to make profit out of her, a thing the missionary does not do".

One of the most notable statements, because it comes from a man independent of missions and commerce, has been that of Sir Valentine Chirol, former foreign editor of The Times. He describes Lord Inchcape's statement as "the sort of attack one more often hears from the meaner type of Europeans frequenting the bar of a Shanghai Club". He continues:

"It is just thirty years since, after a journey to China undertaken on behalf of The Times, I wrote in my 'Far Eastern Question' that 'missionary work is practically the only agency through which the influence of Western civilization reaches the masses'—to whom, apart from all dogmatic teaching, the life of the missionary, a life of exile and self-denial, whether it be the ascetic life of the Roman Catholic missionary or the family life of a Protestant missionary with wife and children, is in most cases the one object-lesson in the highest spirit of Christian ethics which intercourse with the West brings home to the most distant parts of China. The conviction I then expressed I hold more strongly than ever in the light of the much wider experience and knowledge of the East I have acquired since then in India as well as in China."

Lord Parmoor, speaking at a meeting for the furtherance of international peace, commented upon Lord Inchcape's attack and said:

"An utterance of this character ought not to pass without public protest. If we are sincere Christians we cannot help promoting missionary work. The claim of the Western trader to exclude Christian ethics and teaching from the vast population of China is an unthinkable proposition. The main object of missionary work in China has been to bring about an understanding of Christian truths of peace and good will and is naturally opposed to the whole spirit of racial antagonisms."

Two Characters.

Contrast two characters, Judas, well known, mentioned frequently, chosen by name, warned, taught by Christ Himself, yet in the end falling away, "suddenly perishing and coming to a fearful end"; and Matthias, known only in Scripture as one who, having companied with Christ and His apostles all the time of His public ministry, was deemed worthy to fill up the broken number of the twelve, and therefore doubtless had in very truth taken upon him Christ's yoke and learnt meekness and lowliness from Him, and was indeed one of those "babes" in this world's wisdom unto whom God reveals His mysteries. O miserable lot to be conspicuous before men but rejected of God, to be called yet not chosen! O blessed life to be content to be hidden from men's eyes, unknown to all men, but precious in the sight of God—such only can bear high office with safety. "Seekest thou high things for thyself, seek them not"—cling to Christ and to those He loves, and take thy life and thy work from His hand.—Selected.

God of our hope and longing,
God of our shadowed days,
God of the grief belonging
To the weary, earthbound ways,
Grant us the Gift of Laughter,
And hearts from gloom swept free
That (whatever comes hereafter)
We may here hymn Thee!

For if Thine own thus praise Thee,
As they tread the world's highways,
Each passer-by may raise Thee
A grateful, wondering gaze.
So grant the Gift of Laughter,
And minds from fears kept free,
That (whatever comes hereafter)
We may here hymn Thee!

How Shall I Keep Lent?

The question of a Lent which shall yield the maximum of spiritual benefit is before us all. "How shall I keep Lent?" we all ask ourselves. It is quite evident these days that Lent-keeping is undergoing the same testing which many other phases of the religious life are not escaping. In fact, the evaluation of Lent goes so deep that a national paper like the Churchman says editorially that we are apparently tending toward a new conception: though what it will be is not yet clear. I wonder!

I.

I myself have never had much difficulty over Lent. It has never been a morbid, negative time for those I have known best. Always has it been a welcome season, when positive and constructive spiritual work got right of way. One still finds those who feel that Lent is only a time for giving up this or that habit or indulgence. "Lent has come: so candy must go. (But can I still eat cocoanut cakes?" says some one.) "One lump of sugar in my coffee instead of two or three to have my self-denial!" There are those who sacrifice various likings and put nothing in their place. There are those who interpret fasting according to negativeness only. But they are few.

We, most of us, realize that self-denials and self-sacrifices should be by-products of a positive self-dedication. "I am so supremely interested in this one purpose that I have no interest or time for that unessential." A lad in college does not go into training for its own sake; he has his heart set on running a race or playing on a team, and therefore he disciplines himself down to constructive essentials. A man spiritually in earnest goes into spiritual training. He stands himself up before a mental looking-glass and examines himself. He says to himself, "See here now, Ebenezer X. Jenks, I'm none too proud of you. You have a habit or so you ought to be rid of. You are none too vigorous of conviction. You haven't an entirely vital spiritual constitution. You need toning up. You ought to have a faith of your own, not one in the name of your preacher, or your church, or your respectable heredity. You haven't done much on your religion for quite a bit, now have you, for some time? When did you last put in a hard day's work on your soul? How much real thinking have you done for yourself lately on such a thing as sin or the significance of Jesus of Nazareth in your business problems or on the possibility of beginning to live the eternal life here and now, and what it practically means and what practice it will take in spiritual values to grow expertly, sanely mystic? When did you last take an evening and sit down with your New Testament and read, slowly and thoughtfully, the record which, if true, is the most important fact in life"? Said gentleman shakes his head a bit ruefully at himself in the mental mirror and continues, "Lent is here. The Church says this is the time for you to tone up with the tonic of spiritual exercise. It is a challenge for you to put first things first. Give religion the right of way. Clean other things, of minor importance, out of the thoroughfare. Steadily, conscientiously, constructively, get down to business. Don't trifle. Be efficient. Eliminate non-essentials and competitive interests from your central resolution. Find out your spiritual stock-in-trade and what is really your own. For forty days now pull your belt a notch tighter; forget self-pamperings and self-diversions; be resolute; practice the enthusiasm of the square jaw and get something done!"

If the "suppositious sir", above mentioned, will do this, there will of course be self-denials. But he will not put his emphasis on them. He will be thinking of the gains of Lent; not its denials. He will be zestfully tasting a deeper joy; expedients of formal asceticism will be non-existent. In the words of the song, "Is That Somebody You"? —Rev. P. E. Osgood.

What Disturbed Him?

I remember, as if it were yesterday, Fred Curtis, now a missionary in Japan, saying: "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel to the heathen." Immediately John Foreman arose with the remark: "I know what is the matter with Curtis. He sleeps under a missionary chart on which there are 856 black squares representing 856 million heathen, and 190 green squares to represent 190 million Mohammedans." Foreman added: "Any man sleeping under such a chart must decide to become a foreign missionary or have a nightmare every night in the week."

Faith.

As I gaze on the evening, star-sown skies,
Deep down in my soul I see
That the Mind that beams through their thousand eyes
Is the Mind that dwells with me.
Aldebaran, Orion—these
And the myriad suns that shine
With yon seven-sistered Pleiades,
Are the starry kind of mine.

Through the vast, unbounded realms of space,
The ne'er-to-be-numbered spheres
Have swung, each one in his given place,
With the long, unending years.
So I soothe my soul, nor fret nor chafe,
But say my evening prayer,
And know that is One who will keep me safe
As long as the stars are there.
—Nixon Waterman, in The Christian Endeavor World.

How true it is that God carries not only the burden, but us also! How could such words as these go farther in revealing the father heart of God? So we, too, have borne the burdens of our children. "Even to hoar hairs I will carry you. I have made and I will bear. Even I will carry, and will deliver you."—B. T. Bodley.

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

The Self-Denial of Jesus.

M. L. G.

"Even Christ pleased not Himself." What a strange text that is! For we would surely suppose that a sinless Christ need not deny Himself whatever He desired.

But this world into which He came to taste every ill His brothers know—this is a world of struggle, of slow and painful overcoming of evil by good. And as we can grow perfect only through self-denial and discipline and suffering, so He would be perfected. If we would follow Him—and we would!—we must bear a cross. It is a road of self-denial, where no miracle is wrought to make it easy but the miracle of being in His company.

We are coming to the season of Lent, and you will all have an opportunity of some self-denial. Perhaps there will be work you can do to make the money that will fill your mite-boxes—do it gladly, as unto the Lord! For forty days He fasted, and knew not until afterward even that He hungered. His mind must have been too intent on the work that lay before Him to think of His own need.

If He could so forget Himself, let us forget our little leanings toward easy pleasure and self-gratification, in the joy of serving Him and His cause in the world.

Mysterious Snowballs.

Clyde and Edwin were next-door neighbors. The back doors of their homes opened together, and made a fine place to play. They lived in a Northern State, where the ground is covered with snow for weeks at a time in winter.

One of the boys' favorite games for wintertime was Snowball Tag. They had built a solid wall of snow almost six feet long and more than two feet high in Clyde's back yard, and another one just like it across in Edwin's yard. It was great fun building these snow walls and making them firm so that they would stand almost the whole winter. All the boys and girls in the neighborhood helped build the walls, and played Snowball Tag from behind them every evening after school.

Clyde and Edwin would always choose sides, so that there was the same number of children in each team. Then each boy took his team behind his snow wall for a hiding-place, and the fun began. The children in each team tried to take those in the other by hitting them with soft snowballs.

Whenever a head peeped over the snow wall or a body scooted away from it to get fresh snow, a ball would come flying from behind the other wall. When any child was hit he had to go over to the other side. Each team tried hard to get all the other team's players. Sometimes Clyde's team won and sometimes Edwin's.

Every noon Clyde and Edwin spent a little time making snowballs, to have them ready for the evening game. When they had a nice pile of white balls they would carry half of them behind each wall.

One noon the boys got a great many snowballs made, and they divided them equally. That evening when they got home from school there were only three or four snowballs behind Edwin's wall, and all the rest were in Clyde's pile. When Edwin saw that his were gone he ran and looked at Clyde's and said, "You've been cheating; you took my snowballs".

Clyde was as surprised as Edwin, and said, "I don't know how these balls got over here. I was at school all afternoon".

They carried Edwin's share back to his side, and the boys and girls played until Clyde's team had all been tagged and taken by the other side.

The next noon the boys made snowballs again and divided them equally. That evening every ball was behind Clyde's wall. It was a mystery. No one could understand how they got there. The children carried half of them to Edwin's side and had a game. But Clyde did not enjoy it very much, because he was afraid that Edwin thought he had been trying to cheat.

Next evening the two boys ran home together as soon as school was out. When they got in sight of the snow walls they saw something that made them shout and laugh.

There was Clyde's little three-year-old brother Bobby, in his red cap and sweater and leggings, trotting across the yards from Edwin's snow wall to Clyde's. In each chubby hand he was carrying a white ball.

"Bobby, what are you doing?" cried Clyde.

"Bobby giving brother all the nice balls," said the little fellow, smiling happily, as if Clyde should be greatly pleased.

"Well, that tells the story," said Clyde as the other children came, ready for their game.

Edwin laughed at Bobby's happy smile and said, "I'm glad we caught you, little red man. And I'll not say again that Clyde isn't playing fair."—Florence Leininger, in Our Little Ones.

Against the Wind.

"The lake is frozen! The lake is frozen!" shouted Billy Martin to his chum, Ned Brown. They lived next door to each other, and it was easy for them to call across the back yards to one another.

"Hurrah! hurrah!" shouted Ned. "Let's go skating this afternoon."

It was Saturday and there was no school, so both boys were free to get their skates and spend the afternoon on the ice. As soon after dinner as they could they were off, walking down the street of the town, heading for the small lake that skirted one side of it.

Over their shoulders were slung hockey boots with the skates attached to them and in their hands they carried hockey sticks. Warm woolen sweaters, toques and mittens kept out Jack Frost.

"Isn't it dandy that the lake has frozen before much snow came?" said Billy.

"Yes, indeed," answered Ned. "It looks as though it might not snow, though, I heard father say that the wind was in the east and the clouds looked like snow."

"Well, we'll have a good skate this afternoon, anyway," replied Billy. "Then, if it snows, we will make a rink on the ice like we did last year, and keep the snow shoveled off it."

"Yes. We can do that. But it isn't as much fun as having the whole lake to skate on."

They reached the bank and sat down on a fallen log to change their boots. The ones they took off they placed behind the log and slipped their feet into the boots they had carried with them, on the bottoms of which hockey skates had been firmly screwed. The straps were tightened around their skates. Straightening up, away they went over the ice.

The lake was smooth and the ice slippery as only ice can be. But both Billy and Ned had had their skates sharpened a few days before, and so they slipped along easily.

"Great, isn't it?" said Ned, as they swung out into the lake.

What fun it was! They swayed to the right and then to the left, taking long, steady strokes. The motion was like flying. The distance was covered rapidly and with but little exertion, for the wind was with them.

As they skated steadily along they turned to one side to pass a small island, and at the farther side of the island they came across two children, Mary and Myrtle Milroy, whose home was on the same street as theirs.

"Hello, Mary! Hello, Myrtle!" called the boys. "What are you doing out here? You ought to stay in near the shore. This is too far out for you to come."

"Oh, no," Myrtle called back. "We came as easy as anything, and it is much more fun out here than in near the shore."

"You had better go back," cautioned Ned. "It is going to storm soon, and you shouldn't be so far out."

But Mary and Myrtle only laughed. It had been easy skating with the wind at their backs and they never stopped to think how different it would be going the other way.

The boys thought no more about them as they flew over the glistening ice. They went around the other side of the island, then down the lake. When the light began to fail they decided to return home. The going was more difficult now, for the wind had increased, and particles of snow were coming down in greater numbers. But both Ned and Bill were strong skaters and they breasted the wind successfully, reaching the log where they had left their boots, out of breath, but happy.

"We just made it in time," said Ned, as they tramped up the street. "The snow is falling thick now, isn't it!"

"Yes, and the wind is blowing like everything," replied Bill.

At that moment they saw Mrs. Mil-

roy coming toward them. As soon as she met them she cried, "Oh, boys! You have been skating, haven't you? Did you see anything of Mary and Myrtle? They went out ever so long ago and haven't returned. I am so anxious about them".

Ned and Bill looked at each other. "Why, Mrs. Milroy!" said Ned, "we saw them early in the afternoon out by the island. Haven't they come home yet?"

When they heard that the little girls had not returned, Ned and Bill again looked at each other, and Ned voiced their common thought. "We will go and find them, if we can. Perhaps they cannot make their way back against the wind."

They turned around at once and hurried to the edge of the lake, where once more they buckled on their hockey skates. Then they struck out in the direction of the island, stopping at intervals to call, "Mary! Myrtle!" Nothing but the shrieking of the wind, which had risen to a gale, answered them.

The snow continued to fall and the wind behind them urged them on. Finally they halted and debated what to do.

"The girls must have left the island and started home. Where could they be now?" said Ned.

"Perhaps the wind has swept them down the lake," replied Bill. "We'd better make for the far end of the island. Jiminy, but it's getting dark, isn't it! How are we to see them?"

"Keep shouting, and they'll answer," said Ned, adding suddenly, "Here's my Scout whistle in my pocket. I'll blow on that, and they'll hear more easily."

They skated on, blowing every half minute on the whistle, and straining their ears to catch a reply. They passed the end of the island and the full fury of the storm struck them.

"Oh!" gasped Ned. "Mary and Myrtle couldn't possibly skate against this, could they? Wherever can they be?"

"Toot your old whistle again!" said Bill, speaking lightly to hide his growing uneasiness. "Toot for all you're worth!"

And Ned tooted. He blew such a shrill blast that it could be heard plainly above the howling of the wind. They paused to listen.

"Say, I heard something!" exclaimed Bill excitedly. "Blow it again, old chap! Blow it again!"

Faintly, yet unmistakably, there was borne on the gale an answering halloo. Once more Ned blew and once more the faint sound reached them.

"They're over here!" cried Bill. "They are over this way."

Skating in the direction of the answering calls, which every moment became more distinct, the boys found the two little girls huddled together on the ice.

"Oh, Ned! Oh, Bill!" they cried, their voices breaking into sobs. "We tried to skate back and we couldn't. The wind just blew us and blew us, and then it got dark and we were afraid. Oh, dear! oh, dear!"

"Stop crying!" commanded Ned. "We've got to get you back home, and crying won't help any. Can you get up?"

Mary and Myrtle attempted to rise, but the wind was too strong for them. But with the boys' help they managed to stand on their skates, but not a stroke could they take against the force of the wind.

"We'll never get home! We'll never get home!" wailed Mary. "The wind pushes us back every time."

"We will have to pull you!" cried Bill. "You and Myrtle hang on to each other's hands and Ned and I will take your other hands and pull you to the shore. We will all keep together that way."

Off they started, but could only make slight headway. The snow stung their faces as the wind whipped past them. At times they had to stand with their backs to the storm until a particular severe gust had passed over.

Strong skaters as the boys were, it was a most difficult feat to drag the girls in the teeth of the blinding gale. Even alone, they would have found the wind unpleasantly strong, but it was a task to pull the dead weight of the two children, who were only beginners at skating and now could not help themselves at all.

"We'll never get home," sobbed Myrtle, as a vicious swirl of snow pelted her face and eyes. "We'll never get home. We'll have to stay here all night and freeze."

"And freeze," echoed Mary. "It's so cold here and I want my mother. I wish I were home. I do! I do!"

"I wish you were, too," said Ned, grimly. "I wish you both were. This is a whale of a job, isn't it, Bill? Do you think we can do it?"

"Of course we can," replied Bill courageously. "We'd better rest a bit, then try it again."

It was enough to discourage any one. The stinging snow made their faces smart; the violence of the wind caught them full as they attempted to strike out for the shore line. The two frightened children impeded their progress at every stroke. But Bill and Ned had the quality of endurance. They set their teeth doggedly and struggled on. They were not going to give up as long as they had strength enough to stay on their two feet.

They were panting and gasping when at last they saw the dim outline of the trees on shore. Almost exhausted, they drew into the lee of a boathouse and leaned against its sheltering side. At that moment several men came hurrying toward them.

"Why, boys!" exclaimed one. "Here you are, with the youngsters safe and sound. Their mother sent us to search for them. She said you boys would never be able to find them in the storm."

"Hurrah for Ned and Bill!" cried another. "Pretty plucky boys to face a gale like this and tow the children behind you. It must have been pretty tough going. But come on. We must hurry back to Mrs. Milroy and set her mind at rest."

Picking up the two little girls, the men started off, with Bill and Ned bringing up the rear. The boys were tired but happy, glad that they had managed to bring the children home safely without help.—Junior World.

Can You Do It Alone?

How many times can you remember having said:

"You needn't help me, mother. I can do this alone."

You said it when you learned to button your own shoes and to cross the street alone and to cut your own meat and to comb your own hair and—you can think of the other times.

Perhaps there are other things which some one is helping you do which you are really old enough to do alone. Try and find them. Then, perhaps you will say:

"You needn't help me to learn my Sunday-school verse any more. Just tell me the hard words and I can learn them alone," or

"You needn't tell me every day when it is time to water the plants. I can remember that alone."

Think of all the things which some one is helping you to do or is telling you when it is time to do.

Then see if you cannot surprise mother or father or your Sunday-school teacher by doing them just as well as you did when you were helped.—Exchange.

In Holland.

Now, all you little children
  Who never wipe your shoes,
If you would go to Holland, why,
  That habit you must lose.

The cottages of Holland,
  They are so sweet and clean,
Not even with a microscope
  Can trace of dirt be seen.

The kitchens of those cottages,
  They are so neat and bright
With pots and pans of polished brass,
  And plates of blue and white.

The housewives get up early,
  The housewives sit up late,
For fear a little speck of dust
  Should wander through the gate.

So, all you little Naughties,
  Who never wipe your shoes,
If you would go to Holland, why,

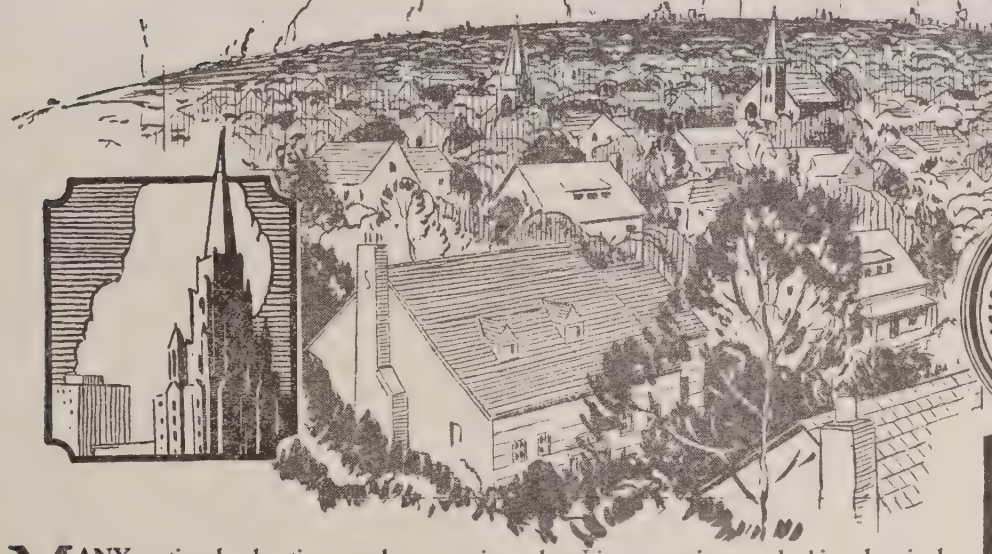
The Bandicoot.

Louis Tucker.

Once upon a time there was a blustering bandicoot who lived in the Karroos of King Kehama's country in the interior of innermost Africa, in a hole under the biggest stone on the top of the third kopje due southwest of Pippekameelepumpfontein. He had words with a family of lions who lived further down in the same kopje, because Furry and Fido, their cubs, played cat and mouse with him and tried to catch and eat him, which is no way to treat a neighbor, except in Wall Street. The lions refused to spank their babies, so the bandicoot told them they must move away. When they would not, he grew very angry indeed and said that he would make them.



Therefore, that afternoon he ran down into the middle of the karroo and climbed up on a white ants' nest, so that he could see over the grass, and called "E-e-e-e" very loud and shrill. It was a very small thin noise, but it went through and through you like the squeaking of a knife on a plate, it was so keen and thin, and all the whole karroo heard it. So the antelope and the eland and the gnu and the zebra and all the eaters of grass and leaves, even to four giraffes and an elephant, came to see what was the matter. When the bandicoot told them the other animals all laughed and went away; but the bandicoots all stayed and held an indignation meeting, because it was hard enough to keep alive on the karroo anyhow, and if the lions were going to begin hunting bandicoots it would be still worse. The first bandicoot showed them what to do and they went and stood outside the lion's cave and said "e-e-e-e-e".

Furry and Fido came out and tried to catch them, but could not, and at last the lion and lioness got tired of the noise and came out too. They could run faster than the bandicoots, but could not begin to keep up with them in dodging, and therefore they could not catch any either. They got so very tired of the small thin noise that at last they galloped off into the karroo with long- loplopping leaps. But though they could run faster than the bandicoots, it was not much faster, and so they had to keep on running. Besides, there were a great many bandicoots and some of them had hidden out in the karroo for that very reason. So wherever the lion family went for miles and miles, they soon heard that faint shrill, "e-e-e-e-e", somewhere near them, and had to get up and run on again.

At last they were worn out and laid down in the shade of a white ant's nest that was twenty feet high, and rested a little. Then the original bandicoot who lives on the top of the third kopje came and sat on the top of the white ant's nest and said "e-e-e-e-e" so long and strong, and so close by that they thought they must die. He said it prettily and pathetically, he said it gruffly and graphically, he said it robustly and riotously, he said it and said it and said it and said it and said it and said it until the karroo quivered and the welkin reeled and rang. And then the very wise old Aavardark, who is quite white and lives in the white ant's nests and eats the white ants because he is the only thing in the world too tough for the ants to eat, lost all patience and came clawing out of the white ant's nest with his crooked claws and told the bandicoot to behave himself and keep quiet. When he heard what was the matter he told the lions that the best thing for them to do was to emigrate. And if they would not do that the only thing left was to spank their babies and go back to the cave and teach them to let bandicoots alone. Because otherwise they would be unable to catch anything more to eat or even to sleep a wink till they died. The lions decided they did not want to emigrate, because it was a good game country and the cave was comfortable, so they spanked Furry and Fido and lived happily a number of years until a Boer came out from Pipekameelepumpfontein and shot them all, one by one, with his long gun as they lay in the sun because Furry and Fido had been eating his sheep and Hottentots. As for the bandicoot, for all I know, he may be living yet.

A Great City of Small Town Homes

THE pendulum IS SWINGING BACK!

RELIGIOUS PRESS ASSOCIATION — BY THE BEST PEOPLE — 1882 — PHILADELPHIA

MANY national advertisers and progressive advertising agencies are looking longingly toward the small towns as the future increase of their business and a virgin field for their clients.

The secular publications of big circulation have long been recognized as having the greater part of their distribution in metropolitan centers. Now we have a new medium of long established publications that binds together those substantial, well-to-do small town homes with their gardens, big roomy, airy houses and families that live life together.

These families if brought within one geographical bound would make up a great city. And one in which only a small part of the accepted advertising mediums of today are circulating.

This new medium is the Religious Home Weeklies Combination — 18 of among the finest and strongest journals in their sphere. They have no duplication and make available to worthy advertisers reader confidence at its zenith. It all has:

Deaths

Carter: Entered into Life Eternal Thursday morning February 10, 1927, at River side Infirmary Charleston, South Carolina. Bessie Carter the beloved daughter of the late Josiah Carter and Isabel Wilson of the Plains, Pa., Funeral Service held from Grace Church. The Plains on Saturday at noon and funeral at Mars Hall, Virginia.

"Father in Thy gracious reaping, Leave me now Thy servant sleeping."

IN MEMORIAM.

The Executive Board of the Woman's Auxiliary of Southern Virginia assembled February 9, 1927, wish to record the realization of the great loss that has come to the Church, and to the Auxiliary in the death of MRS. ANNA MARIA WASHINGTON TUCKER, beloved wife of the Bishop of Southern Virginia, who passed from this life January 7, 1927, in her home, Norfolk, Va.

Not only the Church in Virginia, but the foreign fields of our service, for generations will feel the effects of her beautiful Christian character which so influenced the lives of those most closely touched by her, her own daily life was full of that fruitful energy that made gentle deeds bloom like flowers along the way and to be with her one felt the benediction that comes from those who live daily in the Master's presence.

One of Mrs. Tucker's loveliest characteristics was her cordial hospitality, which she extended to all with whom she came in contact, making the Bishop's House, in deed and in truth the Home for the Diocese.

Though deeply sensible of the great sorrow and loneliness which comes with the breaking of eartly ties, we rejoice in her memory, which will live on a precious heritage to those dear ones who are left.

Heaven dwelt in her heart, love encompassed her home, and to her death was just the passing from one room to another in her Father's Home, where dwell the "saints of God who from their labors rest".

EXECUTIVE BOARD OF THE WOMAN'S AUXILIARY.

ELISE U. HOLLADAY,
Secretary.

A MEMORIAL TO JOSEPH R. RUFFIN.

By the Vestry of Christ Episcopal Church, Roanoke, Virginia.

We reverently acknowledge the guiding hand of a Divine Providence in all our spiritual and temporal affairs.

In His great wisdom God has blessed us with the counsel and friendship of JOSEPH R. RUFFIN, whose zeal in the work of our Master never faltered, and whose fidelity to his responsibilities as a Vestryman was supreme.

And now that our Gracious Father has seen fit to remove from our midst this devoted member, we bow in humble submission to His will, mindful of our great loss but thankful to our Heavenly Father for the life that has left such a lasting impression upon Christ Church and this community.

Our association with him shall ever be a cherished memory. His abiding faith in God, his exemplary Christian life, his devotion to his Church and family, and his uncompromising stand for justice and righteousness will continue to be an inspiration and a challenge to those who are left to mourn their loss.

Therefore, be it resolved, that we extend our heartfelt sympathy to his family in the loss of a devoted husband and father and pray God's richest blessings upon them.

And further be it resolved that a copy of this memorial be spread upon the minutes of the Vestry of Christ Church, and a copy be sent to his family.

M. A. SMYTHE,
Registrar.

ROBERT FRANKLIN RUFFIN.

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to receive unto Himself the soul of His faithful servant and our co-worker and former fellow-vestryman, ROBERT FRANKLIN RUFFIN, who departed this life Monday, February 7, 1927, in the 77th year of his age.

Be it resolved by the vestry of St. John's Church, City Point, that we hereby bear witness to his firm faith in the Christian religion, to his consistent Christian walk and conversation, to his loyalty to his Church and to the example he has left us of an humble, unselfish and helpful life.

Be it resolved, further, that a copy of these resolutions be sent to his sister, Mrs. M. D. Marks, to whom we extend our sincere sympathy; that a copy be sent to the Southern Churchman and that they be entered on the records of this vestry.

A. S. J. WHEELER,
Registrar.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

Conferences for school children were also held in both cities. The Holy Communion was celebrated daily.

The Rev. Dr. Stewart addressed three meetings of the student body at the University of Minnesota, as well as several luncheon meetings of the Episcopal students at the University. Dr. Stewart also addressed the students at Macalester, a Presbyterian College in St. Paul.

The Rt. Rev. F. A. McElwain, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, divided his time between Minneapolis and St. Paul during the week. Both he and the visiting Crusaders expressed themselves as highly gratified over the excellent arrangements for the Crusade made by the Diocesan Commission on Evangelism and over the splendid response of the people, and paid tribute to the Rev. Mr. Butler and his associates for their finely planned efforts.

During the week of February 7 eighteen preaching missions, each four to six days in duration, were conducted outside the Twin Cities by the Bishop and Diocesan clergy. During the next three weeks nearly sixty such missions will be held in other places in the Diocese.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Roland J. Moncure, formerly of the Diocese of Louisiana, has assumed the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Salem, and held his first service on Sunday, February 13.

The Rev. Montgomery M. Goodwin, formerly chaplain-at-large of the Boston City Mission, has accepted a call to be rector of Holy Trinity Church, Marlborough, Mass., and takes charge March 1.

The Rev. Gilbert Ritter, formerly assistant at St. John's Church, Pembroke, Bermuda, has accepted the call to be assistant at St. George's Church, New York City. His new address is 207 East Seventeenth Street.

The address of the Rev. Charles K. Weller is changed from Carbondale, Ill., to 606 Washington Avenue, Cairo, Ill.

The Rev. Herbert E. P. Pressey, at one time assistant at St. Paul's Church, Paterson, N. J., is now rector of St. Stephen's Church, Baker, Ore.

The Rev. Thomas C. Johnson, who recently resigned as chaplain of the Episcopal Hospital, Philadelphia, will become rector of St. Elizabeth's Church, Floral Park, L. I., March 1.

The Rev. A. L. Kenyon, formerly rector of the Church of the Nativity, Cincinnati, Ohio, has entered upon his work as rector of Ascension Church, Middletown, Ohio.

The Rev. E. T. Simpson, a non-parochial priest of Oregon, has taken up his work as minister-in-charge of the Mission at Salome, Ariz.

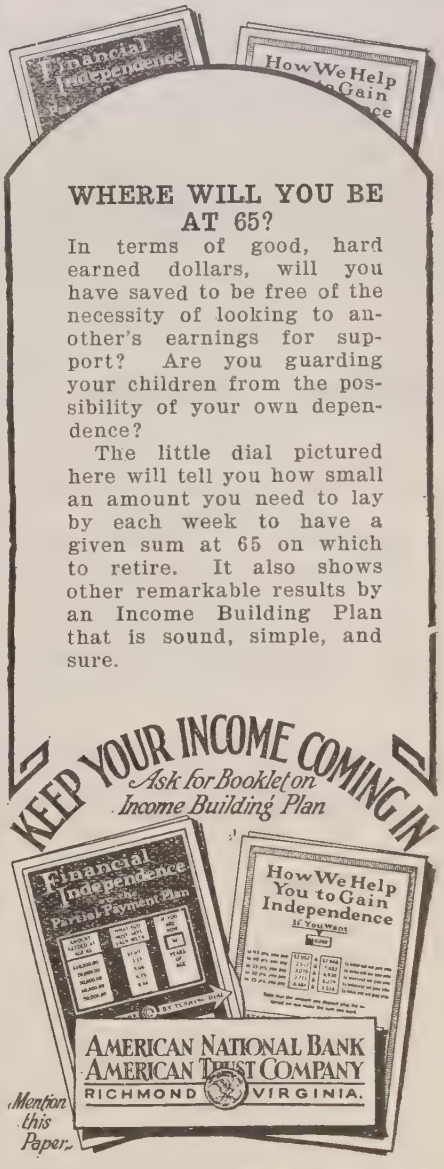
The Rev. Henry A. Link, formerly rector of the Lyme Missions, Connecticut, will become rector of Trinity Church, Bayonne, N. J., on March 1.

The Rev. Hale B. Eubanks, formerly rector of St. Paul's Church, Dixon, Wyo., has taken charge of the Coos and Curry County Missions, Oregon. His new address is Coquille, Ore.

The Rev. Arthur P. S. Hyde, formerly rector of St. Peter's Church, Peekskill, N. Y., has entered upon his work as minister-in-charge of Holy Rood Church, New York City.

The Rev. Samuel Evans, formerly rector of St. Mark's Church, Durango, Col., has now become vicar of St. Matthew's Mission, Portland Ore., and chaplain of St. Helen's Hall.

The Rev. Angus E. Clephan, formerly in charge of Trinity Mission, New Philadelphia, Ohio, will become minister-in-charge of St. Paul's Mission, Put-in-Bay, Ohio, on April 1.



The Rev. J. F. Sabin, formerly of St. Agnes' Chapel, New York, has taken charge of St. Stephen's Mission, South Ozone Park, L. I. His new address is 25 Beverly Parkway, Valley Stream, L. I.

Ordinations.

On Sunday, January 30, Lawrence Steuland was ordained to the diaconate by the Rt. Rev. Fred Ingley, S. T. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Colorado, in St. Peter's Church, Denver, of which he had formerly been a parishioner, and where his father is at present a vestryman. The candidate was presented by the rector of St. Peter's, the Rev. William L. Blaker, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. B. W. Bonell, Dean of St. John's Theological College, Greeley, in which Mr. Steuland will continue his studies.

Deaths.

On the evening of Sunday, February 13, Rev. John D. Kennedy died suddenly in his home at Park Ridge, N. J., having officiated in the morning at his church in Montvale, apparently in usual health. A few days before he had met with the clergy at the Archdeaconry meeting in Hackensack, giving no sign of illness. His death came as a great shock to his people and to his many friends. Graduating at Hobart College in 1881, he graduated from the General Seminary three years later. His first work in the ministry was in the Diocese of Albany, and he was ordained by Bishop Doane in 1885 and 1886. For twenty-seven years he was rector of St. Mark's Church in Brooklyn. He went to the Diocese of Newark in 1918, and had charge of Epiphany Church, Allendale, for four years. From that time until his death he had charge of St. Paul's Church, Montvale, where his ministry had good success. The church building was enlarged and a good congregation was gathered and kept. Mr. Kennedy was a good preacher and a friendly and faithful man, and his death is a great loss to the Diocese of Newark.

DOMINUS FRUSTRA NISI 1835

Vol. 92. RICHMOND, VA., MARCH 5, 1927. No. 10.

IF 'mid the gathering storms of doubt
Our hearts grow faint and cold,
The strength we cannot live without
Thy love will not withhold.
Our prayers accept; our sins forgive;
Our youthful zeal renew;
Shape to us holier lives to live,
And nobler work to do.

A PRAYER.

Teach me, Father, how to go
Softly as the grasses grow;
Hush my soul to meet the shock
Of the wild world as a rock;
But my spirit propped with power,
Make as simple as a flower.

Teach me, Father, how to be Kind and patient as a tree.
Joyfully the crickets croon
Under the shady oak at noon;
Beetle, on his mission bent,
Tarries on that cooling tent.

Let me, also, cheer a spot,
Hidden field or garden grot—
Place where passing souls can rest.
On the way, and be their best.
—Edwin Markham.

Writing to a friend from his sick bed, Bishop William A. Quayle closed his letter by saying: "All's well with my soul, if not with my body. It is beautiful to have God and the Church and Christian friends and a loving home. Life is good all the way through; and I think the crossing to Life Eternal will be good."

Winter Beauty.

The west wind swept the hillside hour by hour,
Taking its toll of splendor with each gust.
Scarlet and saffron, coppery, red as rust,
The leaves went down before its conquering power.
But the great trees refused to bend or cower,
Mourning a transient beauty brought to dust.
In an enduring loveliness they trust,
Clear-cut in lines of grace and strength they tower.

And then I thought, "How will it be with me
When all my leaves have fallen one by one?
Oh, may my soul stand out, for those who see,
Steadfast and strong against the setting sun,
Broad-branching with wide humanity,
Clear-etched by gracious deeds that I have done"!

—Josephine Johnson.

Her Gift.

Helen Bayley Davis.

She sent me a bowl of roses, but I think
Faery things
Are hid among the petals, pink
And strangely fragrant: I feel their fluttering wings,
And now . . . I hear . .
A piping, clear
And silver-sweet,
And the tapping of dew-drenched feet
Dancing amid the golden pollen, deep
In the heart of a rose . . . I shall keep
The faeries near my soul,
When the petals are strewn about the bowl.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

"A dumb witness is no witness."

They who fear the Lord are not afraid of Him.

"At the place where failure has come, double the sentries! Watch as well as pray!"

Don't let your hatred of hypocrites cause you to be their companion through eternity.

A man of convictions, though he may never be eloquent, will always have something to say that will compel the attention of the thoughtful.

Live Christ, and all thy life shall be
A sweet uplifting ministry,
A sowing of the fair white seeds
That fruit through all eternity!
—John Oxenham.

My soul, exercise thyself in the strains of celestial music, and with heart tuned by the finger of God, be always praising Him! That which inspires heaven's music may well fill us with grateful adoration.—Mark Guy Pearse.

If we but knew the golden harvest waiting
To crown the worker's toil in after days,
How would we scorn all thought of zeal abating,
And for the joy of service render praise.
—H. T. Lefevre.

Would you enjoy religion? Would you have the religion of cheerfulness, and not of gloom? Then have faith in God! If you love the sunshine, and would sing songs of rejoicing, covet earnestly this great gift, faith in God!
—C. H. Spurgeon.

Welcome dear feast of Lent; who loves not thee
He loves not temperance or authority
But is composed of passion.
The Scriptures bid us fast; the Church says Now;
Give to thy Mother what thou wouldst allow
To every corporation.
—Herbert.

In a sin-polluted world Christ must be crucified, it could not be otherwise; but let us never forget that in His acceptance of what human wickedness thus had power to inflict, is the principle of our redemption. For, as John Henry Newman said, in one of the most heart-piercing sermons he ever preached in St. Mary's, Oxford: "I bid you observe that He to whom these things were done was Himself the Almighty God."

WINNOWINGS.

THROUGH THE COURTESY OF THE MEXICAN GOVERNMENT, which has been very considerately extended to him, Bishop Creighton has been allowed to resume visitations to Episcopal congregations outside of the city of Mexico and has forwarded his dates to the Board of Missions for February, March and April. The present crisis between the Mexican Government and the Roman Catholic Church has opened wonderful opportunities for our missionaries. The people are accustomed to a ritualistic, formal and reverent service, such as is offered to them by our Church and is not provided by other Protestant communions. It is to be hoped that such a peaceful and satisfactory adjustment of the business difference between our two governments will soon be reached, that our missionaries will be able to use this situation to the best advantage and will not be hampered by national antagonism.

ONE INTERESTING DEVELOPMENT OF THE BISHOPS' CRUSADE has been the contribution that laymen have made to the Preaching Missions. It is a glorious thing that our laymen have at last found their voices. In many cases their messages seem to be more effective than those of the clergy. They often speak with a directness and force that reaches other laymen more powerfully than the sermons of the ministers "Lay Evangelism" is opening up a new field of service for earnest Episcopalians of all professions and in every branch of business life. As an aid to these new recruits Leon C. Palmer, Field Secretary to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, has written a book, about which Bishop Darst says:

"Mr. Palmer has made a wonderful contribution to the subject and has presented a helpful and stimulating appeal for finer service on the part of the laymen of the Church, together with practical suggestions as to methods of work. His wide experience in Christian work among men has given him a message that cannot fail to inspire those who desire to make their lives count in more active and constructive service for Christ and His Church."

COLLEGE GRADUATES IN LARGE PROPORTION make up the congregations in Alaska, according to a report from the Rev. L. F. Kent, of Cordova. He states that at least one-third of his congregation and active Church workers are college people, and that for this reason it is important that missionaries in this field should be well equipped intellectually, and prepared to meet and influence groups of cultured people. He says emphatically, "Never let any one tell you that the work in Alaska is a failure. With the right kind of effort it will grow, and grow big". Bishop Rowe is now touring the East in behalf of his immense mission field, and speaking two and three times each Sunday to interest people in this Alaskan work. He fully realizes that the greatest means for arousing missionary interest is information.

"DO UNTO OTHERS AS YE WOULD HAVE THEM DO UNTO YOU" is the great command of the Master, and some people believe it to be as practical as it is ideal. Arthur Nash, of the A. Nash Tailoring Company, claims to have increased his business five hundred per cent by putting it into actual practice with his customers and his employees. It is probably practiced less in relations between nations than it is in personal intercourse. It is, however, gratifying to note that in our dealings with the American Indians during the last decades we have displayed a fairness that, at least, approaches the Golden Rule, by purchasing their land from them, instead of just taking it away by force, which was the old method. On December 31, 1926, bank deposits of individual American Indians totaled $35,042,316, exclusive of tribal funds. This sum represents chiefly the proceeds of land purchased by the government. It will mark a long step toward real Christianity when all governments purchase new lands, instead of simply taking territory by conquest, and making right might.

A CAMPAIGN TO AROUSE ALL PEACE LOVERS to redoubled efforts to prevent war has been started, under the title of the American Arbitration Crusade. Prominent men of all churches are behind this movement. The object being to create public sentiment in favor of arbitrating every kind of international dispute. Funds are being raised for propaganda and publicity. Headquarters have been opened at 114 East Thirty-first Street, New York City, according to the announcement of the committee.

To stimulate interest the following prizes are offered:

One hundred dollars for the best letter, editorial or article appearing in any publication having at least 5,000 circulation.

One hundred dollars for the best public demonstration or concerted endeavor for obligatory arbitration.

One hundred dollars for the best cartoon.

One hundred dollars for the best slogan.

One hundred dollars for the best sermon.

The main idea must be arbitration in each instance. All contests will close on July 4, 1927. Any letter, editorial, article, cartoon or slogan may be used by the Crusade immediately to obtain further publicity.

Every organization and citizen is urged to take action along one or more of the following lines:

1. Send resolutions or letters to President Coolidge urging all-inclusive arbitration treaties.

2. Write to the papers and magazines; publish pamphlets; preach sermons; draw cartoons and posters.

3. Urge your Senator to introduce suitable resolutions in Congress.

4. Send this leaflet to ten or more of your friends. It will be supplied on request. You may be a factor in substituting law for war.

A donation of 25 cents enrolls any one as a Peace Crusader; $1 as a Peace Seeker; $5 as a Peace Counsellor; $10 as a Peace Advocate; $25 as a Peace Patron; $100 as a Peace Patriot; $500 or more as a Peace Founder.

FOR TRUTH

Sometimes the word "Protestant" is misunderstood and is thought to have a negative rather than a positive significance. This erroneous interpretation arises from a partial consideration of the derivation of the word.

Of course, its immediate antecedent is protest and it means those who protest, but if we go a little further back we find that this word (protest) does not mean merely an objector, but has a significance of a most positive character, coming from the two Latin words pro and testes, meaning for the truth.

A Protestant therefore is not merely one who raises his voice in opposition, but a person who stands vigorously and aggressively for the truth. In view of the fact that it forms an important part of the official title of our Church, it is worth our while to recognize this, so that there can be no belittling of a designation, which classifies us in a vigorous position of assertion and not in the weak attitude of negation, which some, even of our own family, attribute to this part of our name.

The word came into general use at a time when errors were so prevalent and numerous that it was necessary for some to stand emphatically for the truth.

One of those errors was what is often known as Maryoltry, that is, a form of adoration for the Virgin Mary, which approached so closely to actual worship that it was exceedingly difficult for the ordinary person to distinguish between the two.

It is not hard to see how this exultation of the Virgin should have crept into the Church, when the Bible was a closed Book to the laity, so that our Saviour's own attitude to His mother was not known, but today, when we can read the record for ourselves, it is difficult to see why she should be called "The Queen of Heaven" and "without sin". The incident of her coming to Jesus with "His brethren", apparently for the purpose of persuading Him to desist from His public ministry is recorded in all three of the Synoptic Gospels (Matt. 12:46, Mark 3:31, Luke 8:19), and the clearness with which Jesus stated His relationship to His mother can hardly be misunderstood, for "He answered and said unto them, 'My mother and my brethren are those which hear the Word of God and do it". These words are recorded almost identically by the three Evangelists, and they certainly place the Virgin Mother on a level with all others who hear the Word of God and do it.

It was no doubt the consideration of these passages that induced the founders of our Church to adopt Article XXII and incorporate it in the Book of Common Prayer, the wording of the Article being "The Romish Doctrine Concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping and Adoration, as well as Images as of Relics, and also Invocations of Saints, is a fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God".

A positive Protestantism was necessary to establish our Church; perhaps it will be equally necessary in order to maintain its true character.

In any case it is well for us to realize that this first word of the title of our Church gives us vigor, vitality and truth, and inspires us with the qualities that naturally flow from these sources.

CONTRIBUTORS

JAMES HARDY DILLARD, LL. D., was born in Nansemond County, Va., prepared for college in the William P. Galt School of Norfolk, and subsequently was graduated in the law and academic departments of Washington and Lee University. He has been actively engaged in educational work all of his life, first as associate principal in the Norfolk Academy, and later as professor at the Washington University, St. Louis, and Tulane University, New Orleans. He is at present president of the Jeanes and Slater Funds, with headquarters at Charlottesville, Va. The proceeds of these funds go to assist in negro education, and Dr. Dillard is recognized as an authority in this work, not only in this country, but abroad. Two years ago he was sent by a commission of the Church of England to inspect mission schools in Africa. Last year he was sent on a tour of investigation of the Near East Relief work, going through the Balkan countries and into the Holy Land. In the Church Dr. Dillard has seen service on the Board of Missions and in General Conventions, having been president of the National Convention of Church Clubs. He has been awarded honorary degrees by universities, both North and South, including Harvard, Washington and Lee, Sewanee and Tulane. He has consented to write a series of articles for the Southern Churchman on the Near East situation and other matters of interest pertaining to his travels and work.

REV. E. STANLEY JONES, whose travel letter appears in this week's issue, is a missionary of the Methodist Church, who has spent a large part of his life in the work in India. He has recently come into great prominence as the author of "The Christ of the Indian Road", a book that has been as widely read as any religious volume in recent years. Mr. Jones has great faith in the present religious awakening in India, and in his book presents numerous wonderful examples of what Christianity is doing in that mysterious country and what he believes its prospects to be. We hope to see more of his letters in future issues of the Southern Churchman. He himself has undergone a wonderful experience in the healing power of Christ, whereby from being a man of very delicate health, and apparently on the verge of a nervous breakdown, he has been transformed into a person so robust that he can stand the most arduous journeys, and speak for hours at the time without suffering undue fatigue.

REV. THOMAS K. NELSON, D. D., preacher of the sermon of the American Pulpit for this week, was sketched in last week's issue in connection with his article on "THE BOY AND HIS CHURCH".

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

GOD, THE CREATOR, CONTROLLER AND REVEALER

By the Reverend Thomas Kinloch Nelson, D. D.

Thus saith Jehovah . . . I am Jehovah, that maketh all things, that stretcheth forth the heavens alone; that spreadeth abroad the earth . . . that confirmteh the word of His servant and performeth the counsel of His messengers . . . . that saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd and shall perform all my pleasure.—Isaiah 44:24-28.

This is a picture of God by a great poet and prophet. It does not attempt to paint a complete portrait, but emphasizes three great qualities or attributes of God.

First, there is God as the Creator of the universe. I am Jehovah that maketh all things. This truth about God is taught us in many different ways. It is the teaching of science and philosophy; for the universe must have a cause, and since it is full of purpose and order that cause must be characterized by purpose; in other words, it must be a person. It is the teaching of the Bible, the very first words of which are, "In the beginning God made the heavens and the earth", and this same note runs through it all. It is the keynote of the great wisdom books. A good example is in Prov. 8, where Wisdom says:

"When He established the heavens I was there:
When He set a circle upon the face of the deep,
When He made firm the skies above,
When the foundations of the deep became strong;
When He gave to the sea its bound
That the waters should not transgress His commandment,
When He marked out the foundations of the earth."

It is also the theme of the singers of Israel as in the Psalm:

"The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof
The world, and they that dwell therein,
For He hath founded it upon the seas
And established it upon the floods."

We find the same teaching in the New Testament as in the mystic and wonderful first chapter of St. John's gospel: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. All things were made through Him."

We learn the same truth from the Church in our catechism: "What dost thou chiefly learn in these articles of thy belief? First, I learn to believe in God the Father, who hath made me and all the world."

Truly we have learned this, and I suppose most of us do really believe it, but how often do we realize the practical consequence of such a faith? Is it not this? God made the world full of order and full of purpose, and He made us each one for a definite purpose and task. We are in duty bound to find that purpose and complete that task. No man will be happy, no man will reach his greatest heights nor find his fullest power who does not set himself to find out God's purpose for him, and firmly resolve to complete the task God has for him and him alone to do.

The second great truth about God is that He is not only the Creator, but the Controller of the universe. He did not create a marvelous mechanism, wind it up, set it going and then lose control of it; but His constant power and presence is in it now, everywhere, and all the time.

We find this in the words: "That saith of Cyrus, he is my shepherd and shall perform all my pleasure." Consider for a moment the career of Cyrus. He was a man of obscure origin, the chief of the petty state of Anshan: yet in a few years he crushed the power of Media, broke to pieces the kingdom of Croesus of Lydia, the richest of the sons of the East; overthrew Babylon, that mighty city, and established an empire which stretched from the Mediterranean far beyond the Euphrates, and from the ladder of Tyre to the boundaries of Egypt. Surely the mightiest ruler of his time. Yet to the prophet of Israel he was merely a tool in the hands of the Almighty, the shepherd whom Jehovah had created, trained and called to protect and restore his people. Was ever a more sublime faith in God's complete control of the destinies of man?

Many of us find this hard to believe. The unvarying laws of nature seem to bar God out of this world in which we live apparently so far from Him, yet human experience proves that the prophet was right.

Here, as is so often the case, science comes to the aid of religion. What had been held through faith by the prophets has now been supported by the study of what actually goes on in the world around us. Those of us who believe that the theory of evolution is a description of God's way of building the universe see Him everywhere working in the world, planning new forms, dragging man up the scale of life, powerful, purposeful, keeping His finger on the pulse of time, never for a moment losing control of the world of nature and of man. For the first time we begin to realize the deep significance of our Lord's words: "My Father worketh hitherto and I work."

Again, we see God immediately at work in the history of nations. Here it is not so easy, for evil nations seem to prosper, bad causes seem to win, and God seems to be on the side of the strong and cruel, but in the long run this is not so. There is a law of God that sin destroys the sinner even when it is a whole people that sins, and history is full of the wrecks of nations that have forgotten God. Where is the mighty city of Nineveh? Where is Babylon? Rome, that mighty empire, became soft, luxurious and incredibly wicked, and Rome has ceased to be. Matthew Arnold saw this and said that the study of history had convinced him that there was a power for good working in human history.

When we consider our individual lives, we find this truth still harder to believe; for we pray to God for guidance in emergencies and difficult decisions and we get no answer and hear no voice. Yet God is working in us and leading us in many ways, opening a door of opportunity here, closing a door there which we had eagerly desired to enter; and as we look back over our lives we feel that a power not ourselves has been directing our steps, a power wise and good, a power which shapes our ends, rough hew them as we may. That power is God. Recently I heard a fine illustration of this truth. A father had a little boy who was naturally timid and retiring, and he was anxious to teach him to be self-reliant and brave, so he sent him alone by train to visit a relation in a great city. The little boy got on the train and felt very lonesome and unhappy; but presently the conductor came along to take his ticket and talked with him pleasantly for a few moments, so he felt a little more cheerful. Then as he was beginning to feel lonely again, an old gentleman came and sat by him and entertained him with stories of the country which flashed past the windows. When he reached the city he became confused and could not remember exactly where he wished to go, but just as he was becoming almost panic-stricken a cabman came along who seemed to know almost by intuition where he wished to go and took him there in safety. When the little boy got back home he was full of enthusiasm about his success in his journey; but he never knew until after many years that all the time his father was in the car ahead, that he arranged for the conductor, the old gentleman and the cabman to help him, and was watching over every step of his journey. So it is with us in this journey of life; our Father is teaching us many lessons, but He is not leaving us alone.

The third great truth about God is this: He is not only the Creator and Controller of the universe, but He reveals Himself to man. In our text the prophet speaks of God as one "that confirmeth the word of His servant and performeth the counsel of His messengers". But a messenger implies a message, and a person who entrusts the message to his servants. The prophet was certain that God spoke to man. This also we find hard to believe, but surely a person wise and powerful enough to create man is able to speak to him; and one who has a purpose for men would desire to make that purpose known. If we think about it we see that God does make Himself known to us in many ways. If we plan to do what is wrong something not ourselves, yet inside of us, tells us that we must not do it, and if at great cost to ourselves we resist temptation, or do some good deed, a voice within us tells us that we have done well. We call it conscience; it is God. At times we learn new and noble ideas or are warned away from evil by our friends; again that is God making Himself known to us through men who know Him.

Sometimes when we are reading the Bible new glimpses of beauty and truth flash into our souls. That is God speaking to us through His Word. But chiefly we learn to know Him through Christ. For Christ is like God and God is like Christ; and he who has come to know and revere the character of Christ has come to know God. Whosoever has seen Him has seen the Father. Through all the ages men have sought to know God, and God has sought to make Himself known to men. That double search ends in Christ. In Him is at last satisfied the deepest longing of the heart of man and the heart of God. God most truly reveals Himself to us in Christ.

The poet prophet was right. God is the Creator, Controller and Revealer. From these great truths there follows for us one practical lesson. God is still creating and we can share the act of creating with Him. God is still at work controlling, and we can be His agents in guiding the destinies of the human race. God is still making Himself known to man, and it is through us that He wishes to reveal Himself to others. The soul in tune with God can still hear the cry: "Who will go for us, and whom shall I send"; and the soul that is loyal to Christ must still answer, "Lord, here am I, send me".

WHAT IS THE NEAR EAST RELEIF DOING?

By James H. Dillard, L.L.D.

FROM Aleppo, through Beirut, skirting the Mediterranean down to Haifa at the foot of Mt. Carmel, we saw the Syrian section of the Near East Relief. It is a region so full of Biblical and historic interest that even the pressing duties of our mission could not keep us at times from casting thoughts toward the many memories of ancient centuries that cling around old familiar names. On a trip to visit a tuberculosis hospital on the Lebanon mountains and certain Syrian villages beyond, we saw the ruins of Baalbek, more wonderful as a whole than Pyramids or Parthenon. There is stone-work as massive as the Pyramids along with carving as delicate as any in Greece. It must have been the largest and solidest stone building or series of buildings ever erected by man; and yet all ruins today, with just enough of wall and column and occasional roof left to let us see the wonder of it all. Then below Beirut we passed through Sidon, where we had a mid-day meal, and Tyre. And on the way the road passes the Dog River and up the side of the mountain, where tablets register the marches of famous generals from most ancient times, down to Allenby.

Into Syria Armenians from across the Turkish border to the north were rushed and driven, men, women and children, children with men and women, children without men and women. Nothing brought the unimaginable scene so keenly to my eyes as hearing a little girl say that she remembered seeing her mother and father both killed. It must have been the most awful and heartrending exodus that history can record. When I thought of it and then saw what the Near East Relief has done and is doing in the refugee settlement at Beirut and in the schools at Ghazir and Antilyas, I wondered what would have been, and would still be, the conditions without this great help from America, and I wished I could have sent a radio word to the thousands of givers at home.

Of course I cannot tell here the half of the good work we saw. Jubeil, Ghazir and Antilyas are towns on the coast north of Beirut. Jubeil is the ancient Byblos. Hundreds of orphans were located there for several years, but the work at this point has now been closed. As opportunity came or situations were found, many of the children were placed out in homes or were restored to relatives. Those not so placed were transferred to other centers of relief. It is the evident policy of the management to carry on the work as economically as possible, and, let us say incidentally, with a minimum of red tape. In my opinion, it would have been hard to find a better man than Mr. Acheson to head the work in the field.

At Ghazir there were until recently 1,300 girls; at present there are still about seven hundred and fifty. These girls are kept busy doing all kinds of needlework and weaving beautiful rugs. The plan is to help the children to become self-supporting by teaching them not only the usual school studies, but some handwork. In this way the educational work of the Near East Relief seems likely to influence education throughout all the Near East countries. This is a by-product, but, like many by-products, it may prove to be valuable.

At Antilyas we saw about eight hundred boys at different trades. I went into a room where one shift of eighty boys were making and mending shoes, into another room where ninety were doing carpentry, into another room where sixty were engaged in tailoring. Still others were working in tin or in the bakery. Each room had an excellent foreman, generally an American, with competent assistants, mostly Armenians.

At Beirut we saw all manner of excellent but simple activities for helping the refugees who have flocked there. The Y. W. C. A. is aiding in the work for girls and women. Among the older boys a Near East League has been formed which fosters a good spirit of mutual helpfulness. I give these specific facts because I think it will be interesting to contributors of the Near East Relief to hear from an outsider such definite features of the splendid work which their contributions are making it possible to accomplish.

From Haifa we passed into the Palestine section, where the work has been gradually reduced so far as possible. At Nazareth there remain about one hundred and twenty boys. Here too we saw industrial work going on. The school is on the high hill west of the town, but the larger boys made use of a carpenter shop opposite St. Joseph's Church, which is built on the supposed site of the shop in which Jesus worked as a boy under Joseph. There is not much of direct relief work now in Jerusalem. Contribution is made to an orphanage already existing. The Armenians of Jerusalem are themselves doing what they can for their people who have fled from Turkey. Not only in Jerusalem, but in Cairo, the Armenian communities are helping their unfortunate compatriots. Many orphans were taken to Cairo by the Near East Relief because of the Armenian colony in that city. In both Jerusalem and Cairo there is much work still to do. The Near East Relief is not only father, mother, big brother and teacher, but it is a great agency bureau looking after those whom it has helped to find homes and work.

From Cairo we passed over to Athens and Corinth, at both of which places there are large schools, and on to Salonica. It is surprising how many of the orphans have eye disease and how many are blind. The large room for the blind in the school at Athens was one of the most interesting points of the whole trip. One boy there I can never forget. He had a wonderfully pathetic and attractive face. When called on he did his work in reading and arithmetic with such brightness, alertness and accuracy as no boy with two eyes could surpass. I wonder what will become of him? Such question often occurred as we passed through the many rooms in various places. The consolation is that certainly at present these young people are in good hands. Wherever we went we saw evidence not only of efficiency, but of the sympathetic touch on the part of teachers and of all who came into immediate contact with the children. I have never seen better teaching anywhere, especially in industrial work, than at the school on the Island of Syros, or Syra. The island lies in the Aegean Sea, near the famous Delos, a night's ride by steamer from Athens. This settlement is supported mainly by contributions from Virginia. We found there about 2,000 orphans, boys and girls, Greeks and Armenians. These Greek orphans, like the Armenians, came from Turkey.

We saw the work everywhere except in the Caucasus region. There agriculture has been added to the industrial activities. In Syria and other countries it is not so easy for Armenians to get out on the land. We were in Athens when we heard of the earthquake. This has added to the needs of the Caucasus section. Such additional need leads me to express the opinion that in the work of the Near East Relief there can be no thought of any immediate stoppage. What the future will tell is still uncertain, but certainly the work must go on for some time longer. It is too great a work, too good a work, to be skimped. In the magnitude of the need, in the magnitude of the help that came to supply the need, and in the wise administration of this help, I think there has been no parallel in history. It is fine that America had the means and the heart to undertake the splendid task.

DR. STANLEY JONES IN INDIA

IN my last communication I finished up before recounting to you some of the things that happened in Ceylon. In Jaffna there was a Hindu-Christian tension, and it seemed as though our meetings would be boycotted. Pickets were placed at the cross streets stopping people from coming to the hall. But we saw the leaders, talked over things in a friendly way, and gradually the opposition died down and they came, and the last nights of the meetings there was power and grip.

After these series I had to motor at night for eighty-five miles through the elephant and tiger infested jungles to Ceylon to catch a train. We expected to be stopped on the road by a herd of wild elephants, but were disappointed. A friend sat on the front seat with a loaded gun, but nothing happened, except the jungle was filled with glistening eyes, as we went through it.

Our meetings in Colombo were well attended. I found the Buddhist thirst for spiritual things not nearly as keen as the Hindu. The agnosticism of Buddha has taken away that fine spiritual craving for God so prevalent in India. I found the Christianity in Ceylon not nearly as radiant as I had hoped. It is twenty-five years behind India in its national thinking.

In Madura our meetings were held in the beautiful Y. M. C. A. building and the hall was overcrowded every night. The heat here was intense, and after speaking, one felt as though he had gone through two or three hours of Turkish bath. The results here were magnificent. We had a cosmopolitan dinner to which eighty-five Brahmans, low-castes, Americans, English, Mohammedans and many others sat down and ate together. It was a beautiful time of fellowship, the first of its kind in this caste-ridden station of Madura.

At Bangalore this time we had decidedly the best series of meetings we have ever had there. The crowds were large and responsive. The very best men of the city were there and there was deep spiritual response. One of the greatest national leaders of India told me at this place that what he needed was conversion!

I must skip over Ikadu, for these meetings were for Christians alone, and go on to Rajamundry and Waltair. At both these places the response was far finer than anything we have ever had. In the Round Table at one of them I had to suggest to a Hindu that he be not so militant in his preaching Christianity. I thought all the time that he was a Christian!

In Burhampur the Theosophists had just had their annual convention in the hall where our meetings were held. Sir ————, who was the speaker in their meetings and a chairman in ours, remarking on the comparative sizes of the crowds, said, "Well, it looks as though India is kinder to her adopted sons than to her native-born". At this place, when the call was made to the church to meet together to pray for revival in the church, some Hindu lawyers came to pray with the Christians. I finished up with this our tour in the south, and then took a long jump from the volatile southerner to the staid, strong Punjabi, at Lahore, Rawalpindi and Sialkot. Two of these places were old places for me, but Rawalpindi was new. There they had never had any such meetings before because they did not believe that non-Christians would come to them. Here we were dealing with a more turbulent nature, but the response was splendid and real foundations were laid for future approaches. In Rawalpindi one could see the burnt places in the city, grim reminders of the Hindu-Moslem rioting where many had been killed and a large section of the city destroyed. It was in this atmosphere of bitterness and hate that we had to preach our gospel of love.

In Jaipur we were also on virgin soil. The British Resident of the city was the chairman the first night. The other meetings were held in the church, which is the only place where I have been in recent years where non-Christians would come into the church. We have been usually compelled to go to a public hall. The Round Table Conference here and at Lahore was composed of the very finest set of men we could get. The leaders in national, social and religious life were there when we sat down to speak about what religion meant to us in experience.

The last three places where we have been were the most difficult and trying places in the tour this year. The first was at Brindaban, the holy place of Vaisnavism. The city is given over to religious devotion and ascetics of every kind and type gather here. Fifteen hundred widows in one place stay and chant continuously for seven hours the name of Hari. They are given their food for doing it. So they come here to chant the name of God and die. Krishna worship is carried on here with an abandon unequaled in any other place in India. The series of meetings such as ours had never been held here, but to our surprise they gave us the largest Hindu vidyalaya, or school, for the meetings, and the leading Goswamy, or religious leader, was the chairman each night. After a couple of nights their leaders began to be frightened at what was happening, and it is seldom that I am called on to meet such determined opposition as here. There was an avalanche of questions taken from the skeptical literature of the west along with the questions and objections born out of the situation in India. We were compelled to speak and answer the questions for about three hours each night. But by patient clearing away of difficulties we won through. In our Round Table at this place we had the type of men we have been longing to get to see what they had found, namely, the real Hindu untouched by western training and outlook. But there is the same barrenness in both types. Jesus is the Way to the Father. Coming from the meeting one night we overheard some Hindus talking and one of them remarked, "Well, if he stays here a month all of these temples would be turned into churches." It was a great opportunity to witness to our gospel at the very heart of paganism.

At Aligarh we had a very different type, for Aligarh is the centre of Moslem learning in India, for here is located the Moslem University with two thousand students. Mohammedanism has been very hard and comparatively unresponsive. But here the Pro. Vice-Chancellor of the university was the chairman the first night, and to our surprise we were invited to speak to the students in the university. There was a splendid sympathy and friendliness shown by the students throughout the series which were held in the public hall—they were eagerness itself.

But by far the most interesting series we have had in this round was in the great centre of Hinduism, Benares. This is the holy place par excellence of Hinduism. It is so holy that it is not supposed to be connected with the rest of our sinful world. Every Hindu wants to visit Benares once in his life and to die there to be sure of paradise. It was the third visit to Benares and by far the best one. The Hindus offered us their college hall here for our meetings, but we felt we could not go so close, though their very offer was symptomatic of the new change and attitude. We did put up a shamiyana in the compound of the Hindu college. This was really unthinkable a few years ago. From the first meeting there was a new sense of sympathy and eagerness. The principal of the university was the chairman the first night; the leading Hindu devotes the second night; the chairman of the municipality the third night; a high Hindu government official the fourth night, and an Anglo-Indian inspector of schools the fifth night. One night I talked over three and a half hours straight; giving my address and answering questions. One had to stop from sheer exhaustion, especially as some days we had as many as four meetings a day.

At this writing we are in the native State of Gwalior, where for the first time the meetings of this kind have been held. They have given us the Hindu College hall for the meetings, and the Minister of Education of the State was the chairman last night, and the leaders of the State are in attendance with a beautiful response.

It is a wrong to these meetings, into which months of preparation and prayer have gone, to dismiss them with a word or two. It tells nothing of the battle of things and the after meetings in which many nominal Christians and Hindus stay for God and peace, and little about the Round Table Conferences in which our hearts burned within us as we witnessed to these big men about what Christ was meaning to us in experience.

I come to this Christmas time with a deep thanksgiving that Christmas ever happened and that we are privileged to tell this amazing story of the redeeming God.

You and others, through your sympathy and prayers and help, have made this possible, and we pray God's richest blessing upon you. This letter goes with our best wishes for a gracious New Year.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE COMMUNITY

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

RIGHT RACE RELATIONSHIP.

It was a goodly sight that greeted the eye of a true Christian upon the occasion of the recent meeting of the Virginia State Conference of Social Workers. There sat between twenty and twenty-five Negro delegates to this Conference. They were educated and trained, and their object in life is to do something for the uplift of their race in the best and most efficient way possible. With this end in view they had come to the Convention to hear lectures and reports that might help them in the various lines of work in which they are engaged.

At the moment, however, the immediate matter in hand was the supplying of physical strength, rather than the acquisition of mental knowledge. They were at lunch. The lunch was being served by the ladies of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, to all the delegates of the State Conference. This group, of course, were in a separate dining-room, but the ladies of the church were serving them the same luncheon that was being provided for the white delegates, and were giving them the same attention. This was as it should be. There is no reason why the white and Negro races cannot progress happily together in the South, so long as the proper lines of segregation are observed. Separate accommodation on public carriers and separate dining-rooms and schools we believe to be an absolute essential to harmonious progress. The Negro's worst enemy today is his "white friend" of the North, who thinks that the races can intermingle without antagonism. If this plan is tried it will soon be found that there is as much race antiphony in one section of the country as another, and that intimate contact invariably develops it.

Let it be remembered that the Church above referred to was the spiritual home of both President Davis and General Lee during the thrilling days of the Confederacy, and that its membership today includes society leaders of the former Capital of the Confederacy.

Another evidence of the good feeling that now exists, and that can and should be maintained, is found in the following news item:

"The Rev. (Major) Giles B. Cooke, last surviving member of the staff of General Robert E. Lee, has been signally honored by the negroes of Petersburg, in recognition of many years of his life which were devoted to their education and uplift.

At the request of Dr. W. F. Clarke, colored, representing numerous citizens of the city, the School Board decided to name the Federal Street School the Giles B. Cooke School in honor of the latter's services as a teacher and principal in the colored schools of the city.

The Federal Street School building was completed in 1924 and has been in use since that date, although no name had yet been assigned it.

Major Cooke was a pioneer in the education of Negro at the age of eighty-nine. When the public school system of Petersburg was organized in 1868 Major Cooke became the first principal of Colored School No. 1. The following year this school was developed into a high school and Major Cooke became its first principal. This institution is now known as Peabody High School.

Major Cooke was a pioneer in the education of negro youth, and his influence is believed to have been, perhaps, more far-reaching than that of any other educator the State ever has produced."

Besides serving on the staff of General Lee, and his educational work, Major Cooke has served many years in the active ministry of our Church, and is known and loved by many throughout the country.

In a personal letter to the writer, Major Cooke refers to our editorial mention of the splendid work being done by Archdeacon Russell at St. Paul's Industrial School at Lawrenceville, and concludes as follows: "You may know how highly I esteem Brother Russell when I tell you I expect him to assist at my funeral, if he should survive me."

We sincerely hope that "Brother Russell" will not be called upon to render this service for many years to come.

COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING.

By Mary Evelyn Brydon, M. D.

The Ten Commandments—Continued.

The SECOND COMMANDMENT—Worship. (Continued.)

Last week we discussed Prayer as one of the activities you should teach as a part of your child's worship of God. Today we take Praise as a second definite activity in His Worship.

2—Praise.

According to Webster: "Praise, v. t. To bestow commendation upon; honor; worship; glorify."

If you will take your pencil and go through all our most familiar services in the Prayer Book, and mark all those portions or sentences that glorify, exalt, honor, give thanks; in other words, praise God, you will find that your pencil marks are distributed pretty generally on every page. Don't take my word for it; try it and see. If you do this with the earnest desire to find sentences of praise to teach your child, you will soon lay down your pencil, turn back to the first page, and teach him from them all.

Every Episcopalian should not only KNOW BY HEART every chant in the Morning and Evening Prayer service, but should also know all the most familiar hymns in the Hymnal and Mission Hymnal; not only know them, but sing them on every church occasion. Do you remember the story of the old woman who came home one night from prayer meeting and said, "I've been going to prayer meetings all my life, but this one was the best of all"? "Why," asked her husband. "I spoke." Good meeting! I spoke!

One Sunday I observed a tiny boy holding a hymnal upside down lustily singing the words of some strange doggerel to the tune of Rock of Ages. He kept time with the congregational singing. When we sat down he whispered excitedly to his mother: 'Did you hear me, Mom? I sang!"—the praise of a little child sung out of the fulness of his heart to God. How much better if he had known the words of the hymn! How often are the voices of these little ones crushed out by the choir singing alone and no congregational singing following!

Is it out of order to say a word about the singing of congregations and choirs? We praise God in the Church through chants, versicles and hymns. These are for all the people, not for the choir alone. Once I heard a minister say from the pulpit: "This choir is to lead you in singing. You are to follow. If it attempts to do your praising for you, I shall get rit of it. It will only hamper you in praising God. It should help to familiarize you with suitable tunes. I have therefore asked the organist to use the same tunes for the chants every Sunday until you are thoroughly familiar with those tunes. No new tune will be introduced until you know these if it takes a year."

In no other church have I ever heard such congregational singing as in that one. The Venite, Te Deum, Jubilate, Magnificat, Nunc Dimittis, all the usual chants were regularly sung, and rarely was a service cut short. We came to church to sing, whether we could sing or not, and how we did sing!

Do you think it was because of the singing that such crowds came to that church; that such crowds of children came? I do not know. It was a city church in the North with a highly paid choir and over a thousand members. Congregational singing will certainly encourage children to come(for children love to sing and all people are only grown-up children.

Church Intelligence

The Restoration of the George Wythe House, Williamsburg.

All those who are interested in the life of the Church in Virginia, as well as those who are interested in Colonial history and associations, will be glad to learn that Bruton Parish Church, Williamsburg, Virginia, has acquired the home of George Wythe, which occupies practically the whole of the rest of the square upon which Bruton stands.

This house, next to Mount Vernon and Monticello, is the most interesting home in Virginia from an historic point of view.

Wythe was the first professor of Law in America. He was a student at the College of William and Mary, where he afterwards taught. Among his pupils were Thomas Jefferson, James Monroe, Edmund Randolph, St. George Tucker, and Chief Justice John Marshall. Henry Clay also studied Law in Wythe's office.

Wythe was a member of the Continental Congress, a signer of the Declaration of Independence. He designed the Seal of Virginia. He was a Vestryman in Bruton Parish Church. He served with Jefferson on the Committee which drafted the Virginia Statute of Religious Liberty. He was the first Chancellor of Virginia.

The home of George Wythe was used by Washington as his headquarters during the Yorktown Campaign. This is established by a designation on a French military map of 1782 and by record in the diary of St. George Tucker.

The Wythe House, when restored, will be used as a Parish House for Bruton Parish Church.

The work of restoration is being done in the most substantial and lasting way possible. We are working in cooperation with the authorities on the Colonial Period associated with the American Wing of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York. The Wythe House, when finished, will serve not only as the greatly needed Parish House, but also serve as a fine example of a dignified Colonial Home.

It is proposed to make a museum of the spacious hall, the dining room, and the parlor of this house. It is hoped that these rooms may be furnished with the very best furniture of the period to which the house belongs. Nothing can be put into the house unless it can be positively certified to go back to the Chippendale period or before. There are doubtless devoted Church people who have articles of furniture which they would esteem it a privilege to place in this house, as a gift to the Church in Virginia.

As the house is being exquisitely restored, no furniture could be received for this purpose unless it was the very best of its type and known beyond doubt to be of the proper period. If such furniture should be given, we would welcome having attached to it a brass plate, stating its history and the name of the donor. Several beautiful pieces have already been given, among them being a Colonial mirror from Yorktown, and a chair which was originally in the Raleigh Tavern.

Any who may be interested in aiding in this matter are kindly asked to correspond with Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin, rector, Bruton Parish Church, Williamsburg, Virginia.

Advance Work, 1926.

General Convention approved a Program for 1926-8, which contained, in addition to the budget for operating expenses, a list of Advance Work items. All of these items are for land, buildings or equipment in the domestic and foreign fields. The total needed from the General Church for this new work is $1,500,000 per annum and a quota was assigned to each of the Dioceses for its fair share of this amount. General Convention expressed the hope that each Diocese would select Advance Work items equal in amount to its Advance Work quota and present these specific needs to its people. Few Dioceses did this.

On the total Advance Work quotas for 1926 amounting to $1,500,000 there was received by the National Council only $97,702.78, or less than seven per cent of the amount needed. This is exclusive of $24,916.14 raised by the women of the Church toward their Corporate Gift of $100,000.

The following Dioceses and Districts raised one hundred per cent of their quota:

	Advance Work Quota.	Paid in 1926.
Porto Rico	$ 400	$ 622.40
Florida	5,000	5,000.00
North Dakota	1,500	2,045.00
North Texas	500	500.00
Arizona	1,000	3,595.08
Idaho	1,000	1,000.00

Each of these Dioceses also paid one hundred per cent or more on its budget quota.

One reason why more was not done on Advance Work last year is that most of the Dioceses were working hard to raise their share of the deficit. Now that the deficit is so largely cared for, it is hoped that a real effort will be made to provide some of the new buildings so desperately needed.

Latest News From China.

A cable from Bishop Graves, received on February 21, informs us of the departure of the following missionaries from China:

The Rev. and Mrs. W. H. Weigel, Miss Laura P. Wells, Miss C. A. Fullerton, Dr. E. C. Fullerton, Miss R. W. Walker, the Rev. and Mrs. F. J. M. Cotter and family. All of the foregoing leave Shanghai February 25, returning to the United States by way of Europe.

The Rev. Walworth Tyng and family, the Rev. C. F. Howe and family, both of the District of Hankow, leaves Shanghai February 25 on the Shinyo Maru, due in San Francisco March 21.

Dr. Julia Russell, of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Shanghai, left Shanghai on the Korea Maru, February 10, due in San Francisco March 4.

The departure of Dr. Fullerton, Dr. Russell and Miss Laura Wells, all of the staff of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Shanghai, suggests that the Hospital has been closed, although no definite information to this effect has reached us.

The National Church Mission of Help.

A high level of interest and value was attained by all the papers read at the annual meeting of the National Church Mission of Help in Providence, R. I., February 10-12. It is hoped that later they may be placed at the disposal of some of the Church editors in order that a larger number of people may enjoy them. Papers were contributed by Dean Lathrop, Mrs. Theodore Robinson, of Chicago; Miss Helen Kempton, of the New York School of Social Work; the Rev. Mr. Hamlin, of St. John's, Newport, and others. Luncheon discussions were led by the Rev. Mr. Spofford, of The Witness, on conditions met by girls in industry, the Rev. Mr. Magoun, of the Newport Seamen's Church Institute, and the Rev. Mr. Lawrence, of Grace Church, Providence. There were services of intercession for the work of the Church Mission of Help, in addition to the early celebration.

Members of the conference were guests of the Rhode Island Mission of Help. A reception given by Mrs. Rush Sturges, at which Bishop and Mrs. Perry received the conference, and the showing of several famous old homes with their treasures were part of the hospitality enjoyed.

The conference was attended by one hundred and eleven registered members and a number of unregistered visitors. The sessions made a marked contribution both to the professional social worker and to the trained Church worker, perhaps the distinguishing feature of Church Mission of Help being that it does social work both in a scientific way and from the Church standpoint.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

A New Departure in Lenten Services.

A new departure in Lenten services in Washington will be the series of services to be held in the French language at St. John's Church on Sunday and Friday afternoons. These services will be conducted by the Rev. Florian Vurpillot, a Frenchman of Huguenot ancestry. He was formerly a professor at the University of Pennsylvania and rector of the French Episcopal Church in Philadelphia. Later he was rector of the Huguenot Church in Charleston, S. C., which has been in existence over two hundred years. Recently he has taken residence in Washington, and permission to use St. John's Church for these services has been granted by the rector of St. John's Church, the Rev. Robert Johnston, D. D., and the vestry. The services on Fridays, beginniug March 4, will be at 4:45 P. M., and on Sundays at 4 P. M. Services will follow the regular prayer book order in French, and French prayer books and hymnals will be found in the pews.

Lenten Services at Keith's.

The Laymen's Service Association, assisted by the Washington Federation of Churches, will conduct its ninth series of noonday Lenten services at Keith's Theater this year, and has appointed Dr. Larkin W. Glazebrook as chairman of the committee in charge. The same general procedure of other years will be followed with services every week day except Saturday, lasting from 12 to 12:30 P. M.

These services are always largely attended and have come to be regarded as a regular part of the religious life of the community.

Lenten Lecture Courses.

Washington Cathedral announces the following Lenten lecture courses for 1927, to be given by the Cathedral clergy. All interested persons are invited to attend.

The Bethlehem Chapel, Mt. St. Alban—Dean Bratenahl. Fridays at 5 P. M., preceded by Evening Prayer at 4:30 P. M. Subject, The Revelation of Jesus Christ: The Church and the World as Described in the Closing Book of the Bible.

St. Thomas' Church—Bishop Rhinelander. Thursday at 8 P. M. Subject, The Teaching of Christ and the Faith of the Church.

St. Mark's Church—Canon DeVries. Thursday at 8 P. M. Subject, The Sermon on the Mount.

The Church of the Good Shepherd—Canon Stokes. Thursdays at 8 P. M. Subject, The Christian Faith.

Dr. Morris Serves as Assistant at Epiphany.

The Rev. James W. Morris, D. D., is at Epiphany Church, where he will assist the rector, Rev. Z. B. Phillips, D. D., until the first of May and probably longer. Dr. Morris was formerly rector of Christ Church, Norfolk, and also of Monumental Church, in Richmond. Some years ago he left Richmond to go to Brazil, where he worked side by side with Bishop Kinsolving. Epiphany Parish Guide, a weekly publication, refers to him as "a man of rare gifts, combined with ability as a preacher". Dr. Morris will no doubt find many friends in Epiphany Church and the Diocese of Washington.

An Opportunity for Lovers of Music.

A series of organ recitals will be given on Wednesday evenings during Lent at Epiphany Church, when well-known organists will play. These recitals have been arranged by the District Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, of which Mr. Adolf Torovsky, organist of Epiphany Church, is dean, and offerings at these recitals will be applied to a fund now being raised to defray the expenses attendant upon the Convention of the A. G. O. to be held in Washington in June. This convention will be a great opportunity for many who love music, and church organists in particular are looking forward to hearing some of the outstanding organists of this country in recital at that time.

The Adult Bible Class Dinner held at Epiphany Church on February 16 proved to be a record-breaking event, both as to numbers and the good spirit evidenced. More than five hundred persons attended the dinner, which was served by a group of young men and women from the Young People's Society of the church. Every available foot of space had to be used, tables being placed on the stage and in the gallery of the parish hall, while more than a hundred persons were accommodated in the Willard Room. Mr. Thompson, president of the class, acted as host and toastmaster and introduced the speakers, some of whom were Mr. William Channing Johnson, Canon DeVries, Dr. Sinclair Bowen and Dr. Z. B. Phillips.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. W. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Council of the Diocese: Bishop Burton to Have a Coadjutor.

On Tuesday, February 15, all but two of the clergy and the usual lay representation from the parishes and missions convened at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, in the annual Council of the Diocese. The Council opened with the Holy Communion. The Bishop read the Necrology for 1926 and later delivered his annual address. Election of officers and members of various boards and committees; and a mass meeting held at 7:45 P. M., in celebration of the Bishops' Crusade, were the other outstanding features of the opening day.

Bishop Burton presided over all sessions, which were held in the Bishop Burton Community House. The entire Council was entertained at luncheon in the Community House between morning and afternoon sessions of both days of the Council.

Officers elected were as follows: The Rev. J. H. Gibbons, Secretary; the Rev. William Dern, Assistant Secretary (Mr. Dern was Acting Secretary of the Council due to the serious illness of Mr. Gibbons); C. H. Edge, Treasurer; Clinton M. Harbison, Chancellor.

Standing Committee—Very Rev. Robert K. Massie, the Rev. J. D. Gibson, the Rev. J. H. Gibbons, W. W. Pettis, A. D. Cole and Dr. W. M. McClure.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod—The Rev. Messrs. C. S. Hale, Thomas L. Settle, Frank Cooley, J. H. Gibbons, J. J. Clopton, Paul Duel, Miss Laura Clay, Miss S. M. Gaither, Mrs. F. O. Young, Miss Virginia I. Reed, Mr. J. A. Edge, Mr. A. D. Cole.

The Committee on Work at the University of Kentucky, composed of the Rev. Robert K. Massie, chairman, Rev. Thomas L. Settle and Rev. William S. Blackshear, was authorized to work with a similar committee to be named in the Diocese of Kentucky and to report at the next Council.

In his annual address to the Council on Tuesday morning Bishop Burton made three main recommendations, viz., that an assistant be named to aid him in his work in the Diocese, that the missionary work in Eastern Kentucky should be broadened, and that religious work should be conducted at the University of Kentucky.

He stated that for the past thirty-one years he had been Bishop of the Diocese and had served in the sacred ministry for fifty years. He said that on November 9 he would be esventy-five years of age and that he was no longer able to carry on the heavy duties of the office of Bishop as actively as they deserved. For these reasons he suggested that he be given an assistant. He offered to give three-fourths of his salary toward the payment of such an assistant. Should such an assistant be named he would be charged with vigorously extending the Church work in Eastern Kentucky, the care of weak parishes and missions, procuring of clergymen for vacant parishes, general leadership in missionary activities, social service and religious education, and work among the young people.

Bishop Burton declared that he did not desire to relinquish his jurisdiction as Bishop, but he expressed the opinion that far greater results could be obtained in the rapidly growing sections of Eastern Kentucky if he be given an assistant. In his address he also announced the appointment of a general missionary worker in Eastern Kentucky and authorization for two social service women workers. These latter workers will be located at Harlan and Pikeville, where centers are growing rapidly.

At the conclusion of Bishop Burton's address the Very Rev. R. K. Massie, D. D., of Christ Church Cathedral, and Rev. Thomas L. Settle, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, expressed their approval of the appointment of an assistant for Bishop Burton, both, however, opposing any reduction in the salary of the present Bishop.

On Wednesday morning, February 16, the Council adopted the recommendations of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, which declared itself in favor of the naming of a Bishop-Coadjutor for the Diocese of Lexington, and it was decided to call a special Council for this purpose.

At the night session of the Council on Tuesday, February 15, the Bishops' Crusade was reviewed by the Rev. C. S. Hale, of Ashland; the Rev. J. D. Gibson, of Covington, and the Very Rev. R. K. Massie, D. D., Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington. All three expressed the opinion that the Crusade had been a great success in the Diocese of Lexington, due both to careful and concentrated preparation on the part of the clergy and laity at points where the Crusade has been held; and to the splendid personnel of the Crusading force, both national and local. Special emphasis was given Bishop Burton's untiring interest and help. During the sessions of the Council definite plans were made for carrying the Crusade into all parts of the Diocese as soon as was practical.

The Council adjourned on Wednesday afternoon with a devotional service, to meet at Trinity, Covington, in February, 1928.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. W. T. Manning, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. A. S Lloyd, D. D., Suffragan.
Rt. Rev. Herbert Shipman, D. D., Suffragan.

Centennial of the Church of the Ascension.

The Church of the Ascension, in lower Fifth Avenue, celebrated the centennial of its founding on the last Sunday in February. Bishop Manning and the rector, the Rev. Doland B. Aldrich, spoke. During Lent services will be held daily at 5:30. The later history of the Ascension is well known. It has for years been a free-pew church, having been a pioneer in New York in that respect. At times it has had crowds, and at times indifferent support. Lower Fifth Avenue seems permanently to be fixed as residence district. Larger apartments are being erected. Under the present administration the Ascension is regaining its old-time character and holding its people.

Memorial Service for Dr. Grant.

On the last Sunday afternoon in February a memorial service was held for the late Rev. Dr. Percy S. Grant at St. Mark's in the Bowery. The service was repeated at eight, following other speakers at four. Speakers were the Rev. Dr. J. Howard Melish, the Rev. Dr. E. Clowes Chorley, the Rev. Dr. Guy E. Shipler and Mr. George Foster Peabody in the afternoon, and the Rev. Dr. John Haynes Holmes, of the Community Church, formerly Unitarian; the Rev. Dr. Nathan Krass, of Temple Emmanuel; Mr. Norman Hapgood and Mr. Edward Markham.

Noonday Lenten Services.

Noonday Lenten services in New York this year will follow the conventional lines. The three New York Bishops opened the Trinity season, as they have done for some years, and famous preachers from many parts of the country will follow. Crowds always attend. St. Thomas' Church has daily services at noon, as does also St. Bartholomew's, and others as usual.

Washington's Birthday Services.

On Washington's Birthday Bishop Manning addressed three hundred Brotherhood men, and defended Washington from recent attacks. He repeated the defense in the evening before the Society of the Cincinnati, and urged that the Cathedral of St. John the Divine become a Washington shrine.

At St. Paul's Chapel Bishop Garland, of Pennsylvania, was the preacher.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. H. L. Burleson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. B. Roberts, D. D., Suffragan.

The Crusade.

The National Crusade began in Sioux Falls at Calvary Cathedral on Sunday evening, January 30. Bishop Jett, of Southwestern Virginia, and the Rev. Douglas Matthews, of Montana, were the Crusaders. On Sunday morning Bishop Jett preached at St. Peter's Church and Mr. Matthews at the Cathedral, good congregations being present in both places.

The mass meetings, which were the main feature of the Crusade, took place each evening from Sunday to Friday, inclusive. Each was preceded by fifteen minutes of hymn-singing. There was no vested choir, the singers scattering themselves throughout the body of the church, which made the rendition of the hymns particularly inspiring. On each evening Mr. Matthews made an opening address on what he called the "Autobiography of Jesus", being the Beatitudes. Bishop Jett followed with sermons on such topics as "Feeding the Whole of Life", "The Practice of Prayer", "The Possession of Power", etc.

In addition to the meetings at the Cathedral, special mission services were held in St. Peter's Church on Monday and Tuesday evenings.

On Monday and each following day there was a celebration of the Holy Communion at 8 o'clock, followed by a second celebration at 10:30, at which a helpful meditation was given by Mr. Matthews. On Wednesday, the Feast of the Purification, Bishop Burleson had the celebration.

The afternoon conferences were intensely interesting and showed a continued increase in attendance.

Each afternoon a special service was held for the children. These were well attended. The first talk was given by Bishop Burleson, the second by Mr. Matthews, and the remaining ones by other clergy. A gratifying number of children attended these services.

The final Crusade meeting on Friday evening was marked by a solemn service of rededication, at which time the pledge cards were offered and an opportunity given to individuals to express themselves regarding more loyal discipleship.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

Lenten Services.

Under the auspices of the Church Club of Louisiana, mid-day services will be held at the Y. W. C. A., beginning at 12:05 daily (except Saturdays and Sundays) and closing promptly at 12:30. The preachers are:

March 3-4—Bishop Sessums.
March 7—Rev. Matthew Brewster, D. D.
March 8—Rev. W. E. Phillips.
March 9—Rev. Donald H. Wattley.
March 10—Rev. William Hamilton Nes.
March 11—Rev. Robert S. Coupland, D. D.
March 14-18—Rev. Charles N. Tyndell, D. D., rector St. Luke's Church, Memphis, Tenn.
March 21-25—Rev. Oliver J. Hart, rector of St. Paul's Church, Chattanooga, Tenn.
March 28-April 1—Rev. Prentice A. Pugh, rector Church of the Advent, Nashville, Tenn.
April 4-8—Rt. Rev. Frank A. Juhau, D. D., Bishop of Florida.

United Lenten evening services will be held Tuesdays at 8 P. M. as follows:

March 8—Grace Church, Rev. William Hamilton Nes.
March 15—St. George's Church, Rev. Charles N. Tyndell, D. D.
March 22—Trinity Church, Rev. Oliver J. Hart.
March 29—St. Paul's Church, Bishop Gilman.
March 31—St. Anna's Church, Rev. Prentice A. Pugh.
April 5—Christ Church Cathedral, Bishop Juhan.

Trinity Church Endowment Fund.

During the past month the bequest of $5,000 from Mr. W. Ratcliffe Irby was turned over to Trinity Church, New Orleans, by the executors. By resolution the vestry instructed the Finance Committee to invest this amount in bonds, thereby starting a much needed endowment fund for Trinity Church. It will be the intention of the vestry to similarly invest any further bequests, the income from which will be appropriated as the vestry from year to year may determine.

WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA.

The Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

Patriotic Service.

At a recent patriotic service to honor George Washington, held in Calvary Church, Fletcher, the Rev. Clarence Stuart McClellan, Jr., rector, Colonel James A. Moss, of Washington, D. C., Director-General of the United States Flag Association, was the main speaker, his topic being "The Religion of the United States Flag". The Rev. Louis J. Bour, rector of St. Lawrence's Roman Catholic Church, Asheville, and Rabbi Moses P. Jacobson, of the Temple of Prayer, Asheville, were in the chancel and assisted the rector. The orchestra of the First Christian Church, Asheville, the Asheville High School Glee Clubs and special soloists rendered the patriotic music. Delegations of all the patriotic organizations in Asheville, Hendersonville and other Western North Carolina towns attended and brought greetings. A handsome silk United States flag, the gift of Mrs. Claudia Holt Oates, was presented to Calvary Church. Rare pictures of Washington, and United States, North Carolina and Great Britan flags were exhibited in the nave.

LONG ISLAND.

Rt. Rev. E. M. Stires, D. D., Bishop.

Increase of Episcopal Fund and Salaries of Clergy.

Bishop Stires, in a recent letter to the clergy of his Diocese, announces that two ambitions which he has cherished since he became Bishop are in course of being fulfilled. He was concerned about increasing the capital of the Episcopal Fund. As yet the income yielded by this fund is insufficient, and has to be augmented by an assessment on the parishes. The Bishop hopes the fund will be increased, so that the support of the Bishops ("for in time," says his letter, "there must be more than one") will not be a burden to the parishes. For the year 1927 Bishop Stires announces a friend of the Diocese has pledged the salary of the Bishop, with the hope of continuing this until the endowment is adequate. Bishop Stires hopes that this contribution will also help toward the fulfilment of his second ambition, the increase of the salaries of the clergy generally. Parishes relieved of assessment for the Bishop's salary will be able, he trusts, to increase the salaries of their own clergy.

In the same letter Bishop Stires announces that plans have been made for help by visiting Bishops from January to June, and he says, "If action should be taken for episcopal aid in any other way during the current year," the income of the Episcopal Fund, released by the generous gift mentioned above, will make that financially possible.

Bishop Tyler, of North Dakota, assisted Bishop Stires by administering confirmation in a number of churches during February. Bishop Remington, of Eastern Oregon, will give similar assistance during March.

Young People's Conference.

The Young People's Conference of the Province of New York and New Jersey, held February 11-13 in St. Bartholomew's Church and the Church of St. Mark, Brooklyn, brought together more than one hundred and twenty young people from all seven of the Dioceses of the province. Speakers and leaders included Bishop Tyler, of North Dakota; Dean Sargent, of Long Island; Canon Lewis, of New Jersey, and Mr. Lewis B. Franklin, of the National Council.

Centenary of Brooklyn Church.

St. John's Church, Brooklyn, commemorated its centenary on Sunday, February 20. The centennial service was held at 11 A. M., and Bishop Stires was the preacher. The historian of the occasion was Mr. Frederic V. Clark, an officer of the parish. A reception was given on Wednesday evening following. This parish is the second oldest in Brooklyn. Its first church was located on the corner of Washington and Johnson Streets, where the Brooklyn Eagle Building now stands. The present church was built forty or fifty years ago on St. John's Place near Seventh Avenue, when the "park slope" was developing as a new residential district. The Rev. T. Bond Holland, M. D., has been rector since 1911.

Corporate Communion of B. S. A.

Four hundred and sixty-nine men and boys of the Diocese attended the annual Corporate Communion of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in St. Thomas' Church, Brooklyn, on Washington's Birthday. The Rt. Rev. Ernest M. Stires, Bishop of the Diocese, was celebrant, and he was assisted by the rector of the parish, the Rev. Duncan M. Genns, by the Archdeacon of Brooklyn, the Ven. Charles G. Clark, and by the Rev. William J. Dietrich, Jr., rector of St. Stephen's, Port Washington.

After the service, breakfast was served in the parish hall adjoining. Addresses were made after breakfast by William F. Leggo, Diocesan President of the Brotherhood, by the rector, by Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of War, and by Bishop Stires. Colonel Roosevelt's theme was the indispensible necessity of the Church's idealistic influence in the moral life of the community or the nation. Bishop Stires dwelt upon the patriotic aspect of a Churchman's responsibilities, and made two interesting announcements of opportunities for service to be offered in the Diocese. First, he told of a training class for lay readers about to be begun under the care of a few well-qualified clergymen. Second, he announced that a "flying squadron" of specially trained lay readers is to be created, with the special object of undertaking pioneer work in some of the rapidly growing new residential areas in Queens Borough. A number of men have been already enlisted for this work.

Priests' Fellowship Meets.

The Priests' Fellowship of Long Island met at the Church of the Redeemer, Brooklyn, on St. Matthias' Day The Holy Communion was celebrated after which the Rev. Strattford C Jones, of Trinity Church, Manhattan gave a helpful meditation on Our Lord's Priesthood. A short business meeting followed, and after that the Rev. Francis J. Hall, D. D., of the General Theological Seminary, read a paper entitled "Reunion at the Cross Roads". He gave much information regarding the plans for the World Conference, and an interesting forecast of possible courses for the future.

The Preaching Mission.

The news that can be gathered about the Preaching Mission throughout the Diocese, which was completed on Friday, February 18, is to the effect that the mission was generally successful, and fully justified the decision to hold it before Lent rather than during Lent. With the preparation that has now been given in the Bishops' Crusade and in the Preaching Mission, this Lent should be one of exceptional opportunity.

"Archdeaconry Sustainers" to Be Enrolled.

At the quarterly meeting of the Archdeaconry of Queens and Nassau, held at Grace Church, Jamaica, on February 23, it was voted to enroll as Archdeaconry Sustainers any individuals, guilds, fellowships or others who would agree to give $5 or more on the Archdeacon's call, not more than three times a year. It is hoped that two hundred sustainers can be obtained. At the same meeting a committee was appointed to plan a guild of lay readers, to take duty at the Archdeacon's request in one or another of the new missions which were begun last year at Long Beach, Steinway and Stewart Manor, or elsewhere as need may be.

The Ven. Roy Farrel Duffield, the present Archdeacon, was renominated to the Bishop for appointment for another term of four years. The Rev. George S. Talmage, of Oyster Bay, was re-elected Secretary, and Mr. Frank Gulden, of Garden City, was re-elected Treasurer.

The Rev. Emile S. Harper, rector of All Saints', Brooklyn, has so far recovered from his recent serious illness that he was able to attend the eighth annual dinner of the Men's Club of his parish on Thursday evening, February 24. Supreme Court Justice Stephen Gallaghan, president of the club, was toastmaster. The rector made a speech based upon things he had learned during three months' experience as a hospital patient. Mr. Frank McCabe, advertising manager of the New York World, told some interesting things about a newspaper man's life. Bishop Stires made the last and principal address. Nearly three hundred men were present.

Rt. Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., Bishop.

Synod to Meet in Roanoke.

Under authority of a resolution adopted by the Executive Board of the Diocese of Southwestern Virginia, at its January meeting, Bishop Jett extended an invitation to the Synod of the Province of Washington to hold its session of 1927 in Roanoke. The Rev. Thomas T. Bigham, of Pittsburgh, Secretary of the Synod, has announced the acceptance of this invitation, and accordingly the Diocese will be happy in having as its guests for a few days during next October representatives, both clerical and lay, from all of the thirteen Dioceses, comprising the Province of Washington. In addition there will be a number of ladies present from various parts of the Province attending sessions of the Woman's Auxiliary and other organizations.

The Rt. Rev. Robert Carter Jett, D. D., returned to Roanoke on February 21, after having been on a visit to the Middle and Far West since January 26. The first two weeks in February he conducted the Bishops' Crusade at Sioux Falls and Aberdeen, S. D. Following this he made a short trip to the Pacific Coast. The Bishop reached home in excellent health and spirits, after a pleasant trip.

A Unique Service.

At the evening service on February 6 at St. George's Church, Nanticoke, there was administered the sacrament of baptism, the first service of its kind held since the Rev. Henry R. Taxdal took charge of the church, which was last June. There were thirty-five persons baptized, five of whom were infants, and the rest adults and children whose ages ranged from twelve to thirty years. One of the unique features of this service was the fact that the mothers of three of the infants were baptized in turn immediately after their infants. The Rev. Henry R. Taxdal baptized, and the Rev. Dr. F. L. Flinchbrugh, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre, Pa., who is also rector of St. George's, as same is a mission church of St. Stephen's Church, preached the sermon, and expressed his gratification at seeing so many adults baptized. The church was filled to its capacity.

Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Bishop.

Lenten Services in Alexandria.

In accordance with the suggestion of the vestries, the Lenten services in the three Episcopal churches of the city, beginning next Wednesday, will be largely of a union character. On Wednesdays at 8 P. M., at Grace Church, the preachers will be the Rev. P. F. Hall, the Rev. J. R. Ripley, of Mount Pleasant, the Rev. W. S. Bishop; St. Thomas' Church, Washington, the Rev. E. Pinkney Wroth, Christ Church, Georgetown, and others.

On Thursdays at 8 P. M., at Christ Church, Crusade continuation services will be held. The Crusade hymn pamphlets will be used and the sermons will be by Dr. Larkin Glazebrook, a Lay National Crusader of Washington; the Rev. Z. B. T. Phillips, of Epiphany Church, Washington; the Rev. H. H. D. Sterrett, of All Souls' Church, Washington; the Rev. Bland Tucker, of St. John's, Georgetown, and others.

On Tuesdays at 4:45 P. M., at Christ Church, the rectors of the local churches will give addresses. At St. Paul's the Holy Communion will be administered at 10:30 A. M. on Thursdays, and there will be a service on Fridays at 4:45 P. M., with addresses especially for children by the three rectors.

At the Chapel of the Good Shepherd the Rev. P. F. Hall will hold services every Friday at 7:30 P. M., and the Rev. Edgar Carpenter will preach at Grace Church on Fridays at 7:45 P. M.

Bishop Rowe's Visit to Richmond.

The Rt. Rev. Peter Trimble Rowe, D. D., Bishop of Alaska, spent from Saturday, February 19, to Monday, February 21, in Richmond. On Sunday he preached at Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill, in the morning, at St. James' in the afternoon, and at St. Paul's in the evening. On Monday he visited the two Church Schools, St. Catherine's and St. Christopher's, and made addresses to the upper and lower schools of both schools. He attended the meeting of the Richmond Clericus on Monday morning. On Monday evening he made an address at the meeting of all the branches of the Woman's Auxiliary in Richmond at the Mayo Memorial Church House. Large crowds attended the services in all of the churches on Sunday, and the crowd exceeded the capacity of the auditorium of the Church House at the meeting of the Auxiliaries.

Noonday Services in Richmond.

Midday Lenten services will be held this year as usual in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, the Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., rector. The services this year will be held under the auspices of St. Paul's, and members of the various chapters of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in Richmond will serve us ushers.

The list of preachers is as follows:

March 3-4—Rt. Rev. William Cabell Brown, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Virginia.

March 7-10—Rt. Rev. Theodore DuBose Bratton, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Mississippi.

March 11—Rt. Rev. Henry St. George Tucker, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Virginia.

March 14-18—Rev. W. Russell Bowie, D. D., rector of Grace Church, New York City, and formerly rector of St. Paul's.

March 21-25—Rev. Justin 'Wroe Nixon, D. D., pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, Rochester, N. Y.

March 28-April 1—Rev. Luke M. White, D. D., rector of St. Luke's Church, Montclair, N. J.

April 4-8—Rev. Hugh Black, D. D., Union Theological Seminary, New York City.

The New St. Stephen's Church, Richmond.

About fifteen years ago a group of some ten or twelve people, who had gone out from Richmond to Westhampton to live, decided that an Episcopal Church was a necessary thing for the life and well-being of the community.

They at once proceeded to put up the present church building and rectory. This church seats about two hundred people.

But the community grew rapidly and the number of church members grew with it. It was seen some five years ago that a new church ought to be built as soon as possible, owing to the crowded condition of the present one.

A splendid site was procured at that time on the corner of Grove Avenue and the Three Chopt Road, adjacent to the property then owned by the church.

A building committee was appointed a few months ago and directed to select an architect, choose a design and build the church.

This committee chose the Gothic type of architecture, the church to be of rough stone, and to seat four hundred and twenty people. A small chapel to be used for services attended by a small number of people will form a part of the church. The church, when completed, will also have a tower at the entrance, the foundation which is being laid now, the tower itself to be added later.

The total cost of the church, when completed, together with the lot, will be about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars.

St. Stephen's has one hundred and sixty-five members and about one hundred and twenty-five in the Sunday school, exclusive of the students of the two Church Schools, who attend service there.

The foundations of the new church have been laid and the cornerstone will be placed in a few weeks, and the congregation hope to occupy the new building by Christmas of this year.

The present rector of St. Stephen's is the Rev. Giles B. Palmer.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor

Clerical Changes.

Several changes among the clergy of the Diocese may be noted: The Rev. A. S. Hogenauer from St. Michael's Church, New York City, has become rector of St. Paul's Church, Newark, succeeding the Rev. F. A. Coleman, now rector at Brewster, New York. The Rev. Rowland F. Nye has gone from Valesburg to East Rutherford, having charge also at Woodridge, succeeding the Rev. John Thomas, who has taken charge of Ascension Church, Bloomfield. The Rev. William C. Cadman has come from Holy Trinity, Harlem, New York City, to Ramsay, having charge also at Wortendyke. The Rev. William L. Griffin, Jr., has become curate at St. Paul's Church, Paterson. The Rev. Albert E. Phillips has gone from St. Lukes', Paterson, to Edgewater, succeeding the Rev. Rowland K. Gimson, who has gone to the Diocese of Harrisburg. The Rev. Charles S. Armstrong leaves St. Matthew's, Jersey City, to become the first rector of the new Parish of St. Elizabeth's, at Upper Ridgewood.

Archdeaconry Meetings.

The five Archdeaconry Meetings in the first week of February brought together nearly all of the clergy in active service in the Diocese, for counsel and advice with the Bishops concerning the prosecution of the Bishops' Crusade. All are planning the use of Lent in a definite way to follow up the Crusade. Many of the parishes have been already divided into districts with groups of Church people called together for personal conference with the clergy, for intercession and instruction. It is expected that in every one of the one hundred and fifty-five churches there will be in the fourth or fifth week in Lent a mission, conducted by the rector, or with such help as he can obtain. Most will follow the suggestion as regards subjects of the General Church Commission.

G. F. S. Notes.

The annual dinner of the Girls' Friendly Society was held in Newark on the evening of February 17, with an attendance of five hundred and fifty from the various branches. The Bishops and Miss Landon, of Grace Church, New York, were the speakers. Mrs. A. D. Story, the Diocesan President, was able to report that the Holiday House on the Delaware River, costing over $5,000, had been paid for, with the exception of a debt of $1,800. Many pledges for the furnishing of the House have been made, so that it is expected that the House will be open for use about the first of July. It will accommodate about one hundred young women and is beautifully placed near the water-gap.

Diocesan Hospital Work: The plans are being perfected for the enlargement of Christ Hospital, Jersey City, and the building of a new nurses' home with the work, which has been made possible by the raising last year of $500,000 through a campaign in Jersey City. The two Diocesan hospitals, St. Barnabas' Newark, with the Rev. John G. Martin, Superintendent, and Christ Hospital, Jersey City, with the Rev. Thomas E. Hyde, Superintendent are doing larger and better work than ever before.

Colored Work: The first Confirmation for the new St. Andrew's congregation of Colored people at Passaic, in charge of the Rev. Henry Edwards, was held on February 13. This is the eighth congregation of Colored people in the Diocese, and no part of the Diocesan work has been more encouraging.

Crusade Services in the Diocese.

On January 30 the Rev. A. M. Rich, rector of St. John's, Charleston, conducted the Bishops' Crusade in Epiphany Church, Eutawville, the Rev. A. W. Skarsdon, rector. He had two services on Sunday, and every other day he had one night service, except on Wednesday, which, being the purification of the Virgin Mary, was observed by a celebration of the Holy Communion at 9:30 A. M. All the services were well attended, almost every member coming regularly, in addition to many people from the other churches.

In St. John's Church, Johns Island, the Rev. E. S. Middleton, rector in charge, the Rev. J. B. Walker, of the Church of the Holy Comforter, conducted the Bishops' Crusade from February 6 through Wednesday, the 9th. Crowds attended every service, there being scarcely seating room for all the young men, who stood rather than fail to hear his message. The Presbyterian Church was well represented at every service.

Mr. Walker went to Grace Chapel, Rockville, to hold service on Sunday evening and Monday morning. He stayed during the interim between service among the people of the two islands, who speak of him in glowing terms.

The Rev. C. R. Cody, rector of St. Matthew's, Darlington, conducted the Bishops' Crusade at St. Matthias', Summerton, the Rev. T. E. H. Galbraith, rector, beginning on Sunday morning, February 6, with the celebration of the Holy Communion and a sermon on the Incarnation. At night he preached to a full congregation at the union service in the Methodist Church. Each day Mr. Cody preached in the afternoon and at night in St. Matthias', and always to an increasing congregation. On the last night the church was crowded to the doors. The ministers of the other churches all attended regularly.

The Bishops' Crusade was conducted in St. Bartholomew's, Hartsville, the Rev. H. L. Hoover, rector, by the Rev.

Carl S. Smith, of St. Paul's, Charleston. The congregation was well pleased with the splendid series of sermons, which was attested by an average attendance every evening of over one hundred persons.

The Crusade will be held in three centers in Baldwin County during the month of March. The following is the list of places, dates and Crusaders:

Fairhope—March 8 to 13. Crusader, the Rev. J. W. Heyes.

Bon Secour—March 22 to 27. Crusader, the Rev. Joseph W. Fulford. Meetings also at Point Clear and Magnolia Springs. The Ven. J. F. Plummer will assist the Crusaders.

Robertsdale—March 27 to April 1. Crusader, the Rev. Edmunds Bennett, Ph. D., assisted by Rev. Joseph R. Walker.

The Rev. Joseph R. Walker will conduct the Crusade in St. Peter's Church, Talladega, March 13 to 18. He will be assisted by the rector, the Rev. Joseph H. Harvey.

It is hoped later on to secure Crusaders for all the points in Baldwin County, Daphne, Bay Minette, Loxley and Foley. This will come on what is called the third wave of the Crusade.

The Rev. T. R. Bridges, D. D., of Mobile, has been invited to conduct the Crusade in the new St. Paul's Church at Daphne just as soon as this church has been completed. The roof is being put on this week, and it is hoped that it will be ready for use in a month's time. The contract for this church was let to Graham and Dryer last September. The contract for the parish house at Robertsdale was let on December 13, and it was completed on February 19.

St. John's New Parish House.

The new parish house of St. John's, Robertsdale, has been completed. Much credit is due Mrs. G. W. Wiley and the Guild for this building, which is a credit to the community and to the Episcopal Church in Baldwin County.

The total cost of the parish house was $2,100. All of this has been raised with the exception of $500, which was borrowed from the local bank. The Guild raised $1,000 of this amount over a period of years; $600 was raised locally, the largest gift being $100.

SOUTH FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. Cameron Mann, D. D., Bishop
Rt. Rev. J. D. Wing, D. D., Coadjutor.

Enthusiastic Response to Bishops' Crusade.

Keen interest and enthusiasm have marked the opening part of the Bishops' Crusade in South Florida.

The official Crusaders were the Rt. Rev. Albion Knight, D. D., of New Jersey, the Rev. C. Ernest Smith, D. D., of Washington, D. C., and the Rev. Stephen Keeler of Akron, Ohio. The special services were held at Tampa and at Miami, with a large attendance of both clergy and laity at both of these parishes. Earnest "follow-up" work is being carried on.

Following the welcome visit of these crusaders, the Rt. Rev. Jame M. Maxon, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Tennessee, volunteered to give a series of Crusade services in St. Luke's Cathedral, Orlando, February 16-22. Bishop Mann, Bishop Wing and Rev. Frank P. Johnson, (who is temporarily in charge of the Cathedral parish until the arrival of the new Dean) assisted Bishop Maxon in these services.

Bishop Maxon had already taken his official part in the Crusade, having held these services earlier in Minneapolis, and his kindness in using the time which he had intended to have as a brief vacation to bring the messages of the Crusade clearly and forcefully before the Cathedral congregation was deeply appreciated by all who shared his sermons and instructions. Each message from Bishop Maxon was full of help for a closer following of Christ's teachings, a deeper individual responsibility for daily service to God and to mankind. Increasing interest was shown throughout the six days of Bishop Maxon's zealous labor, and in the closing service most of the large congregation made a special offering of cards pledging the re-dedication of their lives in Christ's service.

Bishop Mann, Bishop Wing and the clergy and laity of this diocese are trying to have the help of the Crusade carried to every parish and mission, and also to further the work of the visiting Crusaders.

Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D. D., Bishop.

Educational Institute and Auxiliary Meeting.

"It takes the price of forty-two pounds of butter to equal the day's wages of a plumber," said Mrs. Wright B. Haff, Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, Diocese of New York, making a comparison between city and rural conditions in her address before the fifteenth annual Educational Institute for women at St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, under the auspices of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese. Thirty-five women were in attendance during the Institute, January 29 and 30. At the annual meeting of the Auxiliary, which followed, about one hundred were present, and the following were elected to office: President, Mrs. William T. Barbour; Vice-President, Detroit Archdeaconry, Mrs. James H. Benedict; Vice-President, Southern Archdeaconry, Miss Annie Condon; Vice-President, Northern Archdeaconry, Mrs. Joseph R. Appelbe; Vice-President, Foreign Field, Mrs. S. Arthur Fuller; Vice-President, in charge of Supply Work, Mrs. George March; Vice-President, Educational Work, Mrs. Don D. Williams; Recording Secretary, Miss Winifred Granger; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. John T. Shaw; Treasurer, Mrs. Edw. L. Warner.

The various secretaries reported that the United Thank Offering to date was $5,663.71; that supplies valued at $5,500 were sent out last year to various mission fields, and that forty Mission Study classes were held.

Crusade Conferences and Missions.

The Bishops' Crusade is getting under way in Michigan. Bishop Page has taken the lead by conducting a series of conferences with the clergy on the subject of spiritual life. These conferences were held in connection with the annual convention of the Diocese, held early in February. Evelyn Underhill's book, "Concerning Inner Life", was used as a text book. The clergy present requested the Bishop to prepare and print for circulation a leaflet containing Bible readings and meditations for the period from Sexagesima to Easter, and a second leaflet setting forth an order of family prayer. A number of missions have been scheduled for various parts of the Diocese; the Rev. A. N. McEvoy at St. James, Brightmoor; the Rev. George Backhurst, at St. John's Fenton; the Rev. L. P. Hagger, at St. Paul's, St. Clair; the Rev. W. F. Jerome, at Christ Church, Mount Clemens.

"Round-Table Fellowship."

Mr. Ernest E. Piper, Superintendant of the Department of Religious Education for the Diocese of Michigan has planned for round-table fellowships for men and women during the season of Lent. Prof. Howard Y. McClusky of the University of Michigan will give a series of lectures on the "Psychology of Adjustment to Modern Life"; Carl H. Sorensen, a combustion engineer, will have a course in "Science in Modern Life", and Bishop Page will lead a course on the subject of "Inner Life". After-dinner lectures will be given by Dr. A. L. Jacoby, city psychiatrist, Judge James A. Moynahan, of the Circuit Court, and Dr. Lynn Harold Hough, pastor of Central Methodist Episcopal Church. The fellowship is entering on its sixth year. Upwards of four hundred men and women attend.

The seventh annual convention of the House of Churchwomen of the Diocese was held at St. Paul's Cathedral House February 1-2, with one hundred and sixty-seven in attendance. Bishop Gilman, of Hankow, China, was the celebrant at a Corporate Communion, and on the evening of the first day preached at a great missionary service, attended by nearly a thousand Church people from all parts of the Diocese.

The Order of Sir Galahad raised its standard in no uncertain manner in the Middle West when on Sunday evening, February 6, in the presence of a large congregation in St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, Sir Arthur Roehm was crowned King of St. Paul's Cathedral Court. After the processional hymn sung by the large boy choir, many of whom wore over their vestments the regalia of the Order, opening prayers were said and the impressive pageant of the Coronation took place. First came the solemn entry of the Herald, who read his proclamation after sounding the bugle from the chancel steps. Then the long procession of the "Archbishop" and his retinue, and lastly the King-elect and his attendants. The pageant was directed by the Very Rev. Herbert L. Johnson, Dean of the Cathedral, who also took the part of the "Archbishop". Sitting in the front seats were some two hundred boys, all in Scout uniform or in the regalia of other local courts of the Order of Sir Galahad. The preacher was the Ven. Archdeacon Dennen, Supreme Director of the Order. Archdeacon Dennen spent several days in Detroit in the interests of the order, and presided at a meeting of a group of some fifteen men who formed themselves, at his suggestion, into a local Council, to promote the Galahad work. Of this body the chairman is the Very

O Lord, Who for our sake didst fast forty days and forty nights; Give us grace to use such abstinence, that, our flesh being subdued to the Spirit, we may ever obey Thy godly motions in righteousness, and true holiness, to Thy honor and glory, Who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Blurred by the haze,
Hides every sad corrupting touch
Of nature's ways.

CHURCH GENERAL HOSPITAL NOTES.

Women's Department.

The extracts following appear in the "Special War Issue" of the District of Hankow Newsletter, dated October 1926. They give us some insight into the war-time conditions under which our missionaries in China have rendered such heroic service:

The way our doctors and nurses and others of the staff have stuck to the sick and suffering in the Hospital, and other workers at the other compounds where refugee camps have been established, has been beyond all praise. As one of them wrote, "In the face of the possible danger of starvation or violent death in Wuchang, what are a few more years of life on this globe if it comes to that, or a little possible suffering. I believe my people would think I had done right and would be glad I had stuck to my post". A letter from Dr. James, October 1, lets us into something of what our hospital workers in Wuchang have been undergoing.

"It makes my heart ache to see the faces growing thinner and sallower. Yet I still have a hundred patients here. A few of these can go home in a few days, and every one is being made to supply her own food where such is at all possible. The last rice gruel has been given to them today; the little rice left must be saved for the nurses and servants, many of whom are ill largely as a result of undernourishment for the last two or more weeks, plus the kind of food we must now give them.

"We have been kept terribly busy all through September. Our wards have been filled with frightfully wounded women and children, with women giving birth to babies, and with cholera and all manner of disease. Much of the time I have had one hundred and twenty or thirty or even more in-patients. Neither Dr. Tsao nor Dr. Teng have been here to help. The staff, Chinese and foreign, has stood up wonderfully to this stupendous task. The day has now come when we must refuse to admit almost all cases. It is no use to set a fracture if you must watch the patient starve so much that new bones can't form. (Such cases I am now watching and see little use of taking in others unless they can provide their own food.) Yet obstetrical cases will still come and we must help them. So long as we can do anything at all I feel I at least shall stay by my Chinese nurses and my patients. They are starving but it will be even worse for them if deserted, especially in the face of possible looting, etc."

Extracts From Dr. Bliss's Letter.

Wuchang, Oct. 4, 1926.

"The Bishop came yesterday morning, and when we heard that the boats had come, we (Dr. Wakefield and I) tried to take Miss Barr, Miss Ravenel and Miss Steward out. I had obtained the pass for them the day before, and this was the first chance, apparently. The streets near the gate were full of people, refugees trying to get out to take the boat, men, women and children, babies and all. When they saw us going toward the gate they all rushed in after us to get out when the gate was opened for us, so it was a jam. Finally it was so packed that we saw it was quite impossible to get through, as we were still about an eighth of a mile from the gate. So we came back. The crowd followed for a long way, thinking we would go out some secret way. It was very distressing to see the hopeless misery on the faces.

The aeroplanes visited us again yesterday and dropped another bomb close by, on the Court building just next to the Women's Depot. It blew the top off the building, making a hole about thirty feet across, but fortunately the building was not in use, only a few men guarding the building, and they were not hurt. We, Miss Johnson and I, went out to see where it fell, and the guard took us in to look. All the glass in the neighborhood is broken. Another one they dropped landed on a house at the rear and killed several people besides injuring at least nine who came here for treatment. Only one was a soldier. Three P. M. It has been raining this P. M., so there were no more aeroplanes out. There is a lot of looting going on. Dr. James was just over looking for Mr. Souder and said some of the neighbors had come over their wall because they were being looted. Dr. Wake has just concluded he will stay here tonight and not try to go over to Boone. The soldiers are going through the wineshops, so they are getting tuned up tight. I hardly think they will come after us tonight, but you never can tell. If they come there's nothing to do but let 'em. When they are on the rampage, they would just as soon shoot as look at you. The wild beasts at Ephesus have nothing on these in Wuchang.

Dr. Wake went down to the boat again this afternoon to see if he could get the food that Bundy brought over. There was such a crowd outside the gate that Bundy couldn't get the stuff off the boat, so he did the next best thing and left it on one of the hulks in charge of the guard there. It was mid-afternoon before Wake could get to it, and when he got there the cupboard was bare, and so we poor devils got none this time. Doubtless they will try again next trip. This certainly is the life, if you don't weaken. They are even censoring our letters from abroad now, so we may have them stopped at Hankow until things clear up a bit.

October 5, 7:15 A. M. It rained hard during the night, and there was some thunder and lightning. There was almost continuous scattered firing and a good deal more yelling than usual. However, whatever it was, we were not molested. I came down to the gate about six and unlocked and watched people even at that early hour starting off to try to get out the city. One party I saw of about twelve people, including three or four kids. Each one carried a little bundle done up in a cloth—all they hoped to be able to save even if it wasn't all they had. Their clothes were very much patched and faded, but were clean and mended up as well as possible. I hope they may get through but the boats are not large and there are several thousand other poor devils who want to get through the gate which can't be more than twenty feet wide. There will certainly be another jam and more people killed. Wake saw where they had piled up twelve corpses at a side street ready to be taken away. There were likely others. It is most pitiful. And the expressions on the faces of the disappointed is beyond description. I'm going to read a little Mark Twain and give my face a rest.

Literature.

Louis Deschamps.

Literature is the geography of human experience. The mountain tops of joy and idealism are pictured by writers who have felt such experiences, just as the traveler describes the Alps. Other writers give us the deep rumblings of those emotions that resemble the volcano, and suggest the wonders of caverns and subterranean forces. Still others describe the monotony of some lives like the great expanse of plain, stretching in unbroken smoothness as far as the eye can see. There are writers that tell us of the human universe with its firmament of visions, its stars of hope, its infinity of religion. Again, literature is the testimony of all mankind, reverent, and unselfish is just as kind to the existence of nature's laws and forces in mental and spiritual life, just as botany describes such forces in plants. What makes the human being kind, reverent, and unselfish ies just as wonderful as what makes the seed sprout and the plant put out leaves.

Yet literature is unknown to many of us. Especially in this age of materialism and excitement, we cast only a glance at the classics and wonder what part they have in the modern life. Unless we were fortunate enough to have known the teaching of some truly inspiring English professor amid the cultural appeal of a college training, we overlook the contribution of many great minds. Literature is the expression of universal emotions and inspirations that every one dumbly feels, but can not express. There is such speed in work and recreation, that we substitute excitement for pleasure and amusement for thought. Yet we can not escape the longing for a definite expression of those vague thoughts concerning our relationship to the human race in its past, present, and future. Time passes, silently, quickly, relentlessly. We begin to wonder what life means, and the years of selfish money-making explain nothing. Then the thought of those higher, spiritual things comes to us like the answer to a call for help. The great themes of literature are those very thoughts for which we grope. Great men struggled and suffered, expressing in the epic, drama, or story, the truth of their experience and conviction. Literature is, therefore, the companionship of great minds. It gives a background to our every-day life to recall what we have read. Compare the reaction of a person who has read Dickens' works, upon meeting the problems of social welfare and child life, with that of some one who has never known the depth of insight and humane qualities of that great man. It is good to have secured a different outlook, even from the imagination of an author. Victor Hugo wrote a most eloquent appeal for social justice when he gave us "Les Miserables". Call a convict Jean Valjean, and he is seen at once from a different viewpoint. In literature the universal imagination of mankind catches the vision of better and higher things.

We read not only for inspiration, but also for recreation. Romance is simply surrounding an experience with the glamour of a universal appeal, which is the great power of literature. To make a commonplace event interesting, see it in the light of some great narrative of adventure. Having read Stevenson's "Treasure Island", one finds adventure in many forms, easily associated with similar experiences even when not quite as purely romantic.

It is not well to read excessively, thereby losing one's self in an imaginary world of fancy and fiction, because such things are the nectar, not the food of life. What we actually do, and think, and experience—such is our life. But often individual lives are embittered, dwarfed, and made unhappy by a concentration upon the personal woes and misfortunes. Literature teaches a wider, universal outlook, so that we may not judge life by our own experience only, but rejoice in the knowledge that joy, beauty, and happiness do exist. Disillusionment and misfortune are the tests, not the denials of our faith in the worth-while things of life. And literature is not all sentiment, fiction, nor imagination, but the wisdom of human experience as is found in that Book that teaches that man shall not live by bread alone.

Not I, but Christ, be honored, loved, exalted;
Not I, but Christ, be seen, be known, be heard;
Not I, but Christ, in every look and action;
Not I, but Christ, in every thought and word.

A Child's Moral Development Through Nature.

One of our well known educators has said, "If a child lives close enough to nature for the first fourteen years of his life, he will never go astray". It is a broad statement and worthy of consideration.

Not every child who lives in the country lives "close to nature" nor is this living impossible to the city child. All children should have their attention called to the natural wonders that are always within reach in some form or other. In the winter there are frost, snow, ice, the leafless tree and the evergreen. These will give rise to many questions, the answers to which will furnish valuable insight into the workings of nature. Let the child coax to his door with bits of suet and bread the few jolly little birds which dare to stay with us through the cold season; he will feel that he is helping to maintain life and he will be making worth while friends that will thank him with sincerity.

Of course, a little country boy or one who lives in a small town has special opportunities. Winter offers him continuous inspiration and he can always find a place to enjoy himself freely and safely to his heart's content, giving happy and orderly outlet to his superfluous activity. Nevertheless, in most cases, he will need to be taught to see nature and to hear her voice; but it will be easy teaching. Then the great expanses of white purity before him will give him an awed sense of the infinite wonders. The curious tracks in the snow may tempt him to follow a rabbit or a squirrel to its home and thereby learn of its mode of living in winter. The squirrel may be trained to make daily visits to his door, for nuts, if but coaxed the least bit with a sample nut. He may become even more interested in the birds in winter than in summer because of his close relation to them in feeding and caring for them. And perhaps the beautiful, bad blue jay will change his screech of "thief, thief" to a song of the snow and sing "knee deep". The cocoon swaying on the leafless tree can tell the little country boy a story of transforming life going on in the perfect silken cradle. Within doors, if he is ever forced to stay in, there is still something for him to study—icicles on the eaves, ice formations on the window pane, frost on cobwebs in a sheltered corner of the window. At night he may be lulled to slumber by the song of the wind in the chimney and happy and healthy, his activity directed into wholesome, constructive channels, he may sleep the sleep of contentment. Is he not laying a foundation for everything worth while in life?

And the little city boy, since nature does not come to him as abundantly as she does to his country friend, must go in search of new wonders, and the wise mother will see that he does. Tramps in the park through the snow, or in the country at the end of a car line to look for winter birds, a moment's pause in a snowstorm to see the formation of the snowflakes on coat or mittens, the care of plants or bulbs or a canary in the apartment will help to develop in him the love of nature. The acquaintance of the nearest farmer is greatly to be desired, and a Saturday spent on his farm at regular intervals through the winter will mean more to the child than all the moving picture shows in the world.—Elsie F. Kartack.

Psalm Seventeen.

Oh, hold Thou up my goings in Thy paths that my footsteps slip not.

Mrs. Wellington Ogden.

It is so easy to slip, so easy to stumble and fall, dear Lord,
So easy to go astray,
So easy to follow the crowd, dear Lord,
Careless and free and gay.
Oh, hold my hand close in Thine, dear Lord,
As I journey along life's way,
Be Thou a lamp unto my feet, dear Lord,
That I may clearly see,
And though the way lead to Calvary, dear Lord,
I know it leads to Thee.

The Gospel of Comfort.

The sources of joy are many. They are rooted in all of our five senses, and ministered to by countless objects of beauty and harmony in the world without. For them the seven colors of the spectrum blend and change in never-ending variation. For them the seven notes of the octave find expression in untutored nature and in the gifts of skilled musicians. Sight and sound and touch and taste and perfume all open gateways to the home of joy within the mind of man.

But the sources of comfort are few. There are not many ways in which consolation makes its approach to human life. And all men need comfort. Bright as is the world, the very shining of its sun produces shadows, and the stalk that bears roses gives bleeding fingers to him who plucks them. He who never needs comfort must die young. No life continues long without an experience of sorrow.

And when sorrow comes, then comes also the discovery that, while the sources of comfort are not many, they are adequate and precious.

First is the comfort of happy memory. No grief or misfortune can take away the joys that have entered permanently into our character.

Then, in time of need, is found the comfort of work, and of the friendship that remains. There is always some one still who needs us and whom we need. Whatever our losses, we have never yet lost all.

Then we discover the comfort of sympathy. It has been said a thousand, or perhaps a million, times that "mere words" cannot assuage grief, and every time it is said untruthfully. Words that are fitly spoken, out of a sincere heart and a kindred experience, are among the most precious, as they are among the most costly, of all comforts.

"The word we had not sense to speak,
Who knows how grandly it had rung?"

But the basis of all abiding comfort is faith in a loving and fatherly God. For this there can be no substitute, and nothing can take away the strength which it gives. "Lord, show us the Father, and it sufficeth us," said the disciples in the hour of their bewilderment and grief. Faith in a loving God, the God of all comfort, is the basis of all reasonable consolation. And the world needs it all the time.—Youth's Companion.

Good News from God.

Good news, old world, good news;
The river and the winds refuse
To keep the matter still
There's gossip on the hill;
My soul!
The oriole
Is on the knoll!

Good morning, friend of mine, arise!
And hear God singing in the skies.
The fields are wet with dew;
The skies are cloudless, blue;
The dark
Has gone, and hark,
The meadow lark!

Hail, friend and foe! Thrice hail!
I bring you news; a wondrous tale:
The story of a thing sublime
The blossoming of tide and time:
'Tis spring!
The redwing
Blackbirds sing!

Hark! Friends of mine, thrice hark!
You'll hear sweet singing in the dark.
Across the peaceful bay
At closing of the day
When all is still,
His call and trill
The whippoorwill.

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

The Gracious Words of Jesus.

M. L. G.

Even when Jesus was a boy the old doctors of the Law who talked with Him in the Temple wondered at His understanding and answers. And as He grew, in wisdom as in stature, His words became the outlet of thoughts that are beyond our thought. He spoke in the Synagogue, and the people "wondered at the gracious words". Their wonder stirred them not to love, but to envy and malice, and they tried to kill Him. But when He had left His own town of Nazareth, and went through the Galilean countryside, or gathered the neighbors together on the hillside, the common people heard Him gladly.

We could spend a lifetime of study on the "gracious words" that have come down to us in the Gospels, and not know all their meaning. Some day, children, you will study them with increasing interest; and the more you know, the more you will find in them to learn. But now we will think of Jesus' sayings as some child might have thought who followed Him in the way.

How does He speak of Himself? The Good Shepherd, the Light, the Life, the Resurrection, the Way, the Truth, the Bread of Heaven, the Living Water. All we need He is. As our bodies live by His gifts in the natural world, so our spirits live on the gift of His Spirit. Money cannot feed our spirits; power and ambition are too feeble to lift them; but the Best Friend can supply every needfi and give us abundant life.

Now, what does He tell us of ourselves? We are His sheep, whom He knows and calls by name. We are His friends, His brethren, He does not hold us cheap because there are so many. No, He tells us in many ways how great is our value. He tells us that God is our Father, and all men our brothers.

The world has not yet fully taken into its thought and life these words. In the nineteen hundred years since they were spoken, they have not been left behind or outworn. But they are His words, they shall not pass away.

The Suicidal Platypus.

Louis Tucker.

Once upon a time there was a suicidal duck-billed platypus, who lived in a burrow on the right bank of the Hoe River in Van Dieman's Land. He felt suicidal because he had proposed to a Miss Platypus, who lived in another burrow on the other side of the same river, and she refused him; and when he insisted, she would not see him any more. He could not live without her, but, of course, he could not die until he had sadly expressed his sentiments to her; and since she would not see him, the only way was to do it in writing. So he chose a suitable mud-bank and started to write his sentiments on it for her to see; but it was baked too hard and so he had to live and wait for a change in the weather. As soon as it rained, he tried again, but it was too soft and he had to live and wait for sunshine. When it was just right and he had used most of it to express about half his sentiments another rain came up and the Hoe River rose and washed him and his sentiments and the mudbank all down-stream together, and he had to swim very hard indeed to keep from drowning. So when he got to his burrow and rested, he gave up all hopes of expressing his sentiments by writing on a mud bank.

So then he decided to use a log of wood instead and he went upstream to the headwaters of the Hoe River to hunt for a suitable one. It had to be white and it had to be round and it had to be smooth and it had to be just as long as he was; so it took him a year to find one. Then it took him another six months to inscribe his sentiments on it with his claws and toenails. But at last everything was ready, and he swam downstream behind the log and guided it to Miss Platypus' burrow. Then he asked for her. But she was not at home. Her younger sister, who had been so small that he never noticed her when he went away, stuck her head out of the burrow and told him that the Miss Platypus he loved had married a Mr. Platypus and gone to live on the banks of the Spade River in another part of Van Dieman's Land. So the suicidal Platypus asked her how to get to the Spade River, but he could not understand the directions because she mixed them up on purpose for fear he should go there and make trouble. So he went home and went to bed. Next morning he came and asked for the directions again, but again he could not understand them. So he asked her so often and she told him so prettily that at last he did not care to go to the Spade River at all, because it was pleasanter to talk with her. And so he put off committing suicide until after he was dead, and they were married and lived happily ever after.

What Happened to Hilda's Doll.

Hilda was staying with mother at a farmhouse for the summer. Out of all her toys and playthings she decided to take her dear doll Sylvia with her.

"I shall be so busy having a good time," she said to mother, "that I shall not need the others."

Sylvia was a beautiful doll, with a delicate pink and white complexion, which the sun did not seem to hurt, blue eyes and beautiful, long, red-gold curls. Hilda dressed her in rompers and took her with her wherever she went.

She visited the cows and horses, and made pets of them all. Hilda fed the chickens and the geese, and carried the mush and milk to the calves and pigs. She was busy all day long having a good time with her animal friends.

One day she left Sylvia sitting on the grass, leaning up against the low wall that separated the farmyard from the pastures. A little brook ran a few feet away, and some ducks and geese were swimming in it.

"Stay here and watch them, Sylvia," said Hilda; "I am going to get some cookies."

She ran to the house, when mother, who was looking out of the window, called her.

"Come and see a funny sight," she said.

Hilda ran to look. There in front of Sylvia stood an old goose. She was the oldest in the flock and they had kept her because she had always been a pet. The farmer's wife called her "Mother Goose" and often let her eat from her hand.

Now Mother Goose stood looking at Sylvia. Her neck was stretched out, and she was looking at her, turning her head first on one side and then the other. All at once she caught hold of Sylvia's hair and started for the brook. Mother and Hilda ran after her, but they had so far to go that she reached it before they did. Into the brook she went with Sylvia in her beak, but the instant they were in the water Mother Goose dropped her and swam away.

Mother grabbed Sylvia quickly and carried her to the house to dry. In a little while she was all right except her lovely wig, which hung in wisps around her face. Hilda cried, but mother promised she should have a new one just like the other.

"I think Mother Goose thought she was a new kind of duck or goose," she said, "and wanted to swim with her. When she found out in the water that she could not swim, she was so heavy she dropped her."

"I shall never, never leave Sylvia alone a minute again," said Hilda, "until we are safe home away from Mother Goose."—The Lutheran.

A Spring-Time Legend.

"I need the help of some of you trees," declared Mother Nature, hurrying into the forest one winter day of long ago. "I must have some one to watch for Lady Spring and let me know when she is coming, so that I can be at hand to greet her. I'm so busy that I can't spend time to watch for her myself. I'll leave it to you to decide which shall keep the lookout."

Mother Nature started away, then called back over her shoulder: "Remember, I can't be bothered with false alarms. Don't call me until you're certain that Lady Spring is really about to arrive." Without waiting for a word in answer, Mother Nature bustled away.

"You all know what that means, I suppose?" remarked the Maple as soon as Mother Nature had disappeared. "Lady Spring is the most uncertain person in the world. She's as likely as not to go South again after making us think she is coming right away, or she may decide to come extra early and almost without warning. If we watch for her we shall be kept awake half the winter."

"Yes, and think of our poor buds," added the Elms. "They couldn't creep back under the covers again, once they'd peeped out to see if Lady Spring was on her way. They might have to stay out in the cold and storms for a month waiting for her to make up her mind to come."

"I, for one, don't intend to lose my sleep that way," declared one of the Oaks. "I need my full winter's rest if I'm to do my work well next summer."

"So do we," agreed the Maples. "It isn't fair to ask us to work all winter as well as all summer. You Pines are strong enough to stand the strain. Suppose you watch for Lady Spring?"

The Pines tossed their branches indignantly. "We are the kings of the forest," they answered proudly. "It is our place to rule, not to work for others."

One after another the trees made excuses for not doing as Mother Nature had asked, but while the others talked, the Willows said not a word.

"Surely Mother Nature wouldn't have asked us to watch for Lady Spring if the watching would be too great a hardship for us," they thought. "And even if we do find it tiresome, that won't matter if we can be of use to Mother Nature."

So while the other trees fell once more into a deep sleep, the Willows lightly dozed so as to waken at the slightest hint of Lady Spring's approach.

One day the sun shone the beast bit more warmly than before, and out peeped Willow buds to see if Lady Spring were near. No, not yet, for after the sun had set, a biting wind swept down from the North. The poor little Willow buds shivered with the cold, for they couldn't crawl under their covers again. Then they felt a gentle touch as something warm was wrapped around them.

"You're Pussy Willows now," laughed Mother Nature, for it was she, fitting to each little bud a coat of silky fur to keep it snug.

Through days and days of cold weather after that the Pussy Willows watched for Lady Spring, but they didn't mind the cold at all. When at last they saw her coming, with a cloud of birds above her head and her arms full of flowers, quickly they called Mother Nature to welcome her.

Those were busy days for Mother Nature, but she found one precious moment in which to thank the Pussy Willows. "Your reward is love; the love of every boy and girl who lives where Willows grow."—Christian Sun.

Don't.

Don't snub a boy because he wears shabby clothes.

Don't snub a boy because of the ignorance of his parents. Shakespeare, the world's poet, was the son of a man who was unable to write his own name.

Don't snub a boy because his home is plain and unpretentious. Abraham Lincoln's early home was a log cabin.

Don't snub a boy because he chooses a humble trade. The author of "Pilgrim's Progress" was a tinker.

Don't snub a boy because of his physical disability. Milton was blind.

Don't snub a boy because of dullness in his lessons. Hogarth, the celebrated painter and engraver was a stupid boy at books.

Don't snub a boy because he stutters. Demosthenes, the great orator of Greece, overcame a harsh and stammering voice.

Don't snub any one. Not alone because some day he may far outstrip you in the race of life, but because it is neither kind nor right, nor Christian.—The Sentinel.

"Nothing Too Hard for Thee."—Jer. 32:17.

No other can manage my little life,
Nor solve its perplexity;
But Thou art able, oh, Lord my God,
For there's nothing too hard for Thee.

So I leave the thing which might perplex
And the problems which vex me sore,
To the One who guides the stars in their course,
And whose counsels have been of yore.

Molly's Plan.

"When I get big I'm going to be a famous general," said Ted, marching up and down the room in his little soldier suit. "I'll go to war, and help anybody that is in trouble."

"And I'll be a nurse and take care of the wounded soldiers," said Dora, pinning a piece of flannel on her arm to look like the cross worn by a nurse she had seen a few days before.

"I'll be a great doctor and help the sick soldiers, too," said Herbert. "I guess that's about as nice as winning battles. Dr Groves wears a sword, too."

"Children," called mamma from the kitchen, "which one of you will run to the grocery for butter for my cake?"

"You go, Molly," said Ted and Dora together. "You don't mind doing errands."

So the little girl ran off with her basket, and the talk in the sitting-room went back to what the children would be when they grew up. It was a cold, windy day, and they all had to play indoors; so Herbert and Addie had come over to visit their cousins and have a good time together.

Just the week before the children had seen a great parade of soldiers, so their minds were taken up with the swords and uniforms and gold braid.

"Mamma, which one has the best plan?" asked Ted when the cake was finished and they all sat together in the sitting-room. "Addie wants to be a great singer and all the rest of us but Molly are going to war to help people. Molly says she is going to stay at home and help you always, so tell us which has the best plan."

There was a queer little light in Mrs. Kile's eyes as she took the baby on her knee and said: "I think I will let you decide which is best. While I was baking cake I noticed that the Red Cross nurse was too busy to untangle baby's foot when he caught it in the rug, and the famous general never saw the puppy upset him in his rough play. You know this general said he would help any one in trouble when he grew up, so the baby called loudly for aid. The general marched right past without ever noticing him and the doctor stepped on his fingers as the army retreated. After that the famous singer was too busy to sing 'Rock-a-bye' for the baby and he had a hard time generally."

"You left out Molly," said Dora when her mother paused a few moments. "You didn't say anything about her."

"I thought you all knew what Molly did," said Mrs. Kile. "She picked up the poor baby and put medicine on his bruised fingers, she ran some errands, and then had time to sing 'Rock-a-bye' for this little man. You see, she is working at her plan right now."—The Presbyterian of the South.

The Poor Little Toe.

"I'm all tired out," said the mouth with a pout,
"I am all tired out with talk."
"Just wait," said the knee, "till you're as lame as can be,
And then have to walk—walk—walk."
"My work," said the hand, "is the hardest in the land."
"Nay, mine is harder yet," said the brain.
'When you toil," said the eye, "as steadily as I,
Why, then you'll have reason to complain."

Then a voice faint and low of the poor little toe
Spoke out in the dark with a wail,
"It is seldom I complain, but you will bear your pain
With more patience if you harken to my tale.
I'm the youngest of five, and the others live and thrive,
They are cared for and considered and admired,
I am overlooked and snubbed, I am pushed upon and rubbed,
I am always sick and ailing, sore and tired.

"Yet I carry all the weight of the body, small and great,
But no one ever praises what I do.
I am always in the way, and 'tis I who have to pay
For the folly and pride of all of you."
Then the mouth and the brain and the hand said, "'Tis plain
Though troubled be our lives with woe,
The hardest lot of all does certainly befall
The poor little, humble little toe—
The rubbed little, snubbed little toe."
—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

Cancel the Unkind Word.

Some of the older boys and girls have doubtless studied cancellation in school. But there is another kind of cancellation that can be used by boys and girls of all ages. For example, two boys were speaking of another boy:

"He is so slow in games," said one.

"Yes," replied the other, "but he always plays fair."

"He is so stupid in school," said the first boy.

"But he always studied hard," answered the second.

Thus, you see, every unkind word spoken by the first boy was canceled by a kind word from the second. Suppose that the next time we hear an unkind word we try to cancel it by putting a kind one in its place.—Apples of Gold.

It did not take a momentous and conspicuous occasion for Jesus to rise to heights of greatness. He was great anywhere and everywhere. Some of His talks to single, obscure individuals tower incomparably above all the noblest utterances of men, and are still shining with the light of majestic truth after the lapse of more than nineteen centuries. Which of the world's most famous human orations can be mentioned in the same connection with His discourse to the woman of Samaria at Jacob's well?

At the Western Window.

I sit by my western window
  At the passing of the day,
As the evening shadows lengthen,
  And the daylight fades away;
But the hills are draped in purple,
  And the sky is steeped in gold;
For the sun, its crowning glories,
  Keeps till the day is old.

I sit by my western window
  And think of the long ago
When the eastern hills were lighted
  In the morning's rosy glow;
Bright were the hours of morning,
  And brighter the hour of noon,
But better still is the gloaming,
  And the best is coming soon.

I sit by my western window,
  As the white-winged memories throng
Into the silent chancel
  To keep their evensong;
And the hills are all empurpled,
  And the skies are steeped in gold,
For life its crowning mercies
  Keeps till the day is old.

—Rev. Henry Burton, D. D., of England.

To those who teach and to those who preach, I would say: "Give your time to your lesson, and God will take care of the teacher. Keep your mind on your message, and God will take care of the messenger. Forget the crowd and what they think of you. Think of your message and how much they need it. It will do more to remove that shaky sensation and those trembling knees than anything else in the world. Never mind self; deny self; bad self, good self, all self, give your time and strength to what you are doing.—R. W. Neathery.

Per Crucem, Ad Lucem.

Cold hail, and rain; and then the howling wind;
  These but prepare, and cleanse the earth for spring;
  That he, his many flowers in joy may bring,
The very tempests, in their use, are kind.

And so the tears we shed, each deep distress,
  Makes us to turn from earth, to that bright home
  Where age, and loss, and suffering never come;
And He, our Father, waits to greet and bless.

—F. H. Aldhouse, The Church of Ireland Gazette.

Deaths

MISS HARRIET A. DERBY.

Entered into rest Monday, February 21, 1927, at the Union Memorial Hospital, Baltimore, Md., MISS HARRIET A. DERBY, daughter of the late Rev. Charles A. Derby and Charlotte Basset Derby, and step-daughter of the late Rev. Henry L. Derby. She was born in Alabama April 26, 1862. Funeral services were held in St. James Church, Accomac, Wednesday morning and the interment made in Edge Hill Cemetery, Accomac.

MISS BESSIE CARTER.

Entered into Life Eternal Thursday morning, February 10, 1927, at Riverside Infirmary, Charleston, South Carolina, BESSIE CARTER, the beloved daughter of the late Josiah Carter and Isabel Wilson, of The Plains, Va. Funeral service held from Grace Church, The Plains, on Saturday at noon, and funeral at Marshall, Virginia.

"Father in Thy gracious keeping,
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping."

MRS. SOPHIA MADDOX WOOD.

On February 7, 1927, at her home, 2905 Q Street, Washington, D. C., MRS. SOPHIA MADDOX WOOD, beloved wife of John T. Wood entered into life eternal. Mrs. Wood was for thirty years a most devoted and loyal communicant of St. John's Church, Georgetown Parish, Washington, D. C. She was the Choir Mother, Chairman of the Vestments Committee, and teacher in the Church School; but her interest and work entered into every phase of the life of the Parish and of the Church. It was her joy to do the Master's will. She gave unstintingly of her time and thought, but it was the joy and love that went into all her work that made it beautiful; for there was always the consciousness that she served the Lord Christ. All who came within the influence of her radiance, her confident faith, her self-effacement in service were given a glimpse of higher, holier things.

Therefore be it resolved by the Vestry of St. John's Church, Georgetown Parish, that we express our sorrow in the death of this devoted Churchwoman and Christian, and our deepest sympathy to her family; that this resolution be spread upon the minutes of the Vestry, a copy be sent to the Southern Churchman, and a copy be sen to her husband.

REV. JOHN D. KENNEDY.

THE REVEREND JOHN D. KENNEDY, Rector of St. Paul's Church, Montvale, Diocese of Newark, died suddenly on the afternoon of Sunday, February 13th. The funeral service was held in St. Paul's Church on the following Thursday afternoon.

The Right Reverend Wilson R. Stearly, D. D., Bishop Coadjutor of Newark, appointed a Committee to draw up a suitable Resolution, and send the same to the Church Papers.

The Resolution.

In the death of the Reverend John D. Kennedy, Priest, his Church, the community, the Diocese and the American Church have suffered a loss. His genial presence, ripe scholarship, pulpit eloquence, genuine interest in all community concerns, and unceasing devotion to the welfare of his Parish, won for our Brother the esteem of all; and for his ministry a well-deserved success.

Therefore be it

Resolved, That we place on record our sense of loss; and our gratitude to Almighty God for the gift of His servant's life of faithful Ministry; and that we also express to the members of his family, and to St. Paul's Church, Montvale, our sincere sympathy with them in their bereavement.

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE

Rev. H. L. Johnson and the secretary Mr. W. J. French, St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit.

Washington's birthday was made the occasion of special services at St. Paul's Cathedral Sunday February 20, and a demonstration in behalf of national defence. Military and patriotic organizations attended Evensong in the Cathedral where the preacher was Dean Herbert L. Johnson. It was necessary to conduct over-flow meetings in the auditorium of the Cathedral House and also in the adjacent assembly hall of the Knights' of Columbus.

The Fourth anniversary of the death of the late Bishop Charles D. Williams was marked in Detroit by special services at St. Paul's Cathedral and St. Andrew's Church. Bishop Paul Jones preached at St. Paul's Cathedral Sunday evening, February 13th, and addressed a memorial luncheon gathered at the Wolverine Hotel on Monday, and in the evening spoke at the service of commemoration which was held in St. Andrew's Church.

The Social Service Department of the Diocese of Michigan has organized a course of lectures for volunteers in social service under the direction of Mr. R. T. Lansdale, Director of the Department of Sociology, University of Michigan.

MoE.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Called to Montreal.

The Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., rector of Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, has received a unanimous call to become rector of St. George's Church, Montreal, Can. St. George's Church is the outstanding church of the Church of England in Canada. It has had a succession of illustrious men as its rectors, all the rectors heretofore having been secured from England and Ireland. The last rector of St. George's was the internationally known Archdeacon Patterson Smyth, who accepted the rectorship when Professor of Pastoral Theology at Trinity College, Dublin. Dr. Patterson Smyth is one of the best-known authors in the Anglican Communion. Dr. Patterson Smyth has recently resigned on account of advancing years and failing health.

Montreal is now a city of over a million people, and the opportunities in the Church life there are tremendous.

Dr. Abbott has been rector of Grace and St. Peter's Church since June, 1919, approximately eight years. The church has flourished under his leadership, and the congregation has quadrupled in numbers. Two hundred and forty thousand dollars have been expended in new buildings, and the revenue for seven and a half years has totaled seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Dr. Abbott has the matter under serious consideration.

A "Surprise Testimonial".

On Thursday evening, February 24, the Rev. George F. Bragg, Jr., D. D., rector of St. James' Church, Baltimore, experienced a "surprise testimonial". A vestryman of the church called and conveyed Dr. and Mrs. Bragg to the church, where the Woman's Auxiliary of the Maryland Home, Orphanage and School, had planned an entertainment in his honor. There was a "banquet", literary and musical program, and short addresses by the guests present, among whom were the Rt. Rev. Dr. John Gardener Murray, Bishop-Coadjutor Helfenstein, Archdeacon Humphries, the Rev. Dr. William Page Dame and Mr. E. Allen Lycett. A check for one hundred dollars was presented Dr. Bragg and ten dollars in gold given Mrs. Bragg. The entire affair was a complete surprise to them.

Mrs. Annie S. Williams, a member of the Episcopal Church, is the president of this organization of colored women (including many of other religious bodies) which renders valuable aid to the Board of Managers. The institution is a Diocesan affair, Dr. Dame being Chairman of the board; Dr. Bragg, Vice-Chairman and Chaplain; Mr. Bolling W. Barton, Secretary, and Mr. E. Allen Lycett, Treasurer. The institution was organized by Rev. Dr. Bragg twenty-seven years ago, and it has resulted in creating a favorable atmosphere on behalf of the Church among the colored race. The Baltimore Parental School is connected with this institution, and recently at a Sunday afternoon service in the chapel, Dr. Bragg baptized thirty-one boys.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D. Bishop.

St. Stephen's, Harrisburg.

On the fifth Sunday after the Epiphany the Rev. Oscar F. R. Treder, D. D., rector of St. Stephen's, Harrisburg, dedicated the new front entrance to the church, which consists of an inner and outer door, adding much to the beauty of the edifice. Extensive repairs are being made to the rectory and the grounds surrounding the same. Recently there was dedicated an organ stop installed in the choir room as part of the main organ, a gift of Mrs. William A. Hildrup, in memory of her husband.

A. A. H.

Even Christ's ministers, who are surely set to be the heralds of Hope, forget sometimes that theirs is the special duty of keeping the world in heart. The Bible is a Book of Hope. The Old Testament was inspired by it, shaped by it from beginning to end. And is the New Testament of the Eternal Gospel less hopeful than the Old? The symbol of our religion is not a cross, but an empty grave, for it was born with unconquerable life when death seemed to have won final victory.—B. J. Snell.

Personal Notes

The Rev. S. H. Littell, of the Hankow Mission, will travel until April 1, and should be addressed care Thomas Cook & Sons, Genoa, Italy; then until further notice, Thomas Cook & Sons, Paris, France.

The Ven. James G. Glass, Archdeacon of South Florida, has accepted temporary charge of services at St. Peter's Parish, St. Petersburg, Fla., from January 1 until a permanent rector is called.

The Rev. Wilbur F. Wheeler has entered upon his work as curate of St. Andrew's Church, Baltimore, Md. His address is 1716 North Broadway.

The Rev. A. J. Gaynor Banks, director of the Society of the Nazarene, has accepted work as mission preacher of Washington Cathedral. Mr. Banks continues his work with the Society of the Nazarene at his address at Mountain Lakes, N. J.

The Rev. George T. Lascelles, formerly curate of St. Agnes' Chapel, New York, has entered upon his duties as rector of St. John's Church, Oneida, N. Y.

The Rev. Francis R. Nitchie, formerly assistant at St. Luke's Church, Evanston, Ill., entered upon his work as rector of Christ Church, Chicago, Ill.

The Rev. H. F. W. Lightfoot, formerly priest in charge of St. Stephen's Mission, Delawanna, N. J., is now curate at St. Agnes' Chapel, Trinity Parish, New York.

The Rev. Frederic S. Fleming, D. D., rector of the Church of the Atonement, Chicago, has accepted a call to become rector of St. Stephen's Church, Providence, R. I., in succession to the late Rev. Dr. Frederick S. Penfold. He expects to take charge about May 1.

The Rev. Phillips S. Gilman, M. A., for the past five years and a half rector of St. Ann's Church, Nashville, Tennessee, has resigned that work to become Dean of St. Luke's Cathedral, Orlando, Florida. He will enter upon his new duties March 15.

Ordinations.

In St. John's Church, Pittsburgh, the Rev. Rodney Brace, rector, on the Fourth Sunday after Epiphany, January 30, the Rev. Arthur K. Fenton was advanced to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Alexander Mann, D. D., Bishop of Pittsburgh. The preacher was the Very Rev. George G. Bartlett, D. D., Dean of the Philadelphia Divinity School, and the candidate was presented by Mr. Bruce. Others who assisted in the service were the Rev. Homer A. Flint, Ph. D., Executive Secretary of the Diocese, and the Rev. L. N. Tucker, Ph. D., rector of St. James' Church, Pittsburgh. Mr. Fenton will continue his duties as assistant at St. John's Church, with charge also of Trinity Mission, Sharpsburg.

In St. Thomas' Church, Wharton, Texas, on Wednesday morning, February 9, the Rt. Rev. Clinton Simon Quin, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Texas, ordained to the priesthood the Rev. E. Dargan Butt. The Litany was read by the Rev. T. J. Windham, of Christ Church, Houston; the Epistle was read by Archdeacon John Sloan, and the Gospel by the Rev. F. M. Johnson, Jr., of Christ Church, Eagle Lake. The candidate was presented by his uncle, the Rev. James T. McCaa, of the Diocese of West Texas, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Francis M. Osborne, student pastor at Rice Institute, Houston, and former chaplain at the University of the South, where Mr. Butt did his theological work. The Rev. Frank A. Rhea acted as chaplain to the Bishop.

The Rev. Mr. Butt continues in charge of St. Thomas' Church, Wharton, and Calvary Church, Richmond.

Deaths.

The Rev. George Sherman Keller, S. T. B., rector of Trinity Church, Highland Park, Ill., died suddenly February 17, aged forty-six years. Interment was in St. David's Churchyard, Radnor, Pa.

The Rev. LeRoy Eltringham, rector of Christ Church, Stroudsburg, Pa., dropped dead on the walk of his church while he was assisting several men of his parish in removing the snow. He was about thirty-five years old. Funeral services were conducted at St. John's Church, Ashland, Pa., on Thursday afternoon, February 24, by the Rev. Walter Archbold, D. D., rector in charge.

After graduating from Lehigh, Mr. Eltringham was graduated from the General Theological Seminary in New York City. He was ordained to the ministry by Bishop Ethelbert Talbot, later serving as vicar of St. James' Church, Schuylkill Haven; assistant rector of Trinity Church, Pottsville. He served for a time as rector of St. Stephen's Church at Catasauqua, then became assistant chaplain at St. Paul's Church, Rochester, N. Y. He was assistant chaplain at League Island Navy Yard, Philadelphia, and served as a member of the Draft Board of Northampton County during the World War. He was curate at Nativity Church, Bethlehem, for a year, and left about a year ago to assume the rectorship at Stroudsburg.

Elliot C. Mitchell, one of the two lay evangelists conducting a mission early in February at St. John's Church, Passaic, N. J., died shortly after reaching Passaic, at 120 Paulison Avenue, where he was staying with Ted Mercer, the other evangelist.

Mr. Mitchell was a grand-nephew of President Tyler. He was a graduate of St. Paul's and a special student at Harvard.

Elbridge T. Gerry, distinguished Churchman and citizen of New York, very active in affairs of Church and State up to a few years ago, died at his home on Friday, February 18, at the age of eighty-nine years.

Commodore Gerry had been especially active in work on behalf of children. From 1876 to 1901 he was vice-president of the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. This interest also was extended to dumb animals, and for many years he served as vice-president of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. As a Churchman, he took a leading part in many philanthropies, was for some years a trustee of the General Theological Seminary, and being a man of large wealth, was able to befriend many of the institutions of the Church.

DOMINUS FRUSTRA NISI 1835

Vol. 92. RICHMOND, VA., MARCH 12, 1927. No. 11.

LEAD me, yea, lead me deeper into life,
This suffering, human life wherein Thou liv'st
And breathest still, and holdest Thy way divine.
'Tis here, O pitying Christ, where Thee I seek,
Here where the strife is fiercest; where the sun
Beats down upon the highway thronged with men,
And in the raging mart, O, deeper lead
My soul into the living world of souls
Where Thou dost move.

He walked with God. Where'er he went abroad,
Hate changed to love, wrath melted into calm,
And every wounded heart received its balm,
Nor knew from what celestial fountain poured
The healing flood, nor recognized the Lord.
He walked with God. Ill lost its power to harm
As he passed by, and evil ceased to charm;
To purblind eyes was light again restored.
He walked with God. His was the common lot
Of joy and pain wherein full life is found;
Yet Peace was his, and Love that faileth not
Shone in his face, diffusing light around.
He walked with God, all trivial cares forgot;
And lo! where'er he trod was holy ground.

—Selected.

We know what is possible for us; awakened, reconciled, at work, striving to give our work the quality of perseverance, enthusiasm, and thoroughness. Yet we know, the best of us knows most bitterly, how day after day we fail at what we might be, and miss our opportunities of doing what we might do, because we fail of correspondence, because in the inner heart of us our spirit is not abiding where it might abide in the fellowship of God.—Charles Gore.

"Lay down thy burden with thy robe, O friend,
And slip into thy bed as in the arms
Of One who sendeth both the pain and cheer.
Draw up the covers as thou drawest o'er
Thy many sins the loving mercy of the Lord,
And lay thee down to rest and sweet content.
When thou awakest then I pray thee wash
Thy heart of sin, and clothe thy soul with peace
In charity, in purity of mind.
So hide thy grief behind a smiling face,
And journey forth a blessing to the world."

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Be not envious; envy makes moral progress impossible.

You can only prove the worth of Christianity by practicing it.

Great services reveal our possibilities, small services reveal our consecration.

All the world is an orphanage so long as its children know not God their Father.

Perfect freedom is not liberty to do as we please, but liberty for God to do as He pleases in us.

The man who will not execute his resolutions when they are fresh upon him can have no hope from them afterwards.

Mind, it is our best work that He wants, not the dregs of our exhaustion. I think He must prefer quality to quantity.—George Macdonald.

If people were just as anxious to find out what God has revealed as they are to find out the things He has not revealed the Bible would not long remain "the unknown book".—Wm. D. Nowlin.

Are we as fully yielded to the Holy Spirit for the ministry of prayer as the Lord requires us to be? Are others suffering because we have failed to minister to them the blessings God gave us for them?—A. B. Simpson.

Man's journey is a long and hard one. Clouds and darkness are round about us. Let art and science and government do their utmost. Still the last word, the word of hope, of strength, of courage, that struggling, battling man must hear will be the word or faith.

Some of the maxims of the ungodly are very good when they are properly interpreted. "Take care of number one." Who is number one? The ungodly man says, "I am number one". But God is number one. Take care of God's interests first and He will look after yours.—J. Hudson Taylor.

Our effectiveness depends upon our continued self-control. Carelessness in living and indulgence in pleasure lessen energy and self-mastery. Slipping down hill, once begun continues and becomes faster. If we look upon evil and wish for it, it grows upon us until we are swept off our feet.—J. H. Mills.

PASSING EVENTS

A LENTEN SERVICE IN THE DAILY NEWSPAPER IS AN INNOVATION that marks a tremendous triumph for religion. "The Fellowship of Prayer", prepared by the Rev. Charles Emerson Burton, D. D., under the auspices of the Federal Council of Churches, for each day of Lent, consisting of a "Topic Scripture Reading", "Meditation", "Hymn" and "Prayer", carries a Lenten message into thousands of homes and business places into which the sermon from the pulpit, and the prayers from the chancel never reach. Some people may fear that this homeopathic administration of religion will curtail Church attendance, that persons will salve their consciences by reading the "Fellowship of Prayer" in three or four minutes, and feel relieved of the obligation to attend the Lenten services. But we think more of religion than that, and believe it to be such a big, glorious and joyous thing that the more one gets of it, the more one wants, and that so far from diminishing Church attendance this helpful column will increase it. Furthermore, it is certainly encouraging that the daily press should recognize the Christian season of Lent, and should feel that a prayer, a Hymn and a Bible text, constitutes a feature that their readers want. Surely the conquest of the world by spiritual forces is drawing nearer day by day.

MEXICAN EMBASSADOR LEAVES WASHINGTON," so runs the headline. Below the dispatch says that it does not mean a break in our diplomatic relations. We trust not, but it should be the duty of all Christian people to be certain that it does not. Congress adopted a resolution calling for arbitration of all matters in dispute between Mexico and the United States without a dissenting vote, but Congress has now adjourned, and the attitude of the Administration was anything but pleasant towards our neighboring Republic. There are many ways in which Peace sentiment can be made known to the President and Secretary of State, some of which are by letter writing, resolutions of Church organizations, and if necessary, mass meetings. There is no object more worthy of the combined efforts of a united Christendom than a concerted drive to out-law war. Events, too, are transpiring that are immensely encouraging to those who hope and pray for the attainment of this great end. Mr. Arthur Ponsondy, member of the British Parliament, is at present touring this country in behalf of the campaign for arbitration. One hundred and twenty thousand signatures have been secured in England to a pledge declaring that the signers will not support their Government if it goes to war without first offering to submit its disputes to arbitration. It is hoped to secure the signatures of at least a million people in England to this pledge, and efforts are being made to start similar movements in other European countries.

While Mr. Ponsondy was speaking to a large audience in Chicago he was asked for his opinion of, and the probable re-action in Great Britain to Senator Borah's resolution to out-law war. He gave it his own personal and unqualified approval, and also promised that if he could know in advance when Senator Borah would bring up his resolution for debate, he would introduce a similar resolution in the British House of Commons. It would indeed be a startling thing if such a plan were to be advocated at the same time in two great law-making bodies of the English-speaking peoples.

AN ERRONEOUS IMPRESSION MAY HAVE BEEN CREATED by our editorial comment upon a recent lawsuit in Christ Church, Norfolk, the subject of dispute being a statue of the Virgin Mary. We are informed that no question of Churchmanship was involved in this controversy, and that the rector was given permission by the vestry to place this statue anywhere else in the church that he wished to, except in the Memorial Chapel, where he had placed it. This memorial was given upon the express condition that no changes should be made in the statuary.

THOUSAND DOLLARS A DAY sounds like pretty good wages, but it had no attraction for Sergeant Alvin C. York, although offered to him by a reliable person, because it involved the exploitation on the stage of his fine qualities of courage. Instead of accepting the thousand-dollar-a-day offer of a theatre manager, Sergeant York steadily set himself to accomplish the purpose he had had in mind before going into the war. He gave up all that he might have gained on the stage in order to help to lessen the illiteracy and ignorance prevalent in the southern mountain districts from which he came. Today the Alvin C. York Industrial Institute, a vocational high school for mountain youth, has just been opened in Eastern Tennessee, and will go far to secure the result dear to his heart. During the Lenten season, when we are thinking of temptations and overcoming them, and the great example set us by our Saviour, it is sometimes helpful to think also of a contemporary case, and in doing so it is difficult to find a finer example of resistance of financial temptation than that of this young war hero of the Tennessee mountains.

BIBLE READING BY MANDATE OF LAW is not a form of religion that appeals to us. We believe that Scriptural instruction should be voluntary, rather than compulsory, and that unless a sentiment in its favor can be created it accomplishes little good. Nevertheless, it is interesting to note that in recent years quite a number of States have enacted laws requiring daily Bible reading in the public schools, and that a good many more State courts have decided that the Bible is a non-sectarian Book, which makes it constitutional and frees it from coming under the head of State support for any one religion. As literature, we believe it should be studied in every school in the country, for it is filled with literary master pieces. St. Luke's Gospel, in the New Testament, and the Book of Job, in the Old Testament, are outstanding examples of its literary merit.

EDUCATION THROUGH THE EYE has been used for some time in the schools. Churches have been rather slow in availing themselves of this new method of instruction, but plans are going forward by the Harmon Foundation to provide a wider use of this modern invention in Churches.

Distribution of the films of the Religious Motion Picture Foundation, carried on over a small territory during the last three months, has proved so satisfactory that it is now contemplated to put it on a national basis.

Sections of New York State, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Ohio and Illinois have been reached through the Neighborhood Motion Picture Service, and distribution from Chicago has been conducted through the Motion Picture Department of the Y. M. C. A. Demands for bookings are increasing and it is evident that there is a country-wide desire for the religious film which can become as much a part of the formal service of worship as the fine anthem or other artistic and inspirational adjuncts.

The pictures are one and two reel lengths, based on Biblical narratives, their titles being: "Christ Confounds His Critics," "The Unwelcome Guest," "Forgive Us Our Debts," and "The Rich Young Ruler." Production which has been carried on in Chatham, N. J., under the direction of Major Herbert M. Dawley, was suspended in September when these first films were completed.

The initial showing was held at Rutgers Presbyterian Church in New York, when the pastor, Dr. Daniel Russell and Dean Howard C. Robbins, of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, both used the films to illustrate their sermons. The following week one of the Foundation's productions was shown at the church of Dr. S. Parkes Cadman in Brooklyn.

An illustrated booklet containing a resume of each film has been published by the Religious Motion Pictures Foundation and may be obtained by request sent to the office at 140 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y.

STANDING BY THE BIBLE AT NINETY-THREE

Our attention has been called to the comment of Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, made upon the statement from Thomas A. Edison concerning the latter's religious doubts. According to the published reports:

The venerable former Senator, Chauncey M. Depew, of New York, gave to that youngster of eighty, Thomas A. Edison, a gentle rebuke today, because Mr. Edison ventured to assert that the word God has no meaning for him.

Speaking in his private car, in which he is en route to St. Augustine, Fla., Mr. Depew said:

"Regardless of what Mr. Edison, a mere boy of eighty, may say, I state that from my experience of ninety-three years I am more firmly anchored to the Bible than ever before and believe implicitly in its teachings and the God it portrays."

Mr. Depew said that all of his life he had been surrounded by people who were anchored to the Bible and found a great deal of joy and happiness in their belief. Declaring that such expressions as that of Mr. Edison were the exception, he said:

"Ninety-five per cent of the people generally are on good terms with the Lord, and that percentage of any body of people can always be relied upon as being right.

I have always felt a real dependence upon God; my idea of God is personal, rather than one of force, not a personality such as we are, of course, but a glorified, divine and infinite heart, brain and spirit, all-comprehending, all-powerful, never-failing.

I think of God as being interested in mortals and mortal affairs. Christ was His earthly manifestation, Christ, Who understood, lived, toiled, and suffered on earth as men and women do; Christ, Who died, as we must die, before we live again. Christ is God's pledge of love and understanding. I don't believe much in chance; you have to make things come your way, and they will come your way if you will follow the rules of moderation, of no worrying, of diversifying your interests, of trusting God, and loving your fellow-beings.

When I look back seventy-five years to the time when I first started out, and consider the conditions then and now, I can only see a wonderful advancement along all lines. People are better now than then. They are healthier, happier, and get more out of life. They understand the Word of God more, and live closer to Him generally."

In these simple words Mr. Depew expresses a faith that must be increasingly comforting as one advances through the years, and draws nearer to that doorway through which we must all pass as we leave behind us the temporary habitation of flesh and bones in which the immortal soul has tabernacled here on earth, and step forth on the endless pathways of eternity.

CLERGY FOR THIS WEEK

THE REVEREND CHARLES AYLETT ASHBY was born in Culpeper, Virginia, and graduated in Law at the University of Richmond (then The Richmond College). After practicing law successfully in Newport News for thirteen years, he entered the ministry, and took theological training at the Seminary at Alexandria. His first parish was Amherst, Virginia, and from there he started to the South, serving two parishes in North Carolina. From the Church of the Good Shepherd, Raleigh, he accepted the call to the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville, Fla., where he still is. Mr. Ashby represented the Diocese of North Carolina in the General Conventions of 1916 and 1919. His present parish is one of the most progressive in the country, having had the vision to make a great outlay for its Sunday-school and community work before building a church. The parish has been content to worship in its Sunday-school building for nearly ten years in order to create a congregation that could support the kind of church they wanted. Plans have now been accepted for a magnificent church, which will probably be finished during the next year or so, and will be a credit to the city and the wisdom and perseverance of the congregation when complete.

THE REVEREND ERNEST JOSEPH DENNEN was born in Naugatuck, Connecticut. He did his college work at the University of Michigan, but came East again to study for the ministry, and graduated at the Theological School, Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1896. After serving various churches in Rhode Island and Massachusetts, he became Superintendent of City Missions of Boston in 1914, being appointed Archdeacon by Bishop Lawrence in that year. He has since rendered efficient service in this capacity up to the present time. Boys' work has appealed to him, and he founded the Order of Sir Galahad, of which he has been Supreme Director. He has also been deeply interested in Sunday-school work, and is the author of "The Sunday School Under Scientific Management", and a manual for leaders.

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

B R O T H E R H O O D

By the Reverend C. A. Ashby.

"Ye are all brethren."—Matt. 23:8.

THE New Testament asserts that Jesus came into our world just as soon as He could do so. "In the fullness of time" is the way it is spoken of. As it was, He was crucified by Gentile and Jew after about two years and a half of labor. He would not have been spared this long by any other people except the Jews. Some one has said that He would be crucified or disposed of within six months in any of our cities. I do not know whether this is true or not. Certainly, the Gentiles cannot throw any stones at the Jews in this matter. Jesus said, "Salvation is of the Jews". Why was Christ unpopular with the leaders of His day? Was it not due very largely to His insistence upon the thought expressed in our text, "Ye are all brethren"? Christ asserted of all people on this globe, there is a race connection—a unity of the race.

The violation of this assertion has brought untold misery to us. We continue to violate it. We are not ready to adopt it—by how many centuries we cannot say. But what Lord Grey said of a League of Nations, is true of this matter of race unity, "We must learn or perish".

We have passed through war and pestilence. The earth has been red with the blood of the slain in battle and receives into its gentle bosom the bodies of those borne away by disease. War is not good in itself. Mankind never will believe that it is, in spite of its many champions. It indicates that some one has blundered, and may, at tremendous cost, lead to greater concern.

But let us look at this pestilence for a few moments. It may serve to bring out what Jesus meant in this text. A pestilence is not good in itself. But it bares to us certain facts. Ask any sensible physician how any plague came about. He will tell you that somewhere on the face of the earth there are people who are living in filth, rags and exhaustion, and that from them has come this thing. He will tell you that the wretchedness of the wretched is speaking to you. That a blind giant has been raised up by foul conditions. By conditions we permit to exist.

We ask how can there be a God and He permit such things to come upon us? Let us look at it. Christ said, "Ye are all brethren". Those emaciated fellows over in China; the pariahs over in Japan; the peons down in Mexico; the beggars over in India and Italy and Spain; the outcasts and poor in England, and America, and your county—wherever living conditions cause men's vitality to run low—you are tied to them. And listen, these same people are going to kill your wife and your child and your friend, until you see that they have a wholesome, healthy, self-respecting manner of life. You may rail against it. You may charge God with unfairness just as much as you please, but He is going to work the thing that way, as I understand it.

It may seem to us that we could run the earth very much better; that we would not permit the foul and sunken condition of one people to reach another people, or the poverty of one part of a city to smite the other part of it. But God cares for the backward, the weak and the poor, and has decreed that they shall not be mistreated. A blasting reminder comes along and teaches us something about it.

As long as the sensibilities of a people prefer sickness and dissipation and luxuries and self to that which accompanies an extended good will towards all mankind, men, women and children must suffer—and, I believe, ought to suffer. As long as we seek to make charity a permanent remedy for these conditions we can never bestow a hearty nature upon its recipients. At times it is the only way out, and then it should be real self-sacrifice. Not that self-indulgent spirit, satirized by Horace: "Take these things home to your children, and if you do not, I shall give them to the pigs."

A pestilence is not good in itself, but it makes plain the cancer of selfishness. We complacent people who rail at God, and especially those of us who never gave a day or a dime to make this a better world; We, who grind the faces of the poor; we, who take in most imperfectly these words of President Wilson, "The interest of the weakest is as sacred as the interest of the strongest",—God it seems is not going to put up with us. He is going to make us care whether the people in the Near East, China, any backward folks, starve. He demands that we clean up this old ship earth. "Ye are all brethren."

Now let us look at this. In our time a great nation is paying the penalty of national ignorance. We thought the ignorance was all right, or, at least, we acted as if we did. What difference could it make? A few over there fenced off what they called "the vulgar herd", and let this herd seek pasture in poverty and ignorance. "Why, this vulgar herd would spoil our refinements if we let them in." And they have spoiled "our refinements". But not exactly as the selfish and seclusive contemplated. They have spoiled things by anarchy, by disease, by deadly passion and hatred against all society by the natural and inevitable rebound, against selfishness.

And selfishness has failed. Our present state proves that to any one who will see. We must try to get out of it. Edith Cavell, that brave English nurse, killed by brutish men, said that she saw that patriotism was not enough. This greater thing, is race unity. With all of the woes that such a unity brings to us as the penalty of our selfishness, it is still a blessed fact. It is a stimulus to public and private virtue. It gives significance to society. To learn that common joys, common sorrows, common tribulations, common progress must be our lot. "No man liveth to himself." "Ye are all brethren." Every advance we have made has been rooted in faith and hope and love. Every pestilence, every vice, every war, is rooted in their opposites

It seems a pity that so many of the brave and good have gone in distressing times. They laid down their lives as a protest against the society, the world, we condemn them to be born into. This is a world of infinite complication and involvement. No one can extricate himself from the common lot or shake off its burdens. No one would believe that I charge these fine souls with selfishness. I know better. But I do say, that the common will of mankind, has been unconvinced by Christ that "ye are all brethren", in spite of the terrible retribution which the violation of that principle has brought. God, as I understand it, is not going to put up with any super-men or super-nations. "One is your Master, even Christ."

You may say that this is nothing but missions. I will not object. It is very largely what I understand missions to be. It has been a ten-cent affair. We said we were too poor ourselves for extended good. The war has proven that we did not speak the truth. We had the money. All we need is the inclination and wise guidance. We can make this "a new earth".

If you object to the name "missions", why call it something else. How about "Panhumanism"? This is what a distinguished writer called it. Romain Rolland, the author of "Jean Christophe", in an article which I recently saw, translated from a French paper, puts it in this fashion, "The dike is shaken. The boundary lines of a privileged civilization are henceforth broken down. Today we must accept humanism in its full meaning, embracing all the spiritual forces of the entire world. 'Panhumanism'."

But the name is immaterial—the substance is the thing. Let us take to ourselves this statement of Christ's, "Ye are all brethren".

THE BOY AND HIS CHURCH

PLAY IN THE LIFE OF THE CHURCH

By the Reverend Ernest J. Dennen

A GROUP of boys at their games is a group of boys learning how to live. Man, it is said, is a "play-built" animal. He develops because he plays. Games are his ready teachers, and under such teachers he has no complaint to make. He offers no protest. He plays, and the result is sure. Boyhood moves quickly into manhood. Play helps to bring about the change.

Joseph Lee, the great expert on play, states that the boy at his blocks becomes man, the builder; the boy collecting and classifying becomes man, the scientist; the boy at his games oashrdashrd shrd cmfw yvb gkqjpajpjp boy at his games of chase becomes man, the hunter; the

In play activity the Church is beginning to take a real interest. It was not always so. Many a boy has lost his rating in the Church because the Church did not understand his play impulse when he seemed bent on "cutting-up". But now the Church is looking up a bit, and getting a new view of the boy and the boy consequently is getting a new view of the Church. Church and boy are drawing closer together.

This is seen especially in what may be called the club movement in the Church. This movement did not begin with the Scouts, but it took a long stride forward when that outstanding organization was transplanted from English to American soil in 1910. Never an organization exclusively for Church boys, it has, however, worked in happy fellowship with churches of every name in its eagerness to carry out its one great aim—namely, that of making boys good citizens.

The Scouts have shown great wisdom, not only in grafting into a program every interest natural to a boy, but also in building up a strong organization able to carry out a varied and appealing program with great care and success, whether through community or Church units.

In the Episcopal Church thousands of boys have found a new interest in the Church because of Scout work. Clergy and young laymen have given plentifully of their time as Scout Masters and Patrol Leaders. Churches have opened their doors and generous parishioners their purses to promote the movement that has gained the support of an increasing number of friends. This interest shown by clergy, laymen, and congregations has had two fine results: first, in helping boys to see that the Church is interested in boys as boys, thus making the boy feel a new and real interest in the Church; second, in helping the Church to see that boys are worth-while as boys, and that every cent spent to gain and hold boys under the building influences of the Church is well spent.

The Scouts have taken the lead in a program to make boys better citizens; in putting their plan over they have joined hands with the Church. So far, so good. But is it not possible to go farther? Why not help boys to become good Churchmen and good Christians? That is exactly what is happening by means of another organization known as The Order of Sir Galahad—a Church club for boys in the Episcopal Church.

Galahad is an ideal. This chivalrous youth holds up to boys the lofty ideals that strike and tell. The Abbey version of the Grail legend pictures Galahad a child with hands uplifted toward the Holy Grail, held by the angel—"UPREACH". Again, Galahad is shown taking upon himself the vows of knighthood, after an all night vigil—"PREPARATION". Once again he is seen, led by an aged man in white, toward King Arthur in the Hall of Conclave. Amidst strange sights and sounds he advances to the seat in which none may sit and live save the pure and spotless knight. Breathless, all in the Hall of Conclave wait and wonder. Steadily Galahad moves forward and seats himself in the Siege Perilous, as it was called. No harm befalls him—he is the spotless knight, pure beyond reproach—"ACHIEVEMENT".

These three ideals with others are woven, a golden thread, into the pattern of a boys' club that reaches and interests boys from nine to twenty-one, arranged in five groups or degrees, each with its own vow, prayer, ritual, initiation, pin, regalia and banner. For the same reason that men are interested in their lodges, outside of the Church, boys are interested in The Order of Sir Galahad within the Church, for it is like a lodge, only it is for boys and it is fostered by the Church.

To start a unit of this Order in a parish, application is made to headquarters for a charter. The charter, a beautiful document, is issued and the unit is under way, starting either with older or younger boys. The first initiates are admitted to the Order by the rector and his lay assistants. Then in turn these boys initiate others, and the unit, or court, as it is called, is a reality.

Once formed, a program is mapped out that does for the boy in the Church what the Scouts do for the boys outside. It interests him with its play and other features. From nine to twelve he is held by one type of program, from twelve to fifteen by another, from fifteen to eighteen by another, and from eighteen to twenty-one by still another. Through such a graded program the boy advances in the club as he advances in school. Just as in school one set of books gives away to another and a higher, as a pupil passes from one grade to another, so in The Order of Sir Galahad, one set of interests gives way to another, as members go up step by step from one degree to another degree.

Provision is made for every play interest ranging from the fun of initiation, through Scout and other programs, even including a summer camp. The pioneer and National Galahad Camp is Camp O-At-Ka on Sebago Lake, Maine. Here each year boys from many parishes assemble to enjoy true camp life carefully planned and well directed by expert counselors, familiar with swimming, canoeing, lifesaving, baseball, tennis, track, hiking, mountain climbing, and all other pursuits that enter into a complete camp program.

A unit of The Order of Sir Galahad in any parish can deal and does deal with the total boyhood and young manhood of the parish, for it includes all. Boys drawn into a unit are drawn farther into the Church that promotes the unit. Then the Church is accepted as a companion in the play-life of the boy and as a teacher in the religious and moral life of the boy. The Church has scored a point, and the boys are glad of it.

You are a boy. The Scout organization by its "oath" "law", "daily good turn", and sports, all a part of a very extensive play program, builds up your citizenship life as a boy. The program makes you a good member of the Republic, not only because you are loyal, but because you are fit and thus prepared and ready to meet emergencies of any kind, and to serve your fellows, your town, your state, and your country. You learn to do all this, and love to, because you have had a chance to be a real boy with a love for play, and a chance to satisfy that love in connection with the aims of your organization. And then the Church comes along and says, "Fine! We will adopt the club method, too, and so help you and other boys to build into your citizenship a loyalty to Christ and your Church. Such loyalty adds value to every other kind of loyalty".

Loyalty to Christ and the Church means loyalty at its best, and here let it be said that The Order of Sir Galahad builds boyhood into the Church School and nurtures you as a Galahad boy in your religious life, because the Order is so closely connected with the Church, and expresses at so many points the religious spirit, with which The Order of Sir Galahad is perpetuated. The Order of Sir Galahad makes the Church School, the Church and her institutions its objectives in certain endeavors called "crafts", which supplement the teaching ordinarily given in the Church and the Church School. It makes extensive use of the Church to further your life within the Church by: (a) impressive vigils that grip you; (b) special services for boys, for boys and their fathers, and for boys and their mothers; (c) coronations in the Church that give opportunity for ceremonial with a rich pageantry setting; (d) the religious note struck in prayers, Scripture readings, Psalms, Hymns, and ceremonies; (e) the opportunity given to boys themselves to lead in parts of the worship, and thus to get the feeling that the Church is for you as well as for adults.

The Order of Sir Galahad knits its members in loyalty to the Church, and encourages them to express that loyalty in the five-fold field of service. It is picturesque with religious ceremonial that stresses Vows, Ritual, and Prayers. It shows you how to pray, and frames its prayers in your language It sets forth a carefully worked out approach to and preparation for the Holy Communion as you would like it put, thus making such a preparation natural to you. It features the Holy Grail, and with its associates the Holy Communion as a privilege and a power.

Again, The Order of Sir Galahad grounds you in the fundamentals of religion by setting forth as part of a Quest, based on the Catechism, your duty to God in all its strength and completeness. It grounds you in all the fundamentals of Christian conduct, by setting forth as part of a Quest, based on the Catechism, your duty to your fellows in every-day relationships.

Thus it will be seen that through The Order of Sir Galahad, with its diversified program, including all the interests of your life, you get a new approach to the great realities that anchor your life in Religious Spirit, Knowledge of the Church, the Church itself, Church Loyalty, Religious Ceremonial, Prayer, Preparation for the Holy Communion, the service of the Holy Communion, every-day Religion, and Christian Conduct.

Boys who would help other boys, the Church, and themselves, and make religion real to other boys and to themselves, and the Church helpful to other boys and themselves, will turn to the boys' club movement in the Church, and do their best either as a member of a club unit, or as worker in a club unit to make boys feel at home in the Church as an ally in all the play interests of life. For by play through club life with all its richness of boyhood activities, the Church and the boy are getting together, because the Church and play are getting together.

President Coolidge, speaking to a group of boys, said by way of good advice: "Work hard and behave." This is what the Church has been saying for a long time. Now the Church has another word to add—Play. With this addition, the advice gets under the skin because it speaks to a boy in his own language. But the right order for a boy is: "Play, Behave and Work Hard".

THE CHURCH AND THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S WORK

Edited by the Reverend Karl Morgan Block, D. D.

WORSHIP PROGRAMS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

The Character of the True Disciple.

Instrumental Music: The piano will play softly one stanza of the hymn, "O Jesus, Thou Art Standing", closing with the chords of the Amen.

Call to Worship: Leader—

Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord,
Or who shall stand in His holy place?
He that hath clean hands and a pure heart;
Who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity,
Nor sworn deceitfully.

Response:

Search me, O God, and know my heart.
Try me and know my thoughts;
And see if there be any wicked way in me,
And lead me in the way of everlasting. Amen.

Leader—Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee.

Hymn: "True-hearted, Whole-hearted, Faithful and Loyal."

Scripture (read in unison): St. Matt. 5:1-16, the Beatitudes that characterize the disciples of the Christ.

Prayer (led by one of the young men and one of the young women).

Pray for clean lives, clean thoughts, clean words, and clean deeds; for strength to stand for the right against easy wrong; for a spirit to work hard and play fair; for charity to all, and a willingness to forgive; for readiness to serve, and for patience under stress of daily duties and irksome toils; for greater love to God and our fellowmen; for faith in Christ and for a master passion to be His true disciple; for forgiveness of sin and shortcomings and victory over every thing that would mar our perfect relationship to God.

Hymn: "Keep Thyself Pure! Christ's Soldier." Let each stanza be prefaced by the following Scripture by the Leader—

Preceding the first stanza the Leader will quote or read John 13:35.

Preceding the second stanza, Luke 6:45.

Preceding the third stanza, John 17:15-19.

Preceding the fourth stanza, Romans 8:5, 6, 9, 14.

Worship With the Offering (and prayer for blessing upon all our striving, that our lives may ring as true as the silver and gold; that our characters may daily grow into the likeness of Him Who gave Himself in fullest devotion to the cause of God and for the salvation of man, till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a full-grown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ).

Hymn: "Dear Lord and Father of Mankind."

Sing the first stanza, read in unison the second and third stanzas, and sing the fourth and fifth.

The Catholicity of Discipleship.

Call to Worship: Leader—Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with you. I will put my law within you and write it in your hearts. My people shall all be righteous; They shall inherit the earth forever. I, the Lord, will bring it to pass in mine own time.

Hymn: "Blest be the Tie that Binds."

Prayer (by the Leader): For the Church of Christ Universal, its prosperity and increase in mission lands, for its purging and strengthening in our own country, for the Church in our own local communities, for our own fitness to be members of the Church of Christ. Close with the following prayer in unison, having it multigraphed or written upon the blackboard,

"Stir me, Oh, stir me, Lord, I care not how,
But stir my heart with passion for the world.
Stir me to go—to give—but most to pray;
Stir till the blood-red banner be unfurled
O'er lands that still in deepest darkness lie,
O'er deserts where no cross is lifted high.

Stir me, stir even me. Thyself wast stirred,
By Love's intensest fire, till Thou did'st give,
Thine only Son, Thy best beloved One,
E'en to the cruel cross that I might live.
Stir me to give myself so back to Thee,
That Thou can'st give Thyself again through me."

Scripture Lesson (to be read by the two youngest members in the group): Mark 9:38-41, He who is not against us is for us; John 10:16, Other sheep have I which are not of this fold.

Hymn: "The Church's One Foundation" (first and second stanzas).

Brief Message (from the Pastor) on: "The real essence of Christianity that unites all disciples of Jesus Christ."

Offering (and prayer for the blessing of God upon the gifts, and for the establishment of the Kingdom of God through the united work and gifts of black and white, yellow and brown).

Hymn: "The Church's One Foundation" (first and fourth stanzas).

Note—Hymns suggested are found in Hymnal for American Youth. Other appropriate hymns may be substituted.

Note—Above was taken from the January issue of The International Journal of Religious Education—the article written by William A. Weber.

A PRAYER FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

The National Commission on Young People's Work, under the Department of Religious Education, requested Bishop Murray to write a prayer for the organizations of Young People throughout the country. There are a number of prayers that have been written by various bishops for their diocesan groups, but there has been no prayer for the Young People of the Church as a whole. The Secretary of the Commission wrote Bishop Murray: "It seemed to the members of the Commission that it would be singularly fitting if you would write us a prayer, for the Young People have been very conscious of your interest in them, and have appreciated it more than they can express."

The Bishop accordingly has provided the following prayer, which he hopes may be "profitable not only for our Young People, but our grown-ups as well":

"O God, our Heavenly Father, in life's morning we come to Thee for guidance through its entire day.

Help us always to follow Jesus in the paths of righteousness.

Walking in His footsteps, may we, as did He before us, not only increase in wisdom and stature, but also in favor with Thee and our fellow men.

Keep us in Thy love that we may glorify Thee in our labor and our life.

Bless us with health and strength and purity, and give us a will to serve Thee in every good work, so that we may make a better world for all people to live in here, and become worthy of Thy Presence in a brighter world hereafter: for Jesus' sake, Amen."

THE TORCH BEARER.

Arlo Bates.

The God of the High Endeavor
Gave me a torch to bear.
I lifted it high above me
In the dark and murky air;
And straightway, with loud hosannas
The crowd proclaimed its light
And followed me as I carried my torch
Through the starless night,
Till drunk with the people's praises
And mad with vanity
I forgot 'twas the torch that they followed
And fancied they followed me.
Then slowly my arm grew weary
Upholding the shining load,
And my tired feet went stumbling
Over the dusty road,
And I fell with the torch beneath me
In a moment the light was out,
When lo! from the throng a stripling
Sprang forth with a mighty shout.
Caught up the torch as it smouldered
And lifted it high again,
Till fanned by the winds of Heaven
It fired the souls of men.
And as I lay in the darkness
The feet of the trampling crowd
Passed over and far beyond me,
Its peons proclaimed aloud,
And I learned in the deepening twilight
This glorious verity,
'Tis the torch that the people follow,
Whoever the bearer may be.

THE GREATER THING.

However humble the place I may hold,
Or lowly the trails I have trod,
There's a child who bases his faith on me,
There's a dog who thinks I am God.

Lord, keep me worthy—Lord, keep me clean
And fearless, and unbeguiled,
Lest I lose caste in the sight of a dog
And the wide clear eyes of a child.

Lest there shall come in the years to be
The blight of a withering grief,
And a little dog mourn for a fallen God,
And a child for his lost belief.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE COMMUNITY

"The Kingdom Come, Thy Will be done on earth"

Edited by the Reverend R. Cary Montague

COMMENTS ON CHILD TRAINING.

By Mary Evelyn Brydon, M. D.

Article X.—The Ten Commandments

Third Commandment—Reverence. Teach your child reverence for God and the things of God.

There are three things which have for us Christians a halo of sacredness, and we should show for them the deepest reverence. These are:

1. The names of God
2. The Bible.
3. The Church.

We are not naturally born with a reverence for anything. Therefore, reverence for these things must be taught as definite lessons to a child, else God's name will mean no more to him than any other name; the Bible will be no more than any other book; Church will be no more than any other building. Think this through for yourself. Then decide yourself just what kind of attitude you want your child to display towards these things as he grows older—as he goes through life.

The child in a Christian home should be taught that:

1. God's name is above every name, and eventually every knee shall bow to it.

2. The Bible is the written Word of God .

3. The Church is a place consecrated to the worship of God.

You, as his earliest instructor, must decide how you wish him to regard these things of God. He wasn't born knowing that they were sacred to Christian believers. Some one must teach him. The earlier he is taught the more thoroughly he will absorb the teaching.

In my opinion, this third Commandment in this age may be considered the most important of the ten, for upon the feeling of reverence depends far more deeply than we realize the attitude towards the fundamental things of both secular and religious life. Have you ever though of this? If you have not, now is the time to give it deep consideration. Perhaps in the teaching of no other law are the inward conviction and outward example of the matter so necessary as in this one. If you do not feel reverence yourself towards the things of God and show that reverence in your daily life, it is hopeless to expect to teach your child reverence for those things. You can only hope that he will show reverence for things that you show reverence for.

The third Commandment, it is true, makes reference only to God's name. "Name," however, in its broad sense, means not only a word by which a person is known, but also the qualities or attributes of the person. Hence, reverence of God's name would include reverence towards everything connected with Him. We will so discuss it for the purpose of these comments.

What do you mean by reverence? Webster defines it as: "Veneration, honor; respect; act of obedience." It is an attitude of the mind which manifests itself in certain tones of the voice, in certain expressions of the face, in certain words, in certain acts. Reverence involves four things, each of which must be taught the child definitely if you wish him to be reverent to sacred things.

1. Proper respect for the name of God.
2. Proper respect for the Bible.
3. Proper respect for the Church.
4. Respectful attitude in the Church.

Let us take each of these and study them in detail:

1. Taking God's name in vain is technically known as swearing. Do you know what swearing is? In the sense in which we think we know it we mean profane language. According to Webster "profane" means: "Irreverent towards Holy things; blasphemous, irreligious." Now look up blasphemous: "Uttering profane or mocking speech concerning God or sacred things; expressing contempt, or contumely, for the personality or the authority of God."

This is the swearing that your child must never be guilty of, this is what causes the true Christian to shiver when he hears it. No child of ours must ever be allowed to hear God's name used carelessly or profanely during his early life, if possible; it will do more harm than many months of teaching can undo. However, you cannot keep your child pure by isolating him from contact with others. We grow strong by overcoming temptation. Therefore, you are wise, in case your circumstances are such that he may have to listen to profane language, if you continually place emphasis on the opposite teaching.

Every expression that you hear used may not be profane language. There are vulgarities and slang phrases which, while not at all pleasant to the ear of refined people, are nevertheless not profanity; and I hope you will separate these in your mind. It is very undesirable that your child use slang or a vulgar word, but while discountenancing these, do not confuse them with profanity, for they are not profane and should not be mistaken as such.

A child is often accused of swearing without in the least knowing what it is he is accused of.

"Johnny," exclaimed his horrified mother, "did I hear you swearing just now? Who did you ever hear using that dreadful swear word?"

"I heard you say it when the baby upset his porridge on his clean rompers."

A few days later. "Johnny! Didn't I tell you mustn't swear? Now where did you get that word?"

"Oh, you and me's been saying 'Jerusalem' ever since we stopped saying 'Gosh'!"

If we mothers have not learned to control ourselves and maintain silence in the face of provocation, we cannot expect our children to do so. But conceding a need for an exclamation on occasion, why not carefully select one or two innocuous words and use them? It will not take long for your child to follow your lead. Give him words to use that do not give the appearance or sound of irreverence and that problem is solved—until he grows old enough to associate with children of less careful mothers.

THE PRINCIPLES OF THE PROTESTANT REFORMATION.

Mr. Editor:

It is impossible to reflect upon the work of the last General Convention without asking one's self what sort of spirit could possibly have actuated the Convention to seek to destroy the Thirty-Nine Articles. Why such a studied attempt to belittle the Reformation?

This question naturally leads to another, namely: What great principle or principles did the Reformation either promulgate for the first time, or else emphasize and make prominent after centuries of neglect? It is good to think of this subject from time to time, for the answer is not easy without careful thought; just as it is not easy to state offhand, and in a few words, the great truths for which Christianity stands, or to give a reason for the faith which is in us. This letter seeks to express what the writer believes to be some of the fundamental truths of the great Protestant Reformation, in the hope of arousing others to realize that such things are worth fighting to preserve for this dear old Church of ours.

It seems to me that the Reformation, in part at least, stood for the following:

First: The privilege of immediate communion between God and the human soul, without the intervention of any priest or confessional or ecclesiastical formality of any sort, thereby fulfilling what our Lord meant when He said, "At that day ye shall know that I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you".

Second. An open Bible, to be known and read of all men—as much the property of the laity as of the clergy, and therefore a Book to be translated into the vernacular in every land where Christianity is carried.

Third. Denial of the superstitious doctrine of transubstantiation, and of the mischievous notion that the priest works a miracle upon the altar whenever he celebrates the mass.

Fourth. Complete repudiation of the idea that any one Bishop or ecclesiastic is the visible representative of Christ on earth.

Fifth. The tremendous value of the human soul in the eyes of God, and a corresponding realization of the nobility and worth of the individual.

As a corollary from all this, it would and did necessarily follow in course of time that there would arise the doctrine of complete religious liberty, where the State should never presume to dictate to any man how he should worship Almighty God. This doctrine is now triumphantly enthroned in every American constitution; but it was utterly unknown to the old medieval world, and would have been regarded with horror and detestation by the medieval Church. It was a plant of slow growth, but sure.

I can only touch upon other great truths which have flowed from the foregoing, such as free government, free education for the people, a free press, and the participation of the laity in Church government. To quote the solemn words of the Confession of Augsburg, "The schools and pulpits have been so long busied in gathering together the traditions that they had not leisure to touch the Scripture, and to seek out a more profitable doctrine of faith, of the cross, of hope, of the dignity of civil affairs, of the comfort of conscience in arduous trials".

God grant that every one who reads this may stand ready to pray and strive for these things, so that our beloved Church may not be guilty of the unpardonable folly of turning its back upon the Reformation.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE CHILDREN.

Mr. Editor:

In view of the interest that there is at present in the subject of Worship and its place in the Child Life, the Diocesan Board of Religious Education has requested me to send you the following message:

In all our plans for the Religious Education of the young, let us give the first place to Worship.

Whatever other features may be included in our program, let us be sure to bring our children into the Church every Sunday for public worship. (The form of that worship to be determined by the rector of each individual parish.) But we would suggest that where it is possible, it would be desirable to have the boys and girls engaged in public worship with their elders. In some parishes, children's services will be found more helpful or practical, but whatever the form, we feel that everything should be done to make these services, in which the young participate, as beautiful and reverent as possible.

As the true climax of our teaching, our instruction should lead up to our conscious fellowship with God and with one another in the Holy Communion Service.

Turning to practical suggestions, the following have been found helpful in many parishes. Young People's Services, Children's Church Services, Children's Eucharist, and the bringing of Church School classes to Morning Prayer and Holy Communion under the supervision of teachers. In some parishes, it has been found helpful for the clergyman to speak to the boys and girls from the pulpit before they are dismissed. In others, there is no address, and in some, the children are supposed to stay through the whole adult service. It is not the particular form of the service that we are stressing, but the importance of some service of worship for children in every parish in the Diocese. In fact, I personally would advocate what the Rev. John W. Suter, Jr., recommends: that the children be made acquainted with all of these forms.

Our Secretary, Miss Rich, has in our office many of these forms of service and will be glad to make them available for you if you so desire.

CHARLES BRECK ACKLEY,
President of the Board.

AN AWAKENING NEEDED.

Mr. Editor:

Will anything less than a general revival of religion in all the Churches suffice to arrest the attention of the nation? The Bishops' Crusade is doing wonders in the Episcopal fold, but is it adequate to arouse the people of America as a whole? I think not. My Crusading has led me to an acute realization of the necessity of a real awakening throughout the whole of Protestantism. I feel that if our national irreligiousness is allowed to go on unabated, with no Church-wide effort to stem the tide of blatant worldliness, inordinate selfishness and a general tendency towards a pleasure-loving and irresponsible attitude on the part of millions of spiritually indifferent people everywhere—if this is allowed to continue without let or hindrance on the part of organized Christianity, I feel that we are headed for general decadence, if indeed not for national collapse.

I have taken the liberty of writing to the Rev. Dr. C. L. Goodell, Secretary, Commission on Evangelism and Life Service, Federal Council of the Churches of Christ, 105 East Twenty-Second Street, New York City, suggesting a general evangelistic campaign synchronously in the leading Protestant Churches all over the country at as early a date as can be arranged. If others will do this, we may succeed in launching a Church-wide revival which will be of sufficient power and scope to arouse the whole nation. Will those who read this write and endorse the idea, addressing the Federal Council as above? Will the editor accede to an earnest request to express approval in the columns of this periodical?

SUPERSENSITIVE.

Mr. Editor:

Your article, "Information—but not Controversy", is not worthy of you, for it savors too much of the scandal-monger, and appeals to prejudice and bigotry. Moreover, it is discourteous. The Order of the Holy Cross is a society of godly men, known for their charity and devotion to our Lord. Why not join hands with all who are striving to extend the Kingdom of God, even though you do not now agree with all their ideas. There is enough indifference and prayerlessness in the Church to take the attention of the laity you appeal to, without stirring up strife within the Church itself.

THE KULING SCHOOL: A STATEMENT FROM BISHOP LLOYD.

Mr. Editor:

Please help me by making room for the following statement with regard to the Kuling School:

Question has been raised several times of late as to whether the school is "carrying on" and whether under present conditions in China, funds are needed.

This makes me apprehensive, the more because it is natural that people should think that temporarily gifts might be suspended. As a matter of fact the very situation involves the probability of increased financial obligations.

The school is continuing its work in temporary quarters. This means increased operating costs, a lessened earned income, possible added emergency expenditures, while salaries must go on as usual.

I cannot too strongly urge at this time the continuance of that steady and generous support which has made the Kuling School so real an asset and which will, if maintained, insure its future development.

Chairman, Board of Trustees, The Kuling School for the Children of Missionaries in China.

BISHOP GARLAND OBJECTS.

Mr. Editor:

I was very sorry to read in your issue of February 26, the letter from the Rev. Albert E. Clattenburg appealing for the Children's Lenten Offering for a special object.

Mr. Clattenburg's article fails to mention the fact that the committee appointed by the National Council included my appointees in this Diocese and that the action of the National Council was taken after full consideration of the suggestion to which Mr. Clattenburg refers. As the Bishop of Pennsylvania, and also a member of the National Council, I was in entire agreement with its decision and spoke in favor of it; and I might add that the Chairman of our Diocesan Committee agrees with me that no other action could properly be taken.

May I, therefore, urge your readers to follow the suggestion of the National Council and make this fiftieth anniversary a record offering of the Children of the Church, but not to divert it from the general purpose to which it has been devoted—the maintenance of our missionary work.

Very faithfully yours,

THOMAS J. GARLAND,

Bishop of Pennsylvania.

AN INQUIRY.

Mr. Editor:

As the origin of the word Mass has come up again for discussion, may I have the privilege of asking two questions in the hope of obtaining information?

First, can any Latin scholar translate them, as they stand, otherwise than "'She' is finished", since Missa is feminine and not neuter?

Secondly, if this is the only translation grammatically possible, how did they come to be used in this connection in dismissing the congregation?

Perhaps some reader who is versed in Liturgics may be able to throw some light on this curious, even if academic, topic.

LENT.

Along the pilgrimage of our life another Lent overtakes us. We came from God and we are on our way back. We have here no continuing city. What we have to do here we must do now, for, in the familiar lines, we shall not pass this way again. We are making our way along. Now and then it is rough going. Let us know what we are about. We work and play and pray. Life is a unit. We are ever the children of our Father. We have a name, a heritage, to aim to live up to. What manner of persons should we not be! "Which was the son of Adam, which was the Son of God." It is even so. But I am sore let and hindered in running the race—making the pilgrimage—that is set before me. There are weights that hinder my going, sins that beset me. An adversary again and again obstructs my path. I would fain reach the celestial city of my contained and devoted self, but who shall deliver me from this body of death? To will is present with me, but how to perform? How carry on? How acquit myself? But Lent overtakes me in the midst of my reflection and encourages my reflection. Lent bids me look up and forward. Say not the struggle naught availeth. Beyond are the heights. As thy days, so thy strength. Renew thine alms, thy fast, thy prayer. Commune with thine own self, see what thy sould doth wear. Watch. Think. Follow judgment, not merely whim and fancy. Meet hatred with love, strife with peace. Seek not to get even. Why should you? How would it help? And it is to help that you are here. Be kind. Forgive. Keep under thy body and bring it and its appetites into subjection. Rule thy spirit. "Be filled with the Spirit." Be glad; the joy of the Lord is thy strength Let us love one another, for love is of God and he that loveth is born of God; he that loveth not knoweth not God, for God is love. Brethren, pray for us.—J. F. W.

AN EXPERIMENT IN CHRISTIAN UNITY

By Everett H. Jones, Special Correspondent

THERE are eight students at the Virginia Theological Seminary in Alexandria who believe that Christian unity is possible, for they have seen it in action. These eight were the guests of the Presbyterian Theological students of Union Seminary, Richmond, on February 16 and 17. They lived and talked and attended classes with their Presbyterian brothers on these days. Differences among them were not winked at, and at least one warm argument arose about the claims of Calvinism. But the dominant aspect of the whole visit was the feeling of brotherhood, the strong sense of kinship as members of Christ. This was more memorable than all else. Christian unity was being proved by being lived.

It all began two years ago when several students from Alexandria met some of the students from Richmond at the Missionary Convention in Washington, D. C. When the convention adjourned, there were still some things the Episcopalians wanted to talk over with their friends from Richmond, so they asked a number of the latter to visit the old Seminary on the hill for a few days. This year the invitation came from Richmond. So happy has the fellowship proved that both Seminaries are anxious now that it become an annual custom.

No account of this experiment in unity conducted recently in Richmond should neglect the spirit of Christian courtesy and hospitality which pervaded it. A reception the first night, with young ladies from the General Assembly's Training School for Lay Workers as hostesses; a tour of the city one afternoon; a tea one evening, followed by a discussion group; a friendly smile and a hearty greeting from every man on the campus—all these came as the expressions of a real Christian friendliness. Quite appropriately, the most serious conference came the second night: by then the students knew each other, and liked each other, and in over two hours of frank, free discussion on common problems not a word was said which broke the sense of an underlying unity.

This conference between the eight men from Alexandria and a group of twelve men selected from the student body at Richmond was the high mark of the visit. It brought a revelation of some of the vital subjects in the minds of theological students of today.

Throughout the discussion there was a spirit of mutual appreciation. Each group felt that it had much to learn from the other. The Episcopalians began by saying they would like to have more of the love which the Presbyterians have for the Bible, and more of their insight into its spiritual messages.

"I can always tell a Presbyterian by the very reverence he shows in handling his Bible," said a student from Alexandria.

"We need the reality and freshness which you gain in your spontaneous prayers," said another.

On the other hand, the Presbyterians expressed their great indebtedness to the Book of Common Prayer. One of them said he found more help in it for the preparation of his own prayers than anywhere else. Another said he more than once longed to worship with a liturgy like that of the Episcopal Church.

Perhaps the characteristic of the Seminary as a whole for which the Episcopal visitors expressed most appreciation was its zeal. Everywhere there was warmth and radiance. The students believed deeply and their faith was their meat and drink. The professors lectured with conviction. There seemed to be present what Professor Jacks called "the lost radiance of the Christian religion", and it was a radiance that came from heat. These men take in earnest the words of the English missionary, Henry Martyn, who said before his early death: "It is better to burn out than to rust out."

Another thing became clear as the students talked. They had no idea of proselytizing each other. The stress was rather on the value of staying in your own Church in order to make it what it ought to be. The value of adopting the good from other Churches was emphasized. "Take the best from all and keep your eyes on the ideal," was the way it was put. One man argued definitely against changing denominations, contending that it usually means the substitution of one set of restrictions for another.

These students also looked ahead and talked over the ways of furthering Christian unity when they are in the work of the ministry. The need for aggressive leadership was pointed out. Oftentimes the people of the Church are slow to respond to efforts at Christian cooperation. It was agreed that this should not deter the movement. There was a strong faith that people of different Churches when they really know each other, and find how much they have in common, will be glad to work together. The exchange of pulpits was urged as a good means to this end.

A plea was made that party labels should be forgotten as far as possible. Many times a minister is classified as a "Modernist" or a "Fundamentalist", and the term tends to isolate him from others, and is often an unfair description. Unity is much better furthered when we appreciate each other as Christians, and not as members of different parties, it was felt.

"We need to remember," said an Episcopal student, "that God and experience teach different men different things. Every man that does not believe as I do is not a lost soul. I am more likely to be the loser if I don't see the truth which he has found. There is not a fixed body of abstract truth which we are out to get into every mind alike. We seek to develop Christian life, and that may come along different lines."

The discussion turned before long to Seminary problems.

"Do you men at Alexandria ever have your ups and downs?" asked a Union student.

"Many an evening we sit up after midnight trying to decide whether we should stay in the Seminary," he was told.

Then there came a free examination of the difficulties which men face as they study theology. The situation was compared to a storm on the ocean when the waves beat high and fiercely before there is calm again. So in the Seminary problems rage until at last out of the turmoil there is a calm faith again.

From both sides it was suggested that the cure for theological difficulty is practical Christian activity. One man said he found himself losing his firm faith as he studied his textbooks, but as soon as he got with people, facing their needs, he grew strong again. Faith was defined as "courageous activity, not quiescent belief".

Several of the theological students felt that the greatest missionary frontier of the Church today is in the colleges.

"I talked to a young professor on the train during the holidays," related a member of the group. "He said he hadn't been to Church in years. Yet, he was interested in religion. He wanted something he had not found. 'For God s sake,' he plead, 'Give us something to live on.' "

While college men are interested in religion, and anxious to talk about it, they are not concerned with the Church. They often feel the Church has fallen down and failed to meet their need. Usually the college students are responsive to the presentation of Christ. Our task is to "rediscover Christ with the college student", said a Presbyterian who had been traveling among colleges.

If one note was sounded more than any other during these days of fellowship, it was that of common loyalty to Christ. In a short vesper service conducted by two of the Episcopal delegates for the students of the Union Seminary, the message that came forth irresistibly was one of the unity which is in Christ Jesus. While Church union seems often a distant and difficult goal, Christian unity, the spirit of unity which must come before any organic union can succeed, is a present possibility if we want it. The exclusive spirit was contrasted with the inclusive spirit, which was the method of Christ. He enlarged the scope of men's thinking and acting; He drew men together. His was the spirit of Edwin Markham's lines:

> "He drew a circle that shut me out—
> Heretic, rebel, a thing to flout—
> But Love and I had the wit to win;
> We drew a circle and took him in."

Two books were mentioned in the course of discussion as having been helpful. Both, interestingly enough, are books which defend Christianity by defending Christ. They are Stanley Jones' The Christ of the Indian Road and Charles Gilkey's Jesus and Our Generation.

Those who had a share in this experience of Christian unity are praying that its results may be lasting and far-reaching. They expect such results. There was constantly a forward look, and a determination to carry into the years ahead the spirit of oneness which filled the time of thinking and living together. Already an invitation has gone from Alexandria to Richmond for a group of the Presbyterian students to come for a visit next year. Already, too, an invitation has gone from the faculty of the Virginia Seminary to Dr. W. T. Thompson, of Union

Seminary, whose classes were found so interesting and valuable by the Virginia men, to give a course of lectures this spring on methods of religious education.

The students who went from the Virginia Seminary to Union were: Clifford L. Stanley, of Williamsport, Pa.; Charles A. Sumners, of Austin, Texas; Allen Person, of Charlotte, N. C.; Paul Lineaweaver, of Hancock, Md.; Durrie B. Hardin, of Houston, Texas; Wentworth Riemann, of Houston, Texas; Everett H. Jones, of San Antonio, Texas; and C. A. Brocklebank, of Toledo, Ohio.

Conference of Field Department Secretaries.

More than thirty Dioceses and Districts sent representatives to the annual Field Department conference of diocesan executive secretaries held at Racine February 21-25, including, for example, California, Olympia, Florida, New Hampshire, Oklahoma.

A world outlook in Christian missions, and a statement of progress in social service thinking were presented to the field men. The objective of the Church's program, the diocesan program, the effect of the pay-as-you-go plan, what to do about advance work, and a great number of more technical questions received a thorough discussion of practical value to all present, as men from widely divergent fields produced their problems and pooled their experiences.

Conference of Church Students.

For the fourth consecutive year the Church students of the universities and other institutions of collegiate rank in the Dioceses of Easton, Maryland and Washington met in conference. The meeting this year was held in Baltimore where the second conference was also held. The first and third conferences met in Washington.

Delegates from the thirteen colleges which make up the conference registered at the pro-Cathedral in Baltimore on Friday afternoon, February 25. Mr. Frank Hewitt, who graduated from Johns Hopkins University in 1923 and is now a senior at the University of Maryland, is the President of the Conference and acted as toastmaster at the "get-together" supper on Friday evening. At the general meeting which followed, the conference was addressed by the Presiding Bishop of the Church. The Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes, D. D., LL. D., of Washington Cathedral, spoke on "The Layman and the Church". A social hour in charge of Mr. Kercheval E. Smith, the leader of the Young People's Work in the Province of Washington, followed.

Saturday was devoted to the business of the conference with the period from three-forty-five to six P. M., left open as usual for sight-seeing and recreation.

On Sunday the delegates attended Corporate Communion in the Pro-Cathedral and also morning prayer at eleven A. M. Breakfast after the early celebration was served in the Parish House.

The Rt. Rev. John T. Dallas, D. D., Bishop of New Hampshire, formerly Chaplain of Dartmouth College, opened the conference on Saturday and closed the day with a Quiet Hour in preparation for Holy Communion. He was the celebrant at that service on Sunday morning. The Rev. Ronalds Taylor, S. T. D., student pastor at the University of Maryland, preached at the eleven o'clock service.

The Rev. W. L. DeVries, Ph. D., D. D., of the Washington Cathedral, conducted a Question Box on Saturday afternoon.

Among the students who acted as leaders of meetings are the following, several of whom are well-known in the Province: Mr. Noyes Northup, J. H. U. '27; Mrs. M. V. Thomas, G. W. U. '25; Mr. Carroll Brooke, G. W. U.; and Miss Marry S. York, U. of M. '28.

News From China.

A cable received from Bishop Roots on March 5 gives the following information:

The General Synod of the Church in China, appointed for May, 1927, in Foochow, has been indefinitely postponed.

The following institutions are in operation:

Central China University, in which Boone University is included, with one hundred students.

Boone Middle School with two hundred students.

St. Hilda's School, with about the same enrollment as last term.

The primary schools in Wuchang and Hankow have a full enrollment.

Most of the out-station primary schools are open with fair prospects.

American Bishops Elected Honorary Associates of the S. P. G.

The following letter from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts has been received by the Presiding Bishop:

15 Tufton Street,
Westminster S. W. 1.
22 February, 1927.

Dear Lord Bishop:

At the annual meeting of our Society held on February 18, 1927, the following resolution was passed with acclamation:

"Resolved, That the Bishops of the Episcopal Church of the United States of America be elected Honorary Associates of the Society for the ensuing year."

In communicating the above resolution may I be allowed to say how very deeply the Society values this link with your great Church, and treasures the memory of the work it was privileged to do in the past.

Yours faithfully and dutifully,
N. F. Jenkins,
Deputy Secretary.

The Most Rev.
The Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States,
281 Fourth Avenue,
New York City.

To which Bishop Murray has replied:

Thank you very much indeed for yours of the 22nd ultimo, informing me of the resolution adopted at the meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, electing our Bishops Honorary Associates of the Society for the ensuing year.

We appreciate more than we can well express this friendly and fraternal action; and with a prayer for you in everything, I am

Affectionately yours,
John Gardner Murray,
Presiding Bishop.

More Crusade Missions.

Beginning on Sunday, February 6, and ending Sunday night, February 13, a very helpful mission was held in Ascension Church, Amherst, the Rev. Thos. Deane Lewis, D. D., rector. Preparatory services were held for two weeks before the mission. In addition to this several members of the congregation a few weeks before had attended the Diocesan Crusade in Lynchburg, so that when the missioner, the Rev. W. Roy Mason, of Charlottesville, came, the congregations were eagerly awaiting his message. The congregations steadily grew and Christians of all communions came and took an active part. Many requests for prayer were received, all of which were offered at the morning conferences when the devotional spirit seemed at its deepest. At the closing service Sunday night the weather was inclement, but there was an attendance of about one hundred, nearly half of whom signed cards of rededication to Christ and His work.

At St. Mark's Church, Montvale, the Rev. W. A. Pearman, rector, the Rev. J. Manly Cobb was the Crusader from February 21 to 25, inclusive. There was a mass meeting every night, and, notwithstanding the unfortunate weather and bad roads, great interest was manifested in the neighborhood, and the congregations increased steadily. Ministers and members of other denominations assisted in the services by their presence and support. At the final service the Boy Scouts attended in a body. It is felt that in every way this series of meetings met with gratifying success.

Activities at Blacksburg.

The monthly social meeting of the Episcopal Club of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute was held at the home of Professor and Mrs. W. D. Saunders on February 18.

In the absence of the rector, the Rev. J. Manly Cobb, the services at Christ Church and Emmanuel (High Top) on February 20, were conducted by the Rev. A. C. Bussingham, deacon-in-charge of St. Peter's Church, Roanoke.

On February 25 an amateur theatrical entertainment was given by the Parish Guild in the V. P. I. Auditorium, for the benefit of the organ fund. There was a large audience and the receipts amounted to more than $130. At a meeting of the vestry and a committee from the Guild last December it was decided to purchase the organ without delay. A handsome Moeller organ was selected, costing about $3,000. As it cannot be delivered before Easter, the necessary alterations to the church for the installing of a pipe organ are being made at the present time. The family of the late Colonel William H. Palmer, of Richmond, have generously offered to contribute the amount necessary for the alterations. While this work is progressing the church services are being held in the chapel of the college Y. M. C. A.

The Rev. Mr. Cobb underwent an operation for appendicitis in the Jefferson Hospital, Roanoke, on Saturday, March 5. At this writing his condition is encouraging, and it is hoped that he will be out of the hospital in a short time.

World-Wide Day of Prayer For Missions.

The World-Wide Day of Prayer for Missions, March 4, was observed in St. Paul's Parish House, Richmond, by women of all denominations. From ten in the morning until five in the afternoon continuous prayer was being said for every phase of missionary work; for all women in the mission field at home and abroad; and for the young people of this and other nations.

The day was divided into periods of one hour. Each hour was conducted by a woman of a different denomination; but every denomination was represented every hour, not only in the congregation, but by the various women who said the prayers or gave the Bible readings. In this way, about one hundred and fifteen women had some definite part during the day; and while the subjects for prayer were the same hour by hour, there was great variety in the petitions.

The Woman's Interdenominational Missionary Union of Richmond cooperated to make this day possible. Hundreds of women attended during the day, and the missionary spirit and the spirit of unity were greatly strengthened in the community.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., Bishop.

Lenten Activities.

Lenten activities in Washington have been announced throughout the Churches and programs in many cases include visiting clergy. Noon-day services at Epiphany Church will be from 12:05 to 12:30 and some of the speakers for these are the Rev. H. P. Almon Abbott, D. D., for week of March 6; the Rev. Wyatt Brown, D. D., week of March 13; Dr. James S. Montgomery, Dr. J. R. Sizoo, Dr. William A. Lambert, Dr. John R. Shannon and Hon. C. S. Briggs, week of March 20; Dr. F. S. Fleming, week of March 27; the Rev. F. G. Budlong, D. D., week of April 3; and the Rev. Z. B. Phillips, D. D., rector of Epiphany Church, in Holy Week.

At many of the Churches exchanges are being made by local clergymen. The Lenten services at Keith's Theatre will begin at 12:30 each week day instead of 12 as previously announced in this column. Some of the Churches will have also, as a part of their Lenten observance, special children's services and the rendition of some sacred cantata. Services at the Cathedral will continue as usual with Evensong every week day at 4:30 P. M., and Holy Communion on Thursday at 7:30 A. M. The Girls' Friendly Society in the Diocese of Washington will have special Lenten services in Epiphany Church on Monday at 4:45 P. M., when Dr. Phillips rector of Epiphany Church, will conduct the services and preach.

The Rev. Robert Lee Lewis, curator of Washington Cathedral, will preach every Sunday morning in Lent at the Church of the Advent, and also on Friday evenings at 8 P. M., when his subject will be, "Plain Talks on Every-day Religion".

Bishop Darst Returns To Diocesan Duties.

The Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of East Carolina, who has been spending six months in Washington as Chairman of the National Commission on Evangelism and executive head of the Bishops' Crusade, has left the city and returned to his home in Wilmington. As he was preparing to leave his office at Mt. St. Alban, Bishop Darst was called into the office of Bishop Freeman and presented with a fountain pen set as a token of appreciation of the honor and privilege which the Cathedral staff had felt in their work and contact with him.

Bishop Freeman made the presentation with an informal address, and Bishop Darst, in accepting the gift, said:

"I want you to know it is my firm conviction that the spiritual atmosphere which surrounds Mount St. Alban and our National Cathedral has a great deal to do with the wonderful success of the Bishops' Crusade. I am more happy than I can say that it was decided to establish our headquarters in Washington and right here in the Cathedral office."

He concluded by giving his blessing to the assembled Cathedral staff.

Leon C. Palmer, executive secretary of the National Commission on Evangelism, will remain at Mount St. Alban for another month to supervise the follow-up program of the Bishops' Crusade prior to closing the temporary headquarters.

Noon-Day Lenten Services.

The daily noon-day Lenten Services under the auspices of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew are being held this year as usual in the Garrick Theatre, with the following list of speakers:

Ash Wednesday, March 2—The Rt. Rev. John G. Murray, D. D., LL. D., Presiding Bishop and President of the National Church.

Thursday, March 3—The Rt. Rev. Thomas J. Garland, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Pennsylvania.

Friday and Saturday, March 4 and 5—The Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Bethlehem.

Monday and Wednesday, March 7 and 9—The Rev. Canon Allan Pearson Shatford, D. D., St. James the Apostle, Montreal, Canada.

Thursday, March 10—The Rev. William J. Cox, rector of St. Andrew's Church, West Philadelphia.

Friday and Saturday, March 11 and 12—The Rev. Canon Allan Pearson Shatford, D. D., St. James the Apostle, Montreal, Canada.

Monday to Saturday, March 14 to 19—The Rt. Rev. Granville G. Bennett, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Duluth.

Monday to Saturday, March 21 to 26—The Rev. Joseph Fort Newton, rector of Memorial Church of St. Paul, Overbrook, Philadelphia.

Monday to Friday, March 28 to April 1—The Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Central New York.

Saturday, April 2—The Rev. Richard Gurley, rector of St. Martin's Church, Radnor, Pa.

Monday to Friday, April 4 to 8—The Rt. Rev. Charles E. Woodcock, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Kentucky.

Saturday, April 9—The Rev. John Doyle, rector of St. Philip's Church, West Philadelphia.

Monday-Friday, April 11-15—The Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of East Carolina.

Easter Even, April 16—The Rev. Stanley R. West, Chaplain, rector of Calvary Church, Conshohocken, Pa.

Crusade Preaching Missions.

The Rev. Corwin C. Miller, Chaplain of St. John's School, Salina, conducted a preaching mission of the Bishops' Crusade at Larned. His services were helpful and far-reaching and the mission made an abiding impression, and will result in the upbuilding of the Church.

Church of The Good Shepherd.

The Rev. Loaring Clark, D. D., is holding a successful mission in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Jacksonville. It began March 3 and concludes the thirteenth. Devotional services are held in the morning and a preaching service at night. Last week about one hundred and thirty of the officers and teachers of the Sunday School met at dinner to outline the work for Lent. The school is setting an increased goal for its mission offering. Addresses were made by Bishop Juhan, the Rev. C. A. Ashby, rector; Mr. Geo. W. Thames, Superintendent; and the Rev. Ambler Blackford, Diocesan Chairman of the Board of Religious Education. Owing to the growth of the Sunday School and the needs of the parish, an offering will be taken Easter to start the erection of the handsome church building to complete the original design of the plant. This is fixed at not less than $150,000. A little over ten years ago Good Shepherd had three hundred and thirty-five communicants, and about $27,000 in property. It now has nearly 1,300 communicants and its parish house and equipment alone is valued at $400,000. Over two hundred members were added in 1926. It is known as a Seven-Day Church, operating every day in the week, through its gymnasium, swimming pool and club rooms. Services are now had in the chapel of the Sunday School. The whole parish house will be turned over to the school when the new church is put up.

The Rev. John Matthews, who took charge of the Church at Marianna, is doing a splendid work. His appeal to his people in the fall campaign was so well gotten up, that it was commended by the Diocesan Board. Mr. Matthews came to the Diocese from the University of the South, where he made a fine record.

Church Building In The Diocese.

There are a number of church buildings under construction in the Diocese. At St. Stephen's, Port Washington, a new parish house awaits dedication by Bishop Stires at his visit on April 3. The building is of steel-frame construction, with two floors of about 11,000 square feet area each. The auditorium, which is also the main Sunday-school room, seats three hundred and seventy-five. There is a gymnasium, which is also primary department room; ladies' parlor, girls' rooms, Boy Scout quarters, billiard room and bowling alleys. The contract price was $35,000, exclusive of fixtures and furniture.

At St. Gabriel's, Hollis, a new parish house is under construction. It will be fire-proof, with steel frame, brick and stone walls, and concrete floors. It will cost $69,000, beside furnishings. The Church has recently been somewhat enlarged by adding a choir room and a sacristy, releasing space for seats that was formerly used for these purposes. Further enlargement of the church is impossible, because the widening of Jamaica Avenue has been authorized, and this will reduce the size of the plot. Probably a new church will have to be built in a few years; but the present plot has become very valuable as a business site, and can doubtless be sold to good advantage when it will no longer serve.

The Church of the Resurrection, Richmond Hill, has recently been lengthened by thirty-nine feet, providing additional seating capacity to the nave and an entirely new chancel. Included in the new chancel furnishings is a pulpit in memory of the late Rev. Wm. P. Evans, rector of the parish from 1900 to 1922. The enlargement of the original little frame church was begun in 1897, when the Rev. George W. Davenport, now Bishop of Easton, was rector, and was carried on under the Rev. Mr. Evans. It has now been completed under the leadership of the Rev. Arthur R. Cummings, the present rector. Along with the new church, a fine parish house has been partly built and is in use; the second story, however, remains to be built. The cost of recent building operations has been $130,000.

At Jackson Heights the foundations of St. Mark's Church and parish house are being put in, the bids for the superstructure are being received.

St. Simon's, Brooklyn, is building a new church at Avenue M and East Twenty-Ninth Street, to which, when it is completed, the congregation will remove from the present location at Avenue K and East Twelfth Street.

Land Given For Mission at Ocean Side.

A plot of ground sixty feet by more than two hundred, well located in Ocean Side, has been given by Mrs. A. A. Pearsall and her family for the use of St. Andrew's Mission there. Miss Laura Sutton has given a dwelling house to be moved onto this plot and made to serve temporarily as a chapel.

St. Andrew's was begun last September by the Rev. Frederick H. Handsfield, rector of the Church of the Ascension at Rockville Center. Ocean Side lies between that village and Long Beach. A Sunday School is held at two, and Even Song at three. There is a monthly service of Holy Communion. There is an active men's club, and a women's guild of seventeen members.

At the Church of the Epiphany, Brooklyn, remarkable progress has lately been made. The Church School especially has expended until there are now twenty-one classes, and every available place is used, including the school's own quarters in the basement, the church itself, the kitchen, the sacristy, the stage, and the rector's study. The kindergarten meets in two sessions: one with the Sunday School at ten, and the other during the church service at eleven. The rector, the Rev. Lauriston Castleman, says that his school does not lack for teachers, because of the remarkable enthusiasm of the young people of the parish. There is also a Men's Club of one hundred and three members.

New Church For State College.

The Bishops of Pennsylvania met at State College on February 24, to acquaint themselves thoroughly with the lot on which it is proposed to build a dignified church and parish house for St. Andrew's Mission at State College. About a year ago a campaign was instituted to collect $160 for this purpose. This amount is just about completed and the Bishops have agreed on the architects and on the kind of buildings they wish erected. This spring they hope the work can be started on the church. The present basement in which services are held will serve for holding the Church services until the church is completed, and then it will be converted into a parish house by adding several sections to it and building an additional story.

The Church Home.

The Executive Committee of the Church Home met on March 1, to inspect the improvements and addition to the Church Home, which are nearing completion. The contractor hopes to finish the work by April. A number of buildings with glass sides were donated to the home. These will be torn down, where they are at present, at Mt. Airy, Pa., and hauled to the grounds of the home where they will be erected again—one for the boys as a playroom when there is inclement weather and one for the girls, and another one for an industrial shop in which it is hoped to install simple machinery which will be the beginning of manual training for the boys.

Mrs. Sterrett Recuperating.

The many friends of Mrs. Sterrett, the wife of the Coadjutor of the Diocese, will be sorry to know that she had to undergo two major operations in St. Mary's Hospital, Rochester, Minn., by Dr. Charles Mayo. The Bishop writes on February 27 that she is recovering speedily from the operations and hopes that she will be better than she has been for years. In this news the whole Diocese rejoices.

Crusade "Follow-Up" Work.

Following the opening campaign of the Bishops' Crusade, the chairman of the Diocesan Committee, the Rev. John S. Douglas, rector of St. Andrew's Parish, Louisville, has been untiring in efforts looking to the fulfillment of well-organized "follow-up" work, and has succeeded to the extent of covering effectively every point in the Diocese where the Church has a mission. Mr. Douglas, himself, visited Owensboro, holding daily conferences and services, and the same program has been carried out elsewhere.

In the See city, each parish has sent forth its schedule of services for the Lenten season, including the usual weekly union service on Friday, preceded by the likewise long established united meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary, under the direction of Miss E. Almstedt, Diocesan President. For many years these Lenten meetings have proven a strengthening feature of the work of the Auxiliary, and under the Diocesan Educational Secretary, Mrs. Gilmer R. McCormick, a series of interesting programs has been arranged.

Noonday services will be conducted as usual, in the leading theatre of the city, with the following speakers, as planned: the Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, during the first and fourth weeks; the Rt. Rev. James Wise, the Rev. John Gass; the Rev. C. E. Jackson, the Rev. Harold Brown.

Bishop Woodcock has been one of the Crusaders, serving both in Baltimore and Chicago, with valuable results, as reported from each field.

The Bishops' Crusade.

The Bishops' Crusade in this Diocese was an unqualified success, surpassing all expectation. Large congregations greeted the Crusaders at all points visited.

The missioners sent by the Commission on Evangelism were admiraoly chosen. The Rt. Rev. R. E. L. Strider, Bishop Coadjutor of West Virginia, was the Crusading Bishop. His sermons were scholarly and convincing, and never failed to carry weight and conviction.

The Rev. Nathaniel B. Groton, of St. Thomas' Parish, Whitemarsh, Penn., Crusading Presbyter, stirred the hearts of all his hearers by his eloquent words on the Bible and prayer. His conferences for the clergy, the men, the women, and the young people of the Diocese were splendidly attended and lasting good will result therefrom.

The Crusade opened at Salisbury on February 6 and closed at Elkton February 22, having also been held in Cambridge, Easton and Chestertown. The Diocese was so stirred by the Crusade that it immediately began its follow Compassion.

Henry Irvine Lynds.

In simple faith a child knelt by his bed,
And talked to God as son to parent should.
Life's little troubles and its wants he said:
And God, Creator, smiling understood.

Adventurous youth, beset by worldly lust,
Forgetting prayers of childhood, and the need
To keep the Spirit Shield of faith from rust:
And God, Omniscient of man, gave heed.

A man of middle age, success attained,
Lavish of wealth, incontinent and proud;
Living for pleasures of the world thus gained;
And God, long suffering, his wrongs allowed.

An old man bowed with weight of years and sin,
The sweetness in life's fruit now turned to gall;
Repentant, childhood memories stirred within:
And God, compassionate, forgave him all.

The Presbyterian Church.

Rev. T. F. Opie, D. D.

(The article following is one of a series dealing with the Protestant Communions written by Dr. Opie for the Southern Churchman. They are especially timely in view of the approaching Conference on Faith and Order to be held in August at Lausanne.—Ed. Family Department.)

In the whole Protestant world there is scarcely a more influential body of Christians than the Presbyterians. Presbyterianism connotes loyalty to the Bible, cultural, conservative and consecrated Christianity, and no end of "good works".

Numerically, the Presbyterians are near the head in a list of several hundred Protestant Churches. In respect to Sabbath School activities and religious education in general this Church has been peculiarly zealous in late years. It has some of the best appointed and most admirably equipped Sabbath School Departments in America, making special provision for infants' and beginners' work.

There is probably not a Church in the United States in which the members are more loyal to their doctrines than are Presbyterians. While strict Calvinism, with its tendency to fatalism (so regarded by many outside the folds of this sect) has been somewhat modified in the light of modern conceptions of the Almighty, most of the members of this body hold to a rigid interpretation of predestination—and they are usually ready to give Scriptural authority for the same, most notably Romans 9:11-12, "For whom He did foreknow He also did predestinate", etc. It is rather singular that this orthodox denomination should be considered by outsiders merely or largely in the light of this single doctrine, though it could hardly be esteemed the primary Presbyterian doctrine, nor is it peculiar to this faith.

From an educational and cultural standpoint, the ministry of this Church takes high rank. The Presbyterians have always stood for an "educated ministry" and many of the leading scholars of Christendom have been of this faith.

One of the oldest, most dignified and best edited religious papers in America—in fact, what is probably the finest Church family newspaper in the country—is The Christian Observer, a weekly Presbyterian periodical published in Louisville, Ky., for it is in a true and worthy sense a paper for the whole household, young, middle-aged and old.

Many contend that St. Paul, himself not of the original Apostolic band, first instituted the Presbyterian form of Church polity, with lay deacons and elders, as opposed to the "orders of the ministry" of these groups (deacons and elders). In fact, the great Episcopal and Presbyterian bodies are separated largely by reason of interpretation regarding "orders", the former holding that the "Episcopos" of Scripture is a distinctive office of the sacred ministry, above that of the "Presbyteros", while the latter regard the two as interchangeable, the "bishop" being a "Presbyter" (priest) and the "elders" being the ruling lay body of the local church, and not "priests" or "ministers" in the Church.

During the War between the States the Northern and Southern Presbyterians separated, and have remained in two distinctive bodies ever since, though there is a decided tendency towards unity.

All honor to this great body in its loyalty to Christ and the Holy Bible.

Nursing In Wrangell, Alaska.

Mary Merrick Williams.

I shall never forget the approach to Wrangell a gloriously clear day in April, 1926, after several rainy days at sea. The Island has a charming setting, surrounded by mountains which were white from a recent fall of snow. The woods, a brilliant green and the grass luscious after so much rain. The brilliant yellow of the Skunk Flowers added just the touch, and at the top of the hill overlooking all this stands The Wrangell General Hospital.

It was opened this year and made possible by Bishop Rowe and the Episcopal Church. It is well-governed by a Board of Directors of Wrangell men, and enthusiastically supported by all the citizens.

Our patients came from the town and surrounding parts; also the neighboring canneries, and represented many nationalities. The Hospital can, at the present time, accommodate twenty, with rooms on the top floor which can be utilized if needed. A Men's and a Women's Ward; a well equipped nursery; five private rooms with baths, which have been beautifully furnished by local organizations. A splendid X-Ray with Fleuroscope, which Department has meant so much to the Hospital. A modern Fracture Bed, also a gift, which has been occupied by different patients since the opening of the Hospital and has added greatly to their comfort. Our warm friends at Wrangell have added much by gifts of jellies, fish, flowers, linen, etc.

The Bishop visited us early in the summer and again this fall. Also Dr. Walsh, of Nome, who handled so successfully the diphtheria epidemic of last winter. Dr. Will Mayo and many others, who seemed delighted with the hospital and the work it is doing.

The first summer has been a great success and I am sure things will continue to run smoothly. There is a great need for such an institution and I am convinced that it will play a part in the future of Southeastern Alaska. It has been an inspiration to us all to be working under Bishop Rowe and thus play a small part in the wonderful work he is doing, for Alaska.

Lent Is Opportunity.

It is true that all experience is opportunity. There is nothing which happens to any one of us which may not bring us nearer to God and make us more worthy to be His sons. If we meet with prosperity and success we may find the sources of gratitude which lift up to God, we may find broader experience and finer culture and understand the things of God. If we meet with sorrow and affliction, with misfortune and pain, we may find in them the means of revealing more deeply God's love as we find opportunity for growth in faith, patience and courage. All experience is opportunity. Every event comes as a prophet of the Most High, uttering to us the message of divine things.

But just as in all the varied experiences some utter their cry loudly and insistently, while others can scarcely make it heard above the din of the busy streets, so it is in the revolving of the year and the passing of the various seasons of the Church's life. All are opportunity. The long, peaceful, course of the Trinity season may minister to quiet upbuilding of life; but its opportunity must be earnestly sought. Its cry does not always make itself heard above the noisy interests of ordinary life. The prophet is in the wilderness, and but an echo of his voice reaches the centers of activity, or the prophet is hustled and jostled by the thronging crowd and no one notices his efforts to be heard. But not so in Lent. Like Amos bringing quiet to the noisy worshippers of Bethel, compelling the hearing of his words, Lent comes to us. We must listen. We cannot help ourselves. Lent is opportunity. No one of us can doubt it or fail to know.

But we may fail to take the opportunity. We may know that here is an opportunity to think deeply upon the real meaning of life to strive to make clearer the ideals which guide, to put some one or more of our worst inward foes under foot, trampled to death, and to be drawn in heart and mind nearer to God. We may recognize this opportunity, we may hear the voice, and we may go upon our way utterly unmoved. If such be our case, the loss is ours; yes, and Christ's and His Church's.—The Pacific Churchman.

Some Things Missions Have Done.

They have made the name of Christ the best known name in the world.

They are proclaiming the Gospel in over ten thousand different places.

They have planted in the leading foreign lands the Church of Christ, with a Protestant membership of over 2,644,-170.

They have created a great system of Christian schools and colleges, having a present enrollment of over a million and a half pupils in these institutions.

They have stimulated the governments of the leading nations of the east to establish educational systems of their own.

They have introduced modern medicine, surgery and sanitation into the darkest quarters of the globe, by means of six hundred and seventy-five hospitals and nine hundred and sixty-three dispensaries.

They have been the principal agents of relief in famines, and have made scientific investigation of the causes which lie at their root.

They have taught people habits of cleanliness and the laws of health, thus lessening the spread of plague and pestilence.

They have established a multitude of trade schools in which development of Christian character keeps pace with growth in manual skill.

They have helped to abolish human slavery and shown the Christian way of caring for the aged, orphans, blind, deaf mutes, insane and lepers.

They have lifted women from a condition of unspeakable degradation, and trained a new generation of Christian mothers, wives, and daughters, who are making homes and introducing new ideals of social life.

They have translated the entire Bible, or portions of the Scriptures, into five hundred languages and dialects, distributing last year alone 9,-272,221 copies.

They have reduced many strange tongues to writing and have created a literature for whole races, producing annually a vast amount of good reading in the shape of books, hymnals, and papers for all ages.

They have transformed the people of the Fiji Islands, Melanesia, and other island groups from cannibals to civilized beings.—India Alliance.

Return.

In Memoriam Frank L. Stanton:
Poet-Friend.

Lilla Vass Shepherd.

Gently, gently, breezes, blow
Over him whose voice you know;
Cradle with your woodsiest strain
Song among its own again.

Doubtless now your ether wings
Bring him other lovely things
While his wistful measure fills
To the rhythm of the hills.

Yet I think his own could be Never weaned quite utterly
From the ways of friendly feet
Down some old familiar street:

Who knows that a blue-bell still
May not summon him at will,
Or the kindlier breath of spring
Be another's welcoming!

The Song of Love.

Psalm 116:1—"I love the Lord."

Young love is buoyant, enthusiastic and excitable. It has to be tested in order to be purified. The depth and intensity of the Psalmist's love are discoverable from the experiences recorded in these verses. Death compassed him about, he was brought low and the Lord had heard the voice of his supplication.

To know the completeness of love one must prove the love of another, and David had found the love of God constant and true in every trial. Often religion is too formal, like a society reception or a dress parade, and God becomes a distant deity without any personal significance for the individual soul. What a contrast to this Psalm! "I love the Lord"—sweet, gracious, intimate.

"God is love" is the absolute truth in which religion finds its origin. Prayer is, therefore, the response of love to love. There is no conclusive argument for prayer nor is there any final argument against it. In fact, there are some things about which one does not argue, like fresh air, sunshine and harvests. They are there to be used or abused, and the presence of God is as all enfolding as the sunlight.

No other influence can compare with love in its power to bless humanity. It gives, serves, sacrifices even unto death. Philosophy reflects and analyzses, while Love sows the seeds and gathers in the harvests. It is not any kind of love. In this we cannot be mistaken. It is the Love of God revealed in Jesus Christ. His life of love is the most glorious event in history, and in praise of this love sweet songs have been written in every age. "We must love Him too and try His works to do."—Presbyterian Banner.

The Art of Living Together.

Unless the world learns the art of living together, the world is not going to get anywhere, either in its thinking or in its doing. We have learned the art of fighting together, either along with each other or fighting against each other, and we have learned the art of dying together. That was done and done remarkably well recently, but the art of living together is much more difficult, and we have not yet learned that art, but we must, or there is no possibility of the world's reaching any goal whatsoever. Where there is the will to dominate on the part of the individual or the nation, it is impossible for people to live together in the right way. Similarly, there is the spirit of self-determination, than which there is no more destructive agent. When each people or each nation takes unto itself the power to live as an isolated self-determined unit—in that way lies madness; it is but the wedge that will split asunder and destroy the whole world.

Under the different colors and races learn the art of living together, there is a grave possibility of war, far more terrific than the Great War. If we are to have one goal for one world, then we must have that goal such that every part of the world will be working toward it. When we talk of the white race and all its great achievements, we must remember what the rest of the world has done, that there was a great Chinese nation before we had clothes, and that Japan was a power long before there ever was the Christian religion. We must try to see the best in each other, and not the worst; we must discover the plan of open diplomacy and of meeting together to discuss our differences. There will be sharp differences at first, of course, but out of these will come the art of living together. When we see that in making a world we need the idea of this race, the note of that race, the color of another race, and the civilization of still another race, that we need all to make up the picture, then, and then only, shall we have learned the art, the divine art, of living together.—Archdeacon Fotheringham, in "The Advertiser", London, Ont.

Where Go the Boats?

Dark brown is the river,
Golden is the sand.
It flows along forever,
With trees on either hand.

Green leaves a-floating,
Castles of the foam,
Boats of mine a-boating—
Where will all come home?

On goes the river
And out past the mill,
Away down the valley,
Away down the hill.

Away down the river,
A hundred miles or more,
Other little children
Shall bring my boats ashore.

—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Before every young heart God raises the vision of some Jerusalem on its hill-top. Not, indeed, the same to all men, nor the same to men in all times. It was only one who could be a Christ. It was only at one time that a Christ could die for the world. Only once could a Columbus discover the one continent and a Livingstone explored the other. There are some things done for ever. Here and there men could say, It is finished.—Selected.

For the Young Folks

The Worth of a Boy.

Some value a boy by the work he can do
At the house and the barn and the wood-pile, too.
Some count up the cost of his board and his clothes,
And doubt if he pays for his keep, I suppose.

The work is all right; he should do what he can;
But the worth of the boy is in making the man.
The future will tell, be he large or but small,
If he's worth a whole world or nothing at all.

Let him set his mark high, and then press to the goal
With all of the might of his body and soul.
And you'll see by the light which his coming day gives,
He will make the world move by the life that he lives.

There's a station of honor, a position of trust,
Awaiting the boy who is faithful and just.
And the great God of heaven looks down through all space
For the one faithful boy who will fill that one place.

And you, my dear lad, though you know not the way,
May be chosen to fill that position some day.
The worth of a boy, whate'er his expense,
Is not to be reckoned by dollars and cents.

Would you know his real value, mark the price that was paid
When to ransom his soul Christ died in his stead,
You ask why such ransom a poor boy would bring,
This is the secret, "He's the child of a King."

LITTLE TALKS ABOUT THE BEST FRIEND.

Jesus and the Children.

M. L. G.

Suppose we were to make a list of the children whom we know to have been with Jesus during His ministry. It would be something like this:

The daughter of Jairus,

The lad who gave his loaves and fishes,

The child whom He set in the midst of His disciples,

The children whom He took in His arms and blessed,

The boy whom He healed at the foot of the Mount of Transfiguration.

The children in the crowd shouting Hosanna at His entry into Jerusalem.

Besides these, He healed two who did not see Him, the nobleman's son and the daughter of the Syro-Phoenician woman. And there were children in every multitude He moved among, to feed, to heal or to teach.

Don't you think those children would keep always in their memory that loving face bending over them, those strong and gentle hands, the tones they could understand even better than His words? When we think of the glory that touched their young lives, it is no wonder we say,

"I wish that His hands had been placed on my head,
That His arms had been thrown around me".

But here are two words of His that show us how truly we may have Him:

"Lo, I am with you always," and

"Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed."

This is the blessedness we can feel more than those little ones did. To know He is near, though we do not see Him; to speak to Him in prayer and be sure that He hears—in these ways we may follow Him as surely as the boys and girls of Galilee, and just as freely receive His blessing and His power.

The Princess Who Lost Her Crown.

Once upon a time, in a far country, there lived a little princess named Veridian. She hadn't been the daughter of a king long, so she wasn't a very dignified princess. Her grandfather, the late king, had just died, which made her father the new king. The coronation had not yet taken place, so Veridian didn't see why she should be dignified.

She was an only child, and, princesses not being allowed to play with other children, she had no playmates. It is true she had six pages who constantly attended her, but princesses aren't ever supposed to play with servants. And besides they were boys.

Every day Veridian had to sit in her great, quiet room and read history while she practiced wearing her royal crown. One page turned the leaves of the big book, one stood by the door, one amused the royal kitten, and the other three stood solemnly behind her stiff chair to catch the crown if it should slip, which it often did.

It was a very unusual and valuable crown, set with many precious jewels. People admired it very much everybody but the princess. When she wore it she had to sit still, and it gave her a headache.

One afternoon she sat reading her history and trying very hard not to look out of her open windows at the birds that were building their nests in the royal garden outside. She knew there was a perfectly lovely cherry tree under one of her windows and it was nearly cherry time.

Suddenly a big fat robin lit right on her window-sill. The princess was so surprised she clapped her hands with joy. Off went the crown with its precious jewels winking merrily as it rolled across the room, making the prettiest tinkly noise. And after it merrily went the royal kitten. Of course all the noise quite scared away the robin.

"Oh, lovely!" cried the princess, watching the three pages scamper after the crown. "Please roll it some more. The kitten likes it."

And what do you suppose they did with that most royal crown? First one of those pages and then another rolled it. Veridian played too. Wasn't the crown hers? How they all laughed!

Next they were actually tossing it into the air to see the royal kitten leap after it! Then, suddenly, when Veridian tossed it, it sailed right out of the window and disappeared. All the pages immediately ran down into the garden, but, search as they could, it was nowhere to be found. They even pulled up some of the rose bushes in their search. The royal kitten helped too.

Poor little Veridian leaned out of the window and watched them. What became of people who played with royal crowns and lost them just before coronations?

She tried her best to encourage the trembling pages, but all she could say was, "O dear! O dear"! which certainly wasn't very encouraging.

By and by the bell rang for tea, and they knew the garden would be quite dark afterwards. There was nothing to do but to tell the king. A very tearful procession presented itself just as he and the queen and the ministers of state and a few generals were about to drink tea.

"Your Royal Highness," wept Veridian, "the royal crown went right out of the window, and we can't find it."

"What! What!" said the king.

"What! What! What!" said all the ministers of state.

"It did," repeated Veridian—which was true. "It sailed right out of the window."

All the pages nodded their heads.

"Then it must have been bewitched," said the lord high chief prime minister. This upset the king so that he drank the cream instead of his tea and never knew the difference.

"Order the gardens searched and all the witches arrested immediately," ordered the king as he buttered a slice of cheese. "We have a week before the coronation ceremonies, and it must and shall be found."

Four or five generals marched out to see that his orders were obeyed. The king added, "We must not let this interfere with our tea", and he spread jam on his buttered cheese. This shows how upset he was, for who ever heard of anybody eating a slice of buttered cheese and jam—especially a king!

"As for Veridian," said the queen, who had her own ideas about crowns that sailed, "see that she stays in her room until the crown is found."

All that night and all the next day they searched the garden, but not a trace of that crown did they find. The soldiers arrested all the witches in the kingdom.

If the princess wasn't crowned she could never be a truly royal person, and how could they make a copy of the lost crown without having it to look at!

Poor little Veridian stayed all alone in her big room—except for her six pages and the royal kitten. They spent most of their time watching the soldiers search.

One day, however, the search was given up. Then they had nothing to watch but the birds.

"O dear, I wish it was time for supper," sighed Veridian.

"I think the cherries are ripe," suggested a page.

"I love cherries," said the princess.

"I'll go and ask the lord chief gardener for some," replied the page.

"Let me get some," said another page.

"I'm the best climber, and I'll fill my cap."

The others watched him from the window until he disappeared.

All of a sudden there came a most awful screeching, and out of the cherry tree flew two robins, and right down that cherry tree came the page.

The noise brought the lord high chief gardener and all the just plain gardeners and twenty-three guardsmen.

"I've found the crown! I've found the crown!" cried the page.

Down the stairs tumbled Veridian and the pages helter-skelter into the garden. The king, the queen and all the court ran into the garden.

"It's up in the cherry tree," danced the page. "It's stuck up there, and a robin has built a nest in it!"

"One of the gardeners must get a ladder and bring it down," commanded the king.

"Oh, the poor robins!" cried the princess and the pages.

A ladder was brought, and an assistant gardener mounted it. But he came down without the crown.

"There are four little baby birds in it," he whispered.

"What of it!" said the king, "send up the lord chief gardener.

Then the lord chief gardener went up the tree, but he came down again without the crown.

"The mother bird has just returned," he whispered.

"Oh, please, don't disturb her, Your Highness," begged Veridian.

"I shall have to," said the king. "I'll do it myself."

So up the tree went the king. The whole court listened breathlessly. Down the ladder came the king, and he had only a few cherries.

"Whoever heard of a bird building a nest in a royal crown!" he said. "Of course, it must come down. The question is—whose duty is it to remove bird's nests from crowns?"

Everybody was very quiet.

"Won't any one bring it down?" asked the king.

Everybody was just as quiet.

"Then," he announced, "it will have to stay up there until the young birds fly away."

"Nonsense!" said the queen.

"But what about the coronation?" asked the prime minister.

"It can be postponed," said the princess, clapping her hands.

"I still don't see how it got up the tree," murmured the queen.

"It must have fallen off her head. Let's all go in to tea," said the king.

The court formed a procession and marched solemnly out of the garden, leaving twelve guardsmen around the tree. The crown jewels winked at the happy robins as they sang their evening song in time with the tinkling chimes that were ringing to call the court to tea.—Youth's Companion.

For the Southern Churchman.

Kazank and the Cough-Drop.

Louis Tucker.

Once upon a time there was an extraordinarily able and intelligent, red-headed ant by the name of "Kazank", who lived in the second largest ant city in Mr. John Smith's front yard. The city's name was Squeville. One morning, on the right edge of the gravel walk, near the front gate, Kazank found a red-cross cough-drop with a hole in it, and that hole was just large enough for her to sleep in. I say "Her", because all working-ants are old maids. So Kazank pre-empted the cough-drop and took it for her own and climbed into the hole and lived there and would not go home any more. Whenever she wanted anything to drink, she sipped dew-drops; and whenever she wanted anything to eat, she turned over and licked the roof of the cough-drop cave, which was very nourishing.

Now Kazank had been sent out from the city to get the left hind leg of a green grasshopper for the Queen's breakfast; so when she did not come back, the Queen grew very hungry and sent for her. It took them two days to find her, for she would not answer when they called. Squeville, like all ant-cities, has a curfew-law; and when the first night came and the search-parties came back without her, they thought she must have been caught in south, east, west and midways in between, for they always did that when a spider's deb, and so next morning they sent out rescue-expeditions, north, north-west rescue expedition found her, she hid in the cough-drop and would not come. She said she was going to start a city of her own. So they tried to pull her out of the cough-drop and take her by force, but they couldn't; they tried to take the cough-drop with her in it, but it was too heavy. And when they went home, Kazank stuck her head out of the cough-drop and laughed at them.

From that time on, she lived a wonderful life for seven days, which is a very long time for an ant. She had worked hard all her life, but now she had a vacation and holiday with nothing at all to do; and when she got hungry, she ate some of her cough-drop. At the end of seven days, though, it clouded up to rain; and it rained and it rained and it rained and it rained and the water ran along the gravel walk and melted the cough-drop; and poor Kazank had to swim ashore and cling to the underside of a violet leaf or she would have drowned. When the storm was over, she went back to the city of Squeville, but they would not let her in, so she lived in the grass all summer and ate what she could get. When autumn came, she went to Squeville again, but they would not let her in; so she sat on the ant-hill and mourned, and the first frost froze her quite stiff. And so the other ants learned from her what a great many rich men don't know, and that is that you must not stop work even if you do find a cough-drop.

"I Happied Him Up."

Agnes is a little girl with such a bright, happy face that it is a pleasure to look at her.

One day, in answer to her mother's call, she came running home from a neighbor's two or three doors away.

Her eyes were bright, her lips so smiling that her mother smiled, too.

"Do you want me, mother?" asked Agnes.

"No, dear," said her mother. "Not for anything important. Where were you, daughter?"

"At the Browns. And, O Mother, Walter was cross, but I happied him up so that he got all over it; and then the baby cried, and I had to happy her up; then some one stepped on the kitten's tail, and I was going to happy her up when you called me."

The mother laughed. "Why, what a happying time you have had! It must make you happy yourself to happy up little boys and babies and kittens, for you look as happy as possible."

And this is true. The more we try to make others happy, the happier we shall be ourselves. Then put away frowns and pouting lips. Try to "happy up" those who are troubled, cross or sick, and your face will shine with smiles.—Selected.

The Boy That Laughs.

I know a funny little boy—
The funniest ever born:
His face is like a beam of joy,
Although his clothes are torn.

I saw him tumble on his nose,
And waited for a groan—
But how he laughed. Do you suppose
He struck his funny bone?

There's sunshine in each word he speaks:
His laugh is something grand;
Its ripples overrun his cheeks
Like waves on snowy sand.

He laughs the moment he awakes,
And till the day is done;
The schoolroom for a joke he takes—
The lessons are but fun.

No matter how the day may go,
You cannot make him cry;
He's worth a dozen boys I know,
Who pout and mope and sigh.

—Wide Awake.

His First Buffalo.

Tell us a story, Aunt Nan!" cried the children, crowding around my knee.

"An adventure story," begged Billy.

"No, an animal story," pleaded Ruth.

"Ruth and Billy always want them about boys having adventures or about animals," said Peggy. "Tell us one about a girl, Aunt Nan, do!"

"Well, well," said I, "so you each one want something different. Still, I think I know one that will please you all. It has a boy, a buffalo, and a little girl in it. How's that?"

Oh, tell us it!" exclaimed all three.

"Years ago," I began, "pioneers who lived on the Western plains saw buffaloes in plenty—Indians, too, and outlaws. A very hard time they had of it. When traveling from the East or from place to place in the West on the lookout for a good spot on which to build a new home, they journeyed in wagon trains. Each wagon was of the prairie schooner kind covered with canvas and drawn by several teams of horses or oxen. The men traveled on horseback or sat on the high seat in the front of the wagons and drove the horses while the women and children rode inside."

"I know; I've seen them in picture books," put in Billy wisely.

"So you have," I answered. "Well, one day a band of three wagons going to Kansas joined a caravan, or wagon train, going to the same place in order to have greater protection if they should be attacked by Indians. There were signs of them lurking about; and as for the buffaloes, immense herds of them thundered away a few miles in the distance every day or so. One night when the wagon train made camp on the bank of the Platte River and everybody was busy, some unharnessing and caring for the horses, some bathing in the stream, some cutting wood, some making fires, and some cooking food or preparing to eat, little Mamie Perkins' brother began crying for a drink.

"'Bring up a bucketful from the river,' said the mother.

"Mamie had just time to reach the water and fill her wooden pail when a monster buffalo came charging into camp. He was bellowing and snorting with rage and upset everything that stood in his path. The men fired at his huge, swiftly moving body, but the shots went wild. Little Mamie was on her way back just as he tore through the camp and, swerving to one side, rushed down the trail leading to the river. She knew nothing of the terrible visitor till he had swept through the astonished camp and was coming straight at her. She dropped her bucket and stood still, too frightened to move. With head down, tail high in the air, and hoofs pounding out a terrible tattoo on the hard earth of the plains, the buffalo came toward her at furious speed. Not one of the men knew little Mamie was at the river, for they had neither seen her go nor missed her from the camp, so none of them tried to follow and save her from the maddened creature."

"Oh, don't let him get her, Aunt Nan!" begged kind-hearted Ruth.

"He didn't get her, dear. A boy saved her, a boy who happened to be riding as an extra hand to help with the freight. He had heard Mrs. Perkins send Mamie for the water as he lay tired and half asleep under a wagon behind her. His name was William Cody—"

"Buffalo Bill!" cried my wee Billy.

"That's who it was," said I, "though he wasn't called by that name yet. He ran out, rifle in hand, and, sure shot that he was, steadied his gun coolly, aimed, fired, and the great buffalo lurched, staggered, and fell to the earth not ten feet away from the little girl, who broke out sobbing in relief.

"Goody!" cried the children.

"Didn't every one think Buffalo Bill was very brave?" asked Peggy.

"Yes, dear, they did. I suspect he feared he might be thanked quite a bit for what he had done, because he picked up Mamie's pail and went back to the river to fill it with water again, while some men who had run down carried Mamie to camp. When he came back with the water, men and women were loud in his praises (you may be sure Mamie's mother was); so he just set the bucket down and went away to his tent, where he stayed till morning. That was his first buffalo, and of course he must have been proud of his skill; but though he was brave and manly, he was modest, too, and no one that day or ever afterwards heard the great scout of the plains boast."—Greta Gaskin Bidlake, in The Presbyterian.

How Many Stitches.

A pocket handkerchief to hem—
Oh, dear! Oh, dear! Oh, dear!
How many stitches it will take,
Before it's done, I fear!

Yet set a stitch and then a stitch,
And stitch and stitch away,
Till stitch by stitch the hem is done—
And after work is play.

—Christina G. Rossetti.

Keeping Still.

"Fred," said Aunt Julia, "how is it that you never quarrel, as many other boys do?"

"Oh, I don't talk back," answered Fred. "When a boy says a sharp thing to me, I just keep still."

It is always a good plan to keep still when somebody else is angry. Next time any one gets angry with you, just try this plan. Many boys and girls are constantly getting into trouble because they use their tongues too freely.—Selected.

MRS. EDWARD V. VALENTINE.

A Memorial.

A memorial to MRS. EDWARD V. VALENTINE, Christ's faithful soldier and servant unto life's end.

The members of St. James' Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary wish to express their deep sorrow and sense of loss on the death of Mrs. Katherine C. Valentine, who was treasurer of this branch from its formation.

In all this time her interest in the Church's mission has been unfailing, and was an inspiration to all who knew her.

Her declining health during the last few years was not permitted to interfere with her usefulness, or her attendance at church.

We thank God for her good example, and extend our sincere sympathy to her family.

Resolved, That this memorial be recorded in our Minutes, that a copy be sent to her daughter, and, also, that it be published in The Southern Churchman.

ANNA B. BOYKIN,
Corresponding Secretary for St. James' Branch.

MRS. MARGERY PORTERFIELD TAYLOR

Entered into life eternal, February 27, 1927, at her home, the residence of Dr. John Dunn, Richmond, Virginia, MARGERY PORTERFIELD TAYLOR, daughter of the late John Porterfield and Mary E. Shapard, his wife, of Nashville, Tenn., and widow of the late James Taylor, of Newport, Kentucky.

Mrs. Taylor is survived by five grandchildren, J. A. Humphreys, Jr., of Louisville; James Taylor, of La Junta, Colorado; Irby M. Taylor, of Dallas, Texas, and Mrs. Elam and Elizabeth Taylor, of Mansfield, La.; also, by her sisters, Mrs. M. A. Spurr, of Nashville; Miss Porterfield and Mrs. John Dunn, of Richmond, and one brother, William Porterfield, of Orange, Va.

Services were held in Richmond and in Newport, where the interment took place.

Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.

JOHN A. RUFFIN.

Resolutions.

Whereas, It has pleased Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, in His infinite wisdom and love, to call to the rest and peace of Paradise, his faithful servant, JOHN A. RUFFIN, November 3, 1926, we, sorrowing that another link is broken with the earthly days of our parish life, yet rejoicing in the thought of his present blessed state, and

Whereas, We are grieved for the great loss to our parish, church and community, of one, who, for many years has served Westover Church, Charles City County, Va., as Vestryman and Warden, and as Treasurer for thirty-three years, do hereby Resolve, First, That in the death of Mr. Ruffin, Westover Church has lost one who was ever loyal to, and constant in his attendance upon the services of that church;

Second, That our community has lost a citizen in whom no higher type of Christian gentleman could be found; whose broad charity, warm heart, integrity of character, generous spirit and unfailing hospitality fashioned one whom "to know was to love". His passing leaves a vacancy which cannot be filled, but his memory will be treasured by many loving hearts. And be it further

Resolved, That we extend to his family our tender sympathy and with them mourn their loss and request that a copy of these resolutions be sent to the family, a copy placed on the records of the Church and a copy be sent to The Southern Churchman for publication.

Funeral services and cremation at Piedmont, where his associates in city service greatly valued his friendship.

JAQUELINE MARSHALL BRAXTON.

JAQUELINE MARSHALL BRAXTON, son of Elliott M. Braxton and Anna M. Marshall, was born October 24, 1869, in Fredericksburg, Va., died in Jacksonville, Florida, January 28, 1927.

He was Sunday-school superintendent and vestryman of St. John's Church for many years. His faith from early childhood sustained him in life and death. He loved his Church, his fellowman, state and county. Success came to him in his engineering work, and also honors.

God called him to higher service. His memory will be cherished by his widow, Eva Patterson, two sons, Carter M. and Jaqueline M.; brothers, sisters and many friends. They rejoice in his eternal happiness.

Dr. Witsell Goes To Little Rock.

The Rev. W. P. Witsell, D. D., has resigned as rector of St. Paul's Church, Waco, to accept the rectorship of Christ Church, Little Rock, Arkansas, and expects to take up his new work about April 1.

Dr. Witsell has been rector of St. Paul's Church for nearly sixteen years, and his work in Waco has been marked by zeal and consecrated effort.

The membership of St. Paul's parish has practically doubled during his rectorship.

During the time that he has been a resident of Waco, Dr. Witsell has found time to take an active part in many of the undertakings that contributed to Waco's welfare and progress.

At a recent meeting of the vestry the resignation of the Rev. Walter Loflin, assistant minister of St. Paul's, effective at once, was received. He began his work at St. Paul's in September of last year and made many friends during his brief stay.

Lenten Pilgrimage Services.

The clergy of Fort Worth, Texas, have arranged a series of Friday-night Pilgrimage services for the season of Lent, in addition to their individual parish programs. The congregations make the round of the churches, a different one each week, and there unite in saying the Litany, singing hymns, and hearing an address on "Personal Religion" by the priest of another parish. A similar program, undertaken for the first time last year, proved so successful in furthering mutual good feeling and cooperation among both clergy and laity that it is being repeated this year.

All Saints' Hospital Campaign.

All Saints' Episcopal Hospital, Fort Worth, Texas, which was started about thirty years ago by a small band of devout Churchwomen with the idea of providing especially for the sick poor of the city, and is now a diocesan institution, is organizing a city-wide campaign for $150,000 to pay for a recent addition to the buildings which will bring the institution up to the rank of a one hundred bed hospital, fully equipped with all modern facilities. This is the second addition to the original building, besides a large nurses' home on the same grounds erected a few years ago. The hospital extends an entire city block in one direction and a half block in another. This is the first time in thirty years that it has appealed to the general public for money for building purposes. An additional $75,000 is expected from the diocese. Bishop Moore dedicated the new unit of the building a month ago when the Diocesan Council met in Fort Worth. All Saints stands high in the regard of the public for the highest technical efficiency and excellent management. The nurses' school always has from twenty-five to thirty pupils, and the number will be increased with the opening of the new building next month.

The Young People's Work.

Miss Dorothy M. Fischer, the Organizing Secretary for Young People's Work for the Province of the Southwest, spent a busy four hours in the Diocese of Springfield on Saturday, February 26, attending a luncheon given by the Department of Religious Education of the Diocese, and which afforded some of the young people and others an opportunity to meet another of the Church's outstanding leaders in work with young people. The Bishop and four or five of the clergy were present, as well as one or two boys and girls from the eight or nine parish young people's societies. The young people's work in the Diocese is now a little over two years old. Something definite is being accomplished, but there is still much to be done.

Archdeacon Weller assumed the rectorship of the Church of the Redeemer, Cairo, March 1. For the time being the Archdeacon is holding on to his many other pieces of work, particularly overseeing the final construction of the Church plant at West Frankfort, and the new plant going up at Herrin, and looking after the final things to be done in connection with the completion of the plant at Carbondale.

Bishop Ivins Preaches To Three Congregations at Same Time.

The Rt. Rev. B. F. P. Ivins, D. D., had the unique experience of preaching to three congregations at one time Sunday morning February 27, at Christ Church, Eau Claire, the Rev. Dr. F. E. Wilson, rector. There was the regular congregation—a large one which filled the church building; the complete service was broadcast through station WTAQ, reaching an indeterminate number of people outside; and there was a group of deaf people in the front pews to whom the sermon was translated in the sign language by an interpreter while it was being delivered.

The congregation at Shell Lake, a hundred miles away, held their service early and adjourned to the home of one of their congregation where they heard the entire service from Christ Church by radio.

A large class was presented to the Bishop for confirmation by the rector, including eight deaf mutes specially presented through the sign language by the Rev. Geo. F. Flick, of Chicago. A beautiful rood beam was unveiled at the same service by Bishop Ivins, being the gift of Mrs. John S. Owen in memory of her little daughter, Mildred Shaw.

Sunday afternoon Bishop Ivins confirmed a class at St. Simeon's Church, Melville, and in the evening a third class at Chippewa Falls. The bishop returned to Eau Claire on Monday to address a parish dinner in Christ Church house, where the newly confirmed people were guests of the Men's Club of the Parish.

Personal Notes

The Bishop of Washington has appointed the Rev. Jackson L. Cole, formerly rector of St. Matthew's Parish, Enosburg Falls, Vermont, and now taking post-graduate course at the Virginia Theological Seminary, as vicar of Trinity Diocesan Church, Washington, D. C. Mr. Cole is a graduate of Nashotah House in Wisconsin, and has been attached to the Diocese of Vermont since 1920.

The Bishop of Springfield appointed the Rev. H. R. Ziegler, who has been for the last few years in the Southern Illinois Mission Field, minister-in-charge of St. Bartholomew's Church, Granite City, Ill., in succession to the Rev. W. H. Tomlins, recently resigned.

The Rev. Paul O. Plenckner has resigned his rectorship of William and Mary Parish at Wayside, Charles County, Maryland, to become rector of St. Luke's Church, Phillipsburg, N. J.

The Rev. W. Hamilton Aulenbach, until recently assistant at St. Asaph's, Bala, Penn., has been appointed assistant at St. Paul's Church, Flint, Michigan.

The Rev. W. H. Tomlins has resigned St. Bartholomew's Mission, Granite City, Ill., after having charge for fifteen years and retires after over fifty years in the ministry, in the eightieth year of his age.

The Rev. Benjamin S. Lassiter, of Marion, N. C., is conducting the services and preaching at Calvary Church, Fletcher, near Asheville, N. C., during the absence of the rector, the Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, Jr., who is at St. Petersburg, Florida, at the Hotel Soreno for the month of March.

The address of the Rev. J. W. Woessner is changed from South Manchester, Conn., to Camden, N. Y.

The Rev. Basil S. Daugherty, formerly in charge of St. Elizabeth's Church, Moldredge, Neb., has accepted a call to be vicar of St. Paul's Church, Omaha, Neb., and assistant to Bishop Shayler.

The Rev. H. Blake Hadlow, formerly rector of St. Mark's, Yreka, Calif., is now in charge of St. Luke's, Auburn, Calif., and the Placer County Missions. His new address is Auburn, Calif.

The Rev. J. Lamb Doty, formerly rector of Church of the Holy Apostles, Hilo, Hawaii, is now on the staff of St. Andrew's Cathedral, Honolulu.

The Rev. Grant Gnauff has been appointed assistant to Archdeacon Weller, in the Diocese of Springfield, and it is expected he will be in the field, with residence at Carbondale, on March 20.

ORDINATIONS.

In the Cathedral of St. Mary and St. John, Manila, on Tuesday morning, January 25, the Feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, the Rev. Arthur Hall Richardson and the Rev. Benson Heale Harvey were ordained to the priesthood by the Rt. Rev. Gouverneur Frank Mosher, D. D., Bishop of the Philippine Islands. The candidates were presented by the Rev. William L. Ziadie, of St. Luke's Church, Manila. The Rev. Hobart E. Studley, of St. Stephen's Chinese Mission, read the gospel, and the Rev. Tipton Lee Wood, chaplain, United States Navy, read the epistle and the litany. The sermon and address to the candidates was delivered by the Bishop.

The Rev. Mr. Harvey was ordained to the diaconate at St. Stephen's Church, Wilkinsburg, Pa., on July 4, 1926, by the Bishop of Pittsburgh. The Rev. Arthur Hall Richardson was ordained to the diaconate by the Bishop of Vermont, on July 15, 1926, at St. Paul's Church, Burlington, Vt., of which his father, the Rev. George Lynde Richardson, is rector.

Mr. Richardson left Manila early in February, for work in Balbalasang, in the sub-province of Abra, Mountain Province, P. I. Mr. Harvey is to be acting rector in the Cathedral of St. Mary and St. John, Manila, until the appointment of a rector from the United States, after which he is to become diocesan missioner, the post for which he originally offered his services in this mission.

On Wednesday, February 16, the Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent, D. D., Bishop of Western New York, advanced to the priesthood the Rev. William Tutton in Grace Church, Buffalo. The candidate was presented by the rector, who was also the preacher. The litany was said by the Rev. G. Sherman Burrows, D. D., warden of DeLancey Divinity School, under whom Mr. Tutton prepared for orders. The epistle was read by the Rev. G. Paul Musselman, classmate of Mr. Tutton; the gospel by the Rev. Charles H. Smith, D. D. A score of the clergy of Buffalo and vicinity were present in the chancel to assist in the laying on of hands, together with a large representation of DeLancey undergraduates. Following the service a luncheon was served in the parish house, and Mr. Tutton was presented by the parish, of which he has been a life-long and faithful member, with a generous purse. He will leave Buffalo shortly for Dickinson, N. D., to serve in an important field under Bishop Tyler.

There's not a sweet note warbled here,
But minds us of Thy Love.
O Lord, our Lord, and spoiler of our foes,
There is no light but Thine: with Thee all beauty glows.

"Christ met Satan's temptations with messages from God's Word, and thus He shows one of the best ways to meet temptations. The Bible has a message concerning every evil that assails us. How wonderfully this should increase our appreciation of God's Word and our use of it! Surely it is a lamp unto our feet to show us the dangers of our way, and a light to shine upon our paths. We may surely rely upon the Bible, since Christ so often quoted from the Old Testament, and temptations lose their power and their attractiveness when the Bible tells us of God's love and warns us about Satan. The more we study the Bible and the more earnestly we obey its teachings, the stronger we grow in the struggles of life and the surer we become of God's loving guidance. From the Bible, also, we learn the use of the sacraments. In Baptism, we are made God's children, and in the Holy Communion we are given strength to conquer."—The Rev. Floyd W. Tompkins, D. D.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Where God is least wanted is where He is most needed.

The Holy One receives sinners, and only the Holy One can.—James Denney.

But the painful fact will show itself, not less curious than painful, that it is more difficult to forgive small wrongs than great ones.—George Macdonald.

Cares, riches and pleasures—these three, because of not being firmly and rightly handled, are crippling countless souls.—Rev. Wm. Porkess.

That life is most holy in which there is least of petition and desire and most of waiting upon God; that in which petition most often passes into thankfulness.—F. W. Robertson.

"To depart hence is not to perish, but to survive the perishing of all that was less real, the fading of all the shadows with which this life was darkened.

God takes men's hearty desires and will instead of the deed, where they have not power to fulfill it; but He never took the bare deed instead of the will.—Richard Baxter.

"'Tis always morning somewhere, and above
The awakening continents from shore to shore,
Somewhere the birds are singing evermore."

If God is light, here where the darkness often overclouds our days: If God is love, here where we often feel our loneliness; How will it be where we have His unclouded presence and His undying love makes our clear-seen and never-troubled joy?—Isaac Edwardson.

"I want to let go!"
But I will not let go!
There are battles to fight,
By day and by night;
For God and the right;
And I will not let go!
—Harriet E. Banning.

This is taken from "Little Flowers of St. Francis". "There is no tree in the world so thorny or so gnarled or so knotty that men cannot smooth it and polish it and trim it and make it fair to see: and even so there is not a man in this world so wicked or so great a sinner that God cannot convert him and adorn him with singular graces and with manifold gifts of virtue."

I know from experience the intellectual distractions of scientific research, philosophical speculation and artistic pleasures; but am also well aware that even when all are taken together and well sweetened to taste, in respect of consequent reputation, means, social position, etc., the whole concoction is but as high confectionery to a starving man . . . . There is a vacuum in the soul of man which nothing can fill save faith in God."—G. J. Romanes.

RELIGION AROUND THE WORLD

LAY EVANGELISTS—A THOUSAND STRONG—are apparently ready to go to work as a result of the Bishops' Crusade. This is indicated by the fact that already advance orders have been received for more than a thousand copies of Leon Palmer's book on this subject, although the volume is not yet off the press.

Of course, it is too soon to ascertain definitely the result of this movement in the Church, especially as it is not yet complete, many parishes not having finished their follow-up missions. There is, however, every reason to feel that it has proved a great awakening and will have a lasting effect by recruiting laymen, if in no other way.

FIXING EASTER BY LAW IS THE NOVEL PURPOSE of a bill recently introduced into the British Parliament, according to the following report from an English paper of recent date:

"No one denies the inconvenience of an Easter whose date varies over a range of five weeks. So generally are the advantages of a fixed anniversary recognized that a Committee of the League of Nations has recommended concurrence in the proposal which Mr. Wither's Bill will put before the House of Commons tomorrow. This would associate the feast with the Sunday following the second Saturday in April, and it has, among many classes of supporters, the special endorsement of educational and industrial authorities. Since no reasoned opposition is threatened, this seems a case in which the scanty sheaf of private members' legislation might very well have a useful measure added to it."

Most bills in Parliament are sponsored either by the "Government" or "the Opposition", but a few are known as "Private Members", not being of a sufficiently official character to be classed in either group.

Since this bill attempts to deal with a subject of extremely ancient origin it is likely to meet with serious opposition before becoming law. The observance of Easter has always been associated with that of the Jewish feast of the Passover, at which time our Saviour was crucified. The observance of its present date (the first Sunday after the first full moon, after the Equinox) was established by the Council of Nicea, in 325, after a long dispute in the Church.

WOMEN IN ENTIRE CHARGE OF A CHURCH SERVICE was the unusual spectacle that greeted the eyes of the congregation assembled in St. Timothy's Church, Chicago, on the night of March 6. According to a newspaper report:

"Chicago, March 7.—Women for the first time in the history of the Episcopal Church here, conducted the full service last night at St. Timothy's Church.

"The ceremonial, a part of the girls' and women's missionary crusade, had full approval of Bishop C. P. Anderson. It was performed by sixteen members of the Girls' Friendly Society.

"Miss Amelia Schottenhamel gave the principal address to an auditorium crowded with girls and women. The acolytes, flag-bearer, banner-bearers, readers, master of ceremonies, manager, ushers and the organist were all replaced by girls and women."

MAHATMA GHANDI HAS ORDERED READING OF THE NEW TESTAMENT in all the Swaraj schools, for which he is being severely criticised by the old Brahmins in the Indian press. This report comes through a special correspondent by way of China. It is well-known that Ghandi is fond of quoting the words of Jesus. So far he has always drawn a sharp distinction between Christ and Christianity, asserting that the latter is Christ's teaching plus a great deal of European interpretation. We have sufficient confidence in the drawing power of the personality of Jesus to feel sure that if the natives of India get acquainted with Him through the reading of the New Testament, they will form a Church that will be good for their souls, whether it be conventional Christianity as we know it or not.

INVESTIGATION OF MANNA IN THE WILDERNESS is about to be undertaken on a scientific basis by a party going into the Sinai Peninsula to study atmospheric and other conditions prevailing there. This is the age of discovery and investigation of ancient things, and two independent expeditions are being fitted out to search for the ancient Ark of the Covenant. The one having applied to the Transjordania Department of the Palestine Government for a concession on Mount Nebo; the other starting to explore the interior of Abyssinia on the same errand. The lifting of the cloud that obscured sacred places through the opposition of the Turkish Government for four centuries has given a tremendous impetus to research in many lines, and there is no telling what the pick and shovel, directed by learned minds, may reveal in the next few years.

PRAYER BOOK REVISION IN ENGLAND has aroused so great an interest among the general public there that this book of ancient formularies is reported to have assumed the position of a "best seller" during the past week. This does not mean that the changes are by any means unanimously approved. On the contrary, in some Churches individuals have stood up, and with characteristic British frankness have remonstrated with the clergy for using the new forms. Such an active interest in the approach to God is certainly an unusual manifestation of the present mental attitude toward things religious.

OF COURSE, HE IS "ALL RIGHT"

The eyes of the whole nation have been fixed upon a tragedy occurring in Chicago during the past week, where a child and his friends have been waging a gallant struggle against death. It was a most unusual case, in which the muscles of the diaphragm were paralyzed, so that the contraction of the lungs to expel air was not possible. Artificial respiration with the aid of parents and friends, pressing upon the chest, as in reviving a drowning person, was kept up continuously for four days and a half, one hundred and eight hours.

Finally, however, the fight was lost, from the worldly point of view, and the soul of this brave little fellow passed on, his last words being, "I'm all right".

The incident called forth the following comment from a well-known writer in the daily papers:

"If there were no heaven, no future hope, for such a son, no hope that the father may again meet his boy, this life would be a ghastly mockery, and the ruler of the universe, cruel omnipotence."

In such cases as these, how consoling it is to look back to an incident in the Saviour's life, when to settle a dispute amongst His Disciples, He had called a little child to His side, and told them that to be great they must copy the innocency of childhood. Then He added, as though to console sorrowing parents throughout the ages, "Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones: for I say unto you, That in heaven their angels do always behold the face of My Father which is in heaven", and "Even so it is not the will of your Father which is in heaven, that one of these little ones should perish" (Matt. 18:10 and 14).

When Albert Frick gasped, "I'm all right", he may not have known what good authority he had for saying so, but every parent who has gone through the valley of the shadow of grief over the departure of a little one, should carry these great words of the Master continually in their hearts, and remember that we have it from His own lips that "It is not the will of your Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish".

The glory and wonder of Christianity is that it speaks to us from the pages of the daily press, and applies a healing balm to the wounds of life as they occur from day to day.

THE WEEK'S CONTRIBUTORS

THE REV. ROBERT. W. PATTON, D. D., this week's Pulpit preacher, was born in Virginia, and received both his academic and theological education in his native state, attending first Randolph-Macon College, then the University of Virginia, and finally the Theological Seminary at Alexandria. Dr. Patton is probably one of the best known clergymen in the Episcopal Church, having held various offices under the General Church for the past twenty-one years. He is best known as the originator and organizer of the Nation-Wide Campaign, which has almost revolutionized the activities of the Church, and been of incalculable value. Bishop Lawrence said of him at the last General Convention that "Dr. Patton and those associated with him, in the Nation-Wide Campaign had given a National conscienceness to the Episcopal Church". It is especially gratifying to note that this Southern man, born and reared in the South, is now devoting his time and talents to the advancement of Negro education, and, as director of the American Church Institute for Negroes, is at present engaged in a campaign to raise a large sum of money for this work to meet an appropriation already made for that purpose by the General Educational Board (a Rockefeller Foundation), on condition an equal amount is raised by the Church. In view of these activities, it is interesting to go back a couple of generations in Dr. Patton's family, and see his grandfather, John Mercer Patton, Governor of Virginia and member of the House of Representatives, entertaining his contemporary, Daniel Webster, on a visit to Virginia, when the latter was trying to bring about closer relations between the North and the South. It was from the porch of Colonel Patton's house (at Franklin and Ninth Streets), opposite the old Bell Tower in the Capital Square), that Webster made one of the great speeches of his career. We have given Dr. Patton more than the usual amount of space in this sketch on account of our deep interest in his present efforts in Negro education, and our eager desire to see him succeed, as we have no doubt he will.

SIR HENRY LUNN, the author of the article on the Lausanne Conference on Faith and Order, is a writer of international reputation. Born in London, England, he prepared himself for work as a medical missionary, and went to India, under the auspices of the Methodist Church. Later, however, he went into business, and has been unusually successful.

Maintaining his interest in Church work, he has been especially active in movements for closer cooperation among the Churches, and took a leading part in the convention at Stockholm in 1925, at which the subject was Christian Life and Work. He is now touring this country, lecturing and writing to arouse interest in the International Conference on Faith and Order to be held at Lausanne, Switzerland, next summer.

THE REV. ARTHUR BARKSDALE KINSOLVING, D. D., was born in Middleburg, Va., and graduated, first at the University of Virginia and then at the Theological Seminary at Alexandria. On leaving the Seminary, he went to that historic section of Virginia, known as the "Northern Neck". After serving the Church at Warsaw for three years, he went to the Diocese of Long Island, as rector of Christ Church, Brooklyn. He served there on the Standing Committee, and has been a member of six General Conventions. In 1905 he received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity from Washington and Lee University. He was called to St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, in 1906, and has served that famous parish ever since, celebrating last fall the twentieth year of his successful rectorate. Dr. Kinsolving comes of a great clerical family, being the son of the late Rev. O. A. Kinsolving, and having two brothers in the Episcopate, a brother, a son and a nephew in the ministry, the latter having just assumed the duties of Chaplain of the United States Military Academy at West Point.

THE PULPIT OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH

DIVINE PARTNERSHIP

By The Reverend Robert W. Patton, D. D.

"We then, as workers together with Him beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain."—2 Cor. 6:1.

IT IS characteristic of the religious genius of St. Paul that in this single sentence he should announce an entirely new theological doctrine, and one, too, that is so utterly revolutionary, that today, after nineteen centuries of Christian thinking, it has not yet been fully grasped.

When the Apostle to the Gentiles exhorts his Corinthian converts to be workers with God, he announces the partnership of man with God in a great and splendid undertaking. Most good people think of themselves as working for God, but only a few get the fulness of the joy of working with Him.

The use of this little four-letter preposition at once enlists God as a worker through us, striving in the same cause with Christ.

Our God, then is a working God, and we are His co-workers. Here St. Paul confirms that utterance of the Master spoken to the carping Pharisees after the healing of an impotent man on the Sabbath, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work".

It was not a new idea to St. Paul, although it seems so to us, for he had already set it forth at some length in his letter to the Galatians, where he makes an elaborate argument to prove the Fatherhood of God, explaining that through the coming of Jesus we have passed from the status of servants into that more glorious condition, "Whereby we cry, Abba! Father"!

If we are really God's children, as is proclaimed, both by Jesus and by His greatest disciple, then, of course, it follows that we are all in the same family relationship, all struggling together to attain the same end. What is that great object for the accomplishment of which we are enlisted with God?

It is nothing less than the happiness of the home and the perfecting of the children of the family.

It follows, too, that there can be no restricting of the children.

If God is our Father, then all mankind are the members of His family.

None can be left out by reason of race or any other condition. It imposes upon us a responsibility for the backward children, because the home cannot be a happy one, unless all its members are brought to perfection, including education and training for useful service.

It is just this great thought with its accompanying responsibilities that makes me so enthusiastic about the American Church Institute for Negroes, and impresses upon me the fact that its work is so important to civic, no less than to Christian progress.

There is no race which responds more readily and makes greater moral progress through education than do our Southern Negroes. For instance, it is an acknowledged fact by the residents of Brunswick County, Virginia, that the St. Paul's Normal and Industrial School, situated at Lawrenceville in that county, has reduced criminality in that section to a minimum. This is true, too, in general. An experienced jail worker has recently told me that in ten years of regular jail visiting he has only found two Negroes behind the bars who had received a high school education.

This is equally true of other backward people and that is why mission schools are started as one of the first and most important features of every missionary enterprise, whether it be among the Negroes, in the mountains, or in foreign countries like Japan and China.

But the important thing to remember is that the support of these institutions, and the carrying forward of the work of enlightenment is not only necessary, for the sake of the beneficiaries, but for our sake as well. If we are "workers together with God", as our text tells us that we are, we are sharers in God's responsibilities for His children.

Although this thought is new to many, it is the only logical conclusion of the Saviour's numerous statements of the Fatherhood of God, all through the Gospels, but especially in that according to John where we find it from beginning to end. Even after His resurrection His message to the disciples, sent by Mary Magdalene is, "I ascend unto my Father and your Father, My God and your God"!

The existence of this family relationship with God as the Father and head of the house implies something further. No family can be happy without a comfortable home. Now, when we begin to think, or speak of a home for God's family, many good Church people send their thoughts forward to the great hereafter, "the new Jerusalem", with its pearly gates and golden streets and other ornamental, but unattractive things like harps and crowns. We remember the words of one familiar hymn, "Heaven Is My Home", "I'm But a Stranger Here". Of course, there was a time when the world was so unutterably bad that it seemed impossible to make a happy spiritual home on this earth, and the faithful looked for bliss only through escape from their present surroundings. But, fortunately, that day has passed, and good men no longer retire into the desert, and try to cut themselves off from the rest of the world, and think that they can save their souls by torturing their bodies.

Bad as the world was in the days of Christ, He could see, with His Divine vision, the hope that it might be made a fit place for the children of God, and with this long view before Him He bids His followers pray "Thy Kingdom Come, Thy Will Be Done, on Earth, as it is in Heaven". This petition brings the home of God's family a good deal nearer than it is represented in the old hymns. More than that, every time we repeat this prayer we obligate ourselves to do our utmost to bring about that for which we pray. God's will cannot "Be done on Earth as it is in Heaven" while thousands, or millions, of His children and our brothers and sisters, are living in squalor and ignorance. That condition is not only retarding their spiritual progress, but is also holding us back. Some man has wisely said, "You cannot hold a man in the ditch without staying there yourself".

It is as much a Christian duty to wipe out city slums, and establish moral and intellectual institutions, as it is to preach the Gospel to the people who sit in the pews.

The compilers of the Prayer Book are very wise in selecting the Epistle for the First Sunday in Lent, which contains the words of our text as the opening verse. It would be hard to find a better Lenten thought than that of appreciating our partnership with God in all its many phases.

If we are "Workers with Him", and He is working with us, then our efforts cannot fail. We are bound to succeed because He is our partner. Beside us, around us, in and through us, He is accomplishing His mighty purposes. As Whittier briefly and beautifully puts it:

> "Unheard, because our ears are dull,
> Unseen, because our eyes are dim,
> He walks our earth, the Wonderful,
> And all good deeds are done by Him."

Another impressive thought that comes to us through this idea of partnership, is that each member of the firm represents the others, therefore—and we say this with the greatest reverence—we are God's ambassadors. People will judge our Father by us and the way that He works and lives through us. St. Paul emphasizes this when he urges us that we should "In all things approve ourselves as ministers of God". We feel sure that He does not refer to the ordained priesthood, but to all Christians as representatives of the Father, for again He says, "We are the temple of the Living God".

Let us, therefore, set ourselves through the Lenten season to acquire the habit of practicing partnership with God, remembering that we are co-workers with Him, and His representatives in all that we do.

SOME THOUGHTS ON PRESENT RELIGIOUS TRENDS

By the Reverend Arthur B. Kinsolving, D. D.

TO you and me is committed the ministry of reconciliation in an age which seems at times like a place where two seas meet. The new wine is bursting the old bottles. There are new skepticisms, new assaults, fresh revolts on every hand. We do not, like the early Christians, face a set of pagan deities outworn and dying, leaving behind satiety and disgust. On the contrary, the forces that are against the Christian Church are martialed in full strength, and the period of satiety has not arrived.

Two or three recent incidents may illustrate the temper of the times. A few nights ago, among the speakers at a national dinner in New York was Dr. Will Durant, the author of a recent History of Philosophy, of which above one hundred and twenty-five thousand copies have been sold, one of the most lucid and readable expositions for popular consumption which has come into the hands of the people for many a day. In the course of his address he said flippantly that since the discovery of Copernicus, and this little orb of ours is now known to be only a fleck of mud cast off from a larger body, of course the story that at any time it has been the home of the Son of God is but an incredible fairy tale.

The greatest inventor whom America has produced on his eightieth birthday declared that the name God had no significance for him, though in the next line he avowed his belief in a supreme intelligence and to a qualified extent in immortality.

There have been of late, perhaps more suicides among the young, notably among college students, than ever in our history, and it is well known that a considerable proportion of that select group who occupy chairs of instruction in our universities do not believe in God or His Divine Son.

Our morals have been slipping in many places, because men have a notion that standards change with human opinion. As belief in God has been relaxed, there has come a greater and greater license in human conduct. The first duty of every Christian teacher today, as it seems to us, is to try to get a fresh hold upon the truth of the objective reality of God as the real sanction of morals.

The other day you noticed that a group of college girls in voting what they thought should be the order of the Ten Commandments gave their opinion that the Fifth Commandment should be first, and the Fourth Commandment last. But the sanction of all commandments, of course, lies in a vital belief in the Living God. The whole notion that God can be either voted in or out of His universe is, of course, utterly false, and yet there are many people today who cherish that fiction.

A wave of materialistic science in its ebb has left a sediment of stubborn unbelief as to the possibility that spirit may triumph over matter. And yet in the last analysis of matter by the scientists themselves, it seems to have become almost a spiritual thing. I mean, the old idea of the solidity of matter has been abandoned, and the ultimate proton and electrons are known to be but a process, a bundle of energy, and the atom should be regarded more as an organism than a mechanism. So mechanistic materialism, in the view of the leading scientists themselves, is ruled out, and in this later conception matter may easily be conceived of as the sphere of the activity of the Imamanent God.

There has of late been a wholesome reaction from naturalistic and humanistic religious thought, and one of its finest and noblest expressions is to be found in the work of Rudolph Otto, "The Idea of the Holy". Otto would bring us back to an adequate conception of the mystery and majesty of God, would restore the sense of awe and reverence in the presence of a God Who is all righteous and all loving, that we may be lifted above the plane of our common every-day thoughts into the realm of worship, of contemplation, and an uplifting devotion in mind and heart to Almighty God. It is a great and inspiring note, and much needed in our modern Christianity, in which emotion and sentiment so often take the place of reverent and steadfast love. There is a very significant demand among more cultivated Protestants today, whose forefathers revolted four centuries ago against inherited types of worship, for a richer provision in their services for the worship of God. One of the things which our Mother Church has stood for most clearly through the ages is worship, worship as an exercise and a discipline by which we get away for a little while from the pressures of life at our level into the atmosphere of the presence of God.

Who does not know how many habits and influences today tend to make us externalize the practice of our religion, while the soul of it is left weak and ineffectual? Our prayers in public and in private are gabbled through, the great words we take on our lips in the offices and services are unthought and unfelt. The congregation watches often in vain, we fear, for the tokens of earnestness and reality, and goes away utterly uninspired. As some one has put it, "We have gazed so fixedly and persistently upon the pageantry of passing things, that they have become our only reality. We have lived so deeply in the lives of our neighbors and our community—and in the mere shell of their lives at that—that we have lost track of that mysterious 'buried life' of ours which is the only real life we possess. Our very religion has become little more than a vigorous effort to be sociable and communicative. . . . The moment the noise about us stops, we become disquieted and ill-at-ease".

But let a man put his soul and his very highest self in prayer or worship, let him make a real contact with the Living God, and how much it comes to mean to the people. We who have inherited this great liturgy, and who serve as priests in God's sanctuary, must try to realize our profound responsibility in being leaders of the worship of the sanctuary. If worship takes nothing out of us, it is likely to put little into others. If it becomes a mere convention which we hurry through in order to get to the sermon, surely the main opportunity will have been lost.

A great woman of the last century was accustomed to say to her novices, "Think glorious thoughts of God—and serve Him with a quiet mind". The more glorious and spacious our thoughts of God, the greater our quietude and confidence, the more real will be our worship, the better our preaching, and the nobler all our work.

God surely demands of us reality here first of all, a reality which leads to an ever deepening awe, an ever-growing awareness of the Living God. I think slackness and formalism in leading the worship of the congregation, poverty in the realization of God's presence, or of the great dignity and significance of the exercise in which we are engaged, is something that we must each strive to overcome, for if we allow ourselves to become unreal here, that unreality will vitiate every part of our work.

There has been a tremendous expansion of late years in the external activities of the work of the ministry. The whole modern world is more highly organized than it was fifty years ago, so it followed inevitably that the Church must use more efficient methods. There has been on the whole a vast gain. The Church is stronger, occupies a larger place in the thought and the gifts of her people; the position of the clergy is more secure; we have more to offer candidates for holy orders, and our conduct of missions has begun to take the place that it should occupy in the life of the Church. It would be untrue to decry all this, or to deny the vast advance which has been made. But thousands of earnest men and women are feeling more and more deeply that our great need is to develop the life within. The first requisite for the minister of religion is to be a man of God. He must take care of his own inner self and keep it in a healthy state. His contact with God must be steady and true.
